regard to whether the agreed boundaries would include the spring. By-standers were quite likely to have misunderstood the agreement. The material question was as to the language of the written contract. The final agreement and negotiations preceding it throw a very uncertain light upon that issue. Whether lost or not, there can be no evidence, in the absence of mistake or fraud, of the intention of the parties, other than the written instrument itself. The rights of the parties must be ascertained from its terms. Section 1856, Code Civil Proc. The Code expressly provides, in case of lost instruments, for oral evidence of its contents. Sections 1855, 1870, subd. 14. Evidence of the character received in this case imposes upon the court the construction of the contract by the witness. In U. S. v. Britton, 2 Mason, 264, Mr. Justice STORY remarked: "If no such copy exists, the contents may be proved by parol evidence, by witnesses who have seen and read it, and can speak pointedly and clearly to its tenor and contents." The precise question was decided in Taylor v. Riggs, 1 Pet. 591. Chief Justice MARSHALL said: "This not being an action for deceit and imposition, but on a written contract, the right of the plaintiff to recover is measured precisely by that contract, and the secondary evidence must prove it as laid in the declaration. The conversation which preceded the agreement forms no part of it; nor are the propositions or representations which were made at the time, but not introduced into the written contract, to be taken into view in construing the instrument itself. Had the written paper been produced, neither party could have been permitted to show his inducements to make it, or to substitute his understanding of it, for the agreement itself. If he was drawn into it by misrepresentation, that circumstance might furnish him with a different action, but cannot affect this. * * * "When a written contract is to be proved, not by itself, but by parol testimony, no vague, uncertain recollection concerning its stipulations ought to supply the place of the written instrument itself. The substance of the agreement ought to be proved satisfactorily; and, if that cannot be done, the party is in the condition of every other suitor in court who makes a claim which he cannot support. When parties reduce their contract to writing, the obligations and rights of each are described and limited by the instrument itself. The safety which is expected from them would be much impaired if they could be established upon uncertain and vague impressions made by a conversation antecedent to the reduction of the agreement." See, also, Vincent v. Cole, Moody & M. 258; Dennis v. Barber, 6 Serg. & R. 426. We think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

WE CONCUR: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLIFF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

EJECTMENT—INSTRUCTIONS—AGREED LINE.

1. In ejectment, where defendant claims by virtue of the statute of limitations, and also by reason of an alleged settlement of the line between him and plaintiff by their respective grantors, failing which defenses there is no question of plaintiff's right to the land, it is not error to instruct that plaintiff is entitled to recover, unless defendant shows title in one of the ways pleaded, and that the fact that he has in good faith made improvements on the land in controversy cannot affect the verdict.

2. An instruction that the agreed line claimed by defendant must have been "distinctly agreed on" is not misleading, as impliedly excluding evidence to prove the agreed line from the acts, situation, acquiescence, and relation of the parties.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. MCGARVEY, Judge.

Yell & Seawell, for appellant. J. A. Cooper and T. L. Carothers, for respondent.

BELCHER, C.C. This is the second appeal in this case. The decision on the first appeal is reported in 76 Cal. 476, 18 Pac. Rep. 604, and the facts involved in the case are there very fully stated. The new trial again resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff, from which, and from an order refusing a new trial, defendant appeals. The question in controversy was as to the true location of the line dividing the lands of plaintiff and defendant. The defendant pleaded the statute of limitations, and then alleged that, while the line was uncertain and in dispute, the grantors of plaintiff and defendant agreed upon and established the line claimed by defendant as the true line, and erected and maintained a fence thereon; that they and their successors in interest thereafter, till the commencement of this action, acquiesced in the line so agreed upon and established, and respectively held and claimed possession up to the same. The defendant further, "as a set-off for all damages and rents claimed by the plaintiff, or that may be recovered by him," alleged that he had placed certain permanent improvements upon the disputed strip of land, and that in the erection of the improvements he acted in good faith, and believed he had a good title to the said strip. At the trial the evidence upon most of the issues raised by the answer was conflicting. The court gave to the jury eight instructions at the request of the plaintiff, and six at the request of the defendant. These instructions state the law applicable to each party's theory of the case, and should be read together; when so read, they seem to cover the whole case, and to be clear and explicit. The only points made in support of the appeal are that the court erred in giving the sixth and seventh instructions asked by the plaintiff, and in modifying one of the instructions asked by the defendant. The sixth instruction was to the effect that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, unless the defendant had acquired title to the land in dispute in some one of the ways set up in his answer, "and the fact that defendant has placed improvements upon the property in dispute should not make any difference with the verdict you should give in the case." We see no error in this instruction. It was not and is not questioned that the plaintiff owned the land, unless the defendant had acquired title to it as against him; and, if he did own it, certainly his action could not be defeated by a showing that defendant had placed improvements upon it. The seventh instruction was, in substance, that the burden was upon the defendant to establish an agreed line by parol testimony, and that, unless the line claimed by defendant was distinctly agreed upon by the adjacent owners, the jury could not find in favor of the defendant, upon the theory of an agreed line. It is claimed that the word "distinctly," as used in the instruction, "was calculated to mislead the jury in this: that they were impliedly told no parol evidence was admissible to prove an agreed line from the facts, situation, acquiescence, and relations of the parties." We do not understand this to be the effect of the instruction. In the eighth instruction asked by the plaintiff, and in the third asked by the defendant, the court very clearly told the jury when and under what circumstances a division line would become established by the acquiescence of the parties. Here the court was speaking of a line claimed to have been established by an oral agreement, and the jury were simply told that, to make such an agreement effective, it must have been distinctly made; that is, the minds of the parties must have fully met. In this we see no error prejudicial to the defendant. Defendant's instruction, which was modified and given, was upon the subject of estoppel. Other instructions upon that subject were given at his request, which very fully stated the law applicable to the case. The instruction complained of did not state all the elements or conditions necessary to constitute an estoppel in pais, and it might properly have been refused. As modified, we do not think it misled the jury or prejudiced the defendant. The judgment and order, in our opinion, should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

DYER v. BRADLEY. (No. 13,165.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1891.)

INSOLVENCY—DISCHARGE—OPPOSITION—PREFERENCES.

1. The insolvent act of California, §§ 49, 55, declare void "fraudulent preferences contrary to provisions of this act," preferences "made in contemplation of becoming insolvent," and preferences "made within one month before filing a petition in insolvency." Heid, that allegations by a creditor that an insolvent made certain preferences more than a year before the filing of his petition, knowing himself then to be insolvent, do not show valid grounds of opposition to the insolvent's discharge, and hence the insolvent is not required to answer or demur thereto, under section 50.

2. Nor is it a valid ground of opposition that opponent's debt was created by a fraud of the insolvent, and while a fiduciary relation existed between the parties, since under section 52 such debts are not affected by the discharge.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; NOBLE HAMILTON, Judge.

Campbell & Wright, for appellant. Pillsbury & Blanding, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an appeal from an order granting the respondent, Joseph P. Dyer, a discharge from his debts, under the insolvent act of 1880. It appears from the record that Dyer filed his petition in insolvency on the 3d day of August, 1888, and was adjudged to be an insolvent debtor. Subsequently the appellant, Richard Bradley, proved his debt against the insolvent, amounting to $5,928.50. At the proper time thereafter the respondent applied to the court by petition for a discharge from his debts. The appellant objected to his discharge, and filed specifications in writing of the grounds of his opposition. These specifications were, in substance, as follows: (1) That on December 6, 1886, the respondent paid to the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, one of his creditors, a large sum of money, not less than $70,000, with the intent to prefer the bank as a creditor, and to pay it in full, and did in paying the said money to said bank prefer the same as a creditor, and pay it in full, and did thereby defraud his other creditors. (2) That on the 2d day of December, 1886, the respondent, knowing that he was insolvent and unable to pay his just debts, paid to M. C. Blake, a creditor, a large sum of money, not less than $35,000, the same being greatly in excess of any amount due the said Blake from the respondent, and that such payment was made with the intent to prefer him as a creditor, and to pay him in full, and the respondent in paying this money to Blake did prefer him as a creditor, and pay him in excess of the full amount due him, and did thereby defraud his other creditors by reason of such preference. (3) That the relationship existing between the appellant and respondent was a fiduciary one, and the indebtedness of respondent to appellant was created by reason of such fiduciary relationship, and in this way: During the year 1866 the respondent was a stock-broker, engaged in buying, selling, and holding stocks for his patrons. The appellant, reposing special confidence and trust in the honesty and solvency of respondent, deposited with him divers mining stocks of the value of $5,928.50, to be kept and taken care of for appellant, and to be subject only to his order. These stocks the respondent afterwards sold and converted to his own use, without the knowledge, consent, or order of appellant. (4) That on the 3d day of December, 1886, the respondent, well knowing his insolvency, but contriving and wishing to defraud appellant, in answer to inquiries, assured appellant that he was perfectly solvent, and that the property intrusted to him by appellant, as aforesaid, was perfectly safe and secure, and that by leaving the same with him the appellant could and would run no risk of losing the same; that appellant, relying on said assurances, took no steps to secure and recover his property as he otherwise could and would have done; and that the indebtedness of respondent to appellant was created by the loss of said property, and that by reason of said deceit appellant was defrauded. (5) That the debt owing by respondent to appellant is a fraudulent debt, and was fraudulently created; that is to say, prior to December 3, 1886, respondent was a stock-broker, and was intrusted by appellant with certain mining stocks, of the value of $5,928.50, which he wrongfully and fraudulently converted to his own use, and by reason of such conversion became indebted to appellant for the value thereof. Afterwards, pursuant to an order to show cause why the discharge should not be granted, the parties appeared in court, and the attorneys for respondent then orally moved the court to strike out the opposition of appellant, and for an order discharging respondent from his debts, notwithstanding the opposition, on the ground that it did not appear that the appellant was entitled to make the opposition; and that the alleged opposition did not state facts sufficient, and was not in form or substance sufficient, to constitute any valid ground of opposition to the discharge. The attorneys for appellant objected that the respondent had not filed any demurrer or answer to the opposition, and asked the court to require the respondent to file his demurrer or answer before any further proceedings should be taken. The court refused to make the order requested. The application for a discharge was then taken under advisement by the court, and was subsequently granted, and a certificate of discharge given to respondent in the form prescribed by statute. Hence this appeal.

The appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to require the respondent to demur or answer to the specifications of the grounds of his opposition, and in granting the discharge without any trial of the issues tendered thereby. On the other hand, the respondent contends that the specifications tendered no material issues, and that no demurrer or answer was therefore required. The insolvent act (section 50) provides: "Any creditor opposing the discharge of a debtor shall file specifications, in writing, of the grounds of his opposition, and after the debtor has filed and served his answer thereto, which pleadings shall be verified, the court shall try the issue or issues raised, with or without a jury, according to the practice provided by law in civil actions." Under this section, we think the opposing creditor must state in his specifications facts which, if denied, will raise material issues, and, if admitted or established, will constitute valid grounds of opposition to the discharge. If he does not do this, but states only irrelevant and immaterial matters, the specifications may, on motion, be stricken out or disregarded as surplusage. This is a long-settled rule as to immaterial matters stated in pleadings in civil actions, and we think it equally applicable to proceedings under the insolvent act.

The only question, then, is, did the facts stated by appellant in his specifications, if true, constitute a valid ground of opposition to the discharge? It will be observed that the charges against respondent may be divided into three classes: (1) That, a year and eight months before he filed his petition in insolvency, he, knowing that he was then insolvent, paid two of his creditors in full, with intent to prefer them to other creditors; (2) that the debt to appellant was created while respondent was acting in a fiduciary character; (3) that the debt to appellant was created by fraud on the part of respondent.

The provisions of the insolvent act bearing on the question are as follows: Section 49 provides that no discharge shall be granted, or, if granted, shall be valid, "if, within one month before the commencement of such proceedings, he [the debtor] has procured his lands, goods, money, or chattels to be attached or seized on execution; * * * or if he has given any fraudulent preference contrary to the provisions of this act, or made any fraudulent payment, gift, transfer, conveyance, or assignment of any part of his property; * * * or if he has, in contemplation of becoming insolvent, made any pledge, payment, transfer, assignment, or conveyance of any part of his property, directly or indirectly, absolutely or conditionally, for the purpose of preferring any creditor or person having a claim against him, or who is or may be under liability for him, or for the purpose of preventing the property from coming into the hands of the assignee, or of being distributed under this act in satisfaction of his debts." Section 55 provides that, "if any person being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, within one month before the filing of a petition by or against him, with a view to give a preference to any creditor or person having a claim against him, or who is under any liability for him, * * * makes any payment, assignment, transfer, or conveyance of any part of his property, * * * the person receiving such payment * * * having reasonable cause to believe that such person is insolvent, and that such * * * payment * * * is made * * * with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in insolvency, or to prevent the same from being distributed ratably among his creditors, * * * such transfer, payment, conveyance, pledge or assignment is void, and the assignee may recover the property, or the value thereof, as assets of such insolvent debtor." And section 52 declares that "no debt created by fraud or embezzlement of the debtor, * * * or while acting in a fiduciary character, shall be discharged under this act, but the debt may be proved, and the dividend thereon shall be a payment on account of said debt."

1. Unless made so by the above-quoted provisions of the statute, the preferences complained of were neither fraudulent nor unlawful. Dana v. Stanford, 10 Cal. 269; Randall v. Buffington, Id. 491; Wheaton

v. Neville, 19 Cal. 46; Dean v. Grimes, 72 Cal. 447, 14 Pac. Rep. 178. It is true, it is charged that the payment to Blake was in excess of the amount due him; but that we regard as of no consequence, for, so far as appears, the excess may have been paid by mistake, and may have been returned or properly accounted for before the proceedings in insolvency were commenced. It is also charged that by making the payments respondent "did thereby defraud his other creditors," but that was a mere conclusion of law. No facts were stated from which it can be said that the payments constituted a fraud upon the other creditors, or that the respondent intended thereby to defraud his other creditors. It will be noticed that section 49 speaks of only two kinds of preferences which will prevent or make invalid a discharge, one a "fraudulent preference, contrary to the provisions of this act," and the other a preference made "in contemplation of becoming insolvent;" and section 55 only declares void a preference made "within one month before the filing of a petition" in insolvency. These sections are parts of the same act, and must be read together. When so read, the question is, within what time must the inhibited preferences be made, in order to impose the penalty declared by section 49? It seems to us the answer is found in sections 49 and 55, and that the time there named is controlling. Certainly it could not have been intended that the time might extend back indefinitely, possibly for years. In Bump's Law and Practice of Bankruptcy (page 708) it is said: "No preference can be fraudulent under the act, unless it is made within four months [the time named in similar provisions of the bankrupt act] before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy;" citing authorities.

2. The charges that the debt to appellant was created while the relations of the parties were of a fiduciary character, and by the fraud and wrongful conversion of the respondent, are not grounds for opposing a discharge. Under section 52, a debt so created is not affected by the discharge, and such a creditor has therefore nothing to complain of. Herrlich v. McDonald, 80 Cal. 472, 22 Pac. Rep. 299; In re McEachran, 82 Cal. 224, 23 Pac. Rep. 46. We see no error in the rulings of the court below, and therefore advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

HARGRO et al. v. HODGDON. (No. 13,317.)

DEDICATION OF PUBLIC ALLEYS — NUISANCE — PLEADING.

1. Where the owners of a block, by mutual agreement, opened an alley, and the same was recognized as an alley for more than 30 years, such dedication is sufficient to maintain an action to abate a private nuisance in obstructing the same.

2. A house built in a public alley so as to partly abut upon plaintiff's lot, and prevent access to the public highway, is a private nuisance, and plaintiff may maintain an action to abate it, although she has suffered no actual pecuniary damage.

3. Where a complaint to abate a nuisance does not explicitly state that plaintiff has sustained an injury different in kind to the general public, it is insufficient on special demurrer; but when such injury appears by inference it is proper to overrule a motion for judgment on the pleadings at the commencement of the trial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

John D'Arcy and Otto Tum Suden, for appellant. Hutchinson & Campbell, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from judgment and order denying defendant's motion for new trial. This action is brought to abate a nuisance, — to remove an obstruction placed by defendant in what is alleged to be a public alley, extending from Sixteenth street northerly to Fifteenth, through the block bounded by these streets and Mission street and Julian avenue, in the city and county of San Francisco. The alleged alley is known as "Lida Place" or "Court." From the complaint it appears that plaintiff Selina Hargro owns a lot extending from Julian avenue to Lida place, and that defendant has erected a house in the alley, occupying the whole of it for a distance of 30 feet. From the measurements given, it can be ascertained that for the greater part of this distance it abuts upon the property of plaintiff Selina, who is the wife of the other plaintiff, James Hargro, thus shutting her off to that extent from access to the alley. But there is no express allegation of such fact. It is averred that the obstruction greatly damages plaintiff, decreases the value of her real estate, and jeopardizes her right in the alley; "that said house interferes with plaintiff's use and enjoyment of said alley, and plaintiff has already been damaged by said erection and maintenance of said house on said alley-way by the defendant in the sum of two thousand ($2,000) dollars United States gold coin." The defendant denies all the allegations of the complaint, except that, in regard to the erection and maintenance of the obstruction, the denials are qualified by the word "unlawfully," and avers ownership in defendant of the land claimed as an alley.

At the commencement of the trial, defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings, because the complaint states no special damage or injury to plaintiff. The motion was denied. The same point is urged here, in connection with the further point that there was no evidence which tended to show peculiar injury to plaintiff. In regard to the objection to the pleading, it may be noted that it was not made by demurrer, either special or general. It may be admitted that if the complaint does state injury to plaintiff different in kind, and not in amount merely, to that sustained by the general public, it does so by inference only, and not by explicit, positive averment, as the rules of pleading require. In such a case the pleading would fall before a special demurrer, and the pleader would be permitted to amend. But when a party craftily lies by, in presence of such an objection, to spring it when, if sustained, it would be lethal, the sufficiency of the pleading will be tested by a very different rule. Then the pleading will be upheld, if the essential fact appears by plain and necessary implication. The matter will be more fully considered in connection with the objection to the proof and, if our views as there expressed are correct, it will be manifest that, tried by such a test, the complaint is sufficient. In regard to the obstruction, the facts are found as stated in the complaint; expressly stating, however, that the house abuts upon the rear of plaintiff's lot, and cuts off 20 feet and 6 inches, or over two-thirds, of the alley frontage of her lot. The court also found that she suffered special injury thereby, but assessed no damages. It was further found that plaintiff's lot had never been occupied or improved.

It is claimed that this action cannot be maintained unless the plaintiff has suffered actual pecuniary damage; that the failure of the court to find any amount of damage is a finding that she has suffered none, much less damage peculiar or special to her, different in kind from that suffered by other members of the community; and it is asserted that there was no evidence tending to show such damage. The doctrine asserted in Bigley v. Nunan, 53 Cal. 403, that it is pecuniary damage which constitutes the basis of the action is expressly limited to actions at law for damages. As to bills in equity, it is only said that the injury complained of must be special in character, and not merely greater in degree than that of the general public. If a substantial right has been invaded, especially if the wrong be in the nature of a continuing trespass of such a character that its continuance will create a right against the plaintiff's estate, or operate to deprive plaintiff of a substantial right incident to her property, the nuisance will be abated, although the damage is merely nominal. Indeed, the fact that a threatened injury is of such a nature that it is incapable of pecuniary estimation is a well-known ground of equitable relief. Webb v. Manufacturing Co., 3 Sum. 189; Wood, Nuis. pp. 825, 826, and cases there cited. That the plaintiff has suffered injury from the obstruction peculiar to herself, differing in kind from that suffered by others, is clear. The cases in this state seem to hold that to obstruct a public highway so as to completely prevent travel will not constitute a special injury to an individual, such as will enable him to maintain a private action to abate the nuisance, even where such highway constitutes the only means by which the individual can reach his property. Aram v. Schallenberger, 41 Cal. 449; Ranch Co. v. Brooks, 74 Cal. 463, 16 Pac. Rep. 250. But it has never been held that an individual cannot maintain an action to abate an obstruction which, while obstructing the public highway, also cuts off access from his premises to the public highway. So far as it does this it becomes a private nuisance. His complaint is not that it obstructs the street or road, but that it prevents him from reaching it. Such was the case in Blanc v. Klumpke, 29 Cal. 156. The waterfrontage of plaintiff was cut off by piles driven in front of his lot, shutting him out from the common highway,—the navigable waters. The same character of obstruction existed in Schulte v. Transportation Co., 50 Cal. 592, and in Ford v. Railroad Co., 59 Cal. 290. In these cases it was held that special injury resulted to the complainants from a public nuisance. The result is the same as though it had been held that it constituted both a public and a private nuisance, although the latter would seem the more accurate statement; for it is the obstruction of the street which renders it a public nuisance, and that is not the injury to the individual; that is, that it cuts him off from the street.

The only remaining question of importance in the case is, does the evidence justify the decision to the effect that the alley in question is a public alley by dedication? There is a general finding to this effect; and the probative facts, or some of them, are also found. It is not stated that the general finding is based upon the probative facts found, but their correctness is not disputed, and so far as they go they constitute a convenient statement of the evidence conceded to be correct. It appears from these findings that in October, 1853, Joseph H. Moore and Thomas Varney owned all of this block on the westerly side of the center line of the alleged public alley, and Ferdinand Vassault, Lucien Herman, and P. Theodule Brou owned the land on the east side of this line. Vassault and Herman proposed in writing to Moore and Varney as follows: "We * * * agree to give ten feet from off the depth of our lots for the purpose of opening an alley twenty feet wide between our property and the property owned by yourself and others on the rear of ours, provided yourself and others owning said rear property will also give ten feet from the east line of yours, in order that the alley may be made continuous from Center to Tracy streets. * * * Please let us know if you accept the proposition." The next day Moore and Varney accepted this proposition, also in writing. Center and Tracy streets were afterwards called, respectively, "Sixteenth" and "Fifteenth" streets. Brou did not sign either part of this contract, but it is found that he consented to the dedication. At the trial it was stipulated "that all the deeds, mortgages, and transfers of lots in Mission block 35, between Julian avenue and Mission street, from those of the original owners down to those under which the present owners hold, recognize the alley on the block [in question] * * * by making the depth of the lots fronting on Mission street 182 feet, and those on Julian avenue 84 feet, and most of them recognize the alley by name, and that a number of deeds and mortgages made and recorded from 1865 to January, 1886, executed by defendant, recognize said alley by name." There can be no doubt that there was an offer to dedicate this alley on the part of all the proprietors, and that all of the present owners purchased with the understanding that it was a public alley, and had a right to so conclude from the acts of their vendors in selling the property. As to such owners it is perhaps unnecessary to go further. Stallard v. Cushing, 76 Cal. 472, 18 Pac. Rep. 427. But it is found that from the year 1857 the alley has been continuously, and is now, open and accessible to the public, and actually used by the public, 165 feet northerly from Sixteenth street. That portion of the street is the only part involved in this case. It is a strong circumstance in this connection, that if this strip of land was not dedicated it still belongs to the original owners, not one of whom now owns a lot in this block. None of the present lot-owners claim to have purchased any part of this strip. The defendant claims under the statute of limitations. It is plain, therefore, that he and his vendees have regarded it as a public alley.

It is claimed that defendant has for many years had actual possession of the portion of the alley involved in this case. If it were a public alley, no rights could be acquired as against the public by such adverse holding. But the possession was not adverse. Defendant put a gate across the alley near Sixteenth street, with the consent of abutting owners, to prevent the alley from being made a dumping-ground for rubbish; and the gate was opened, and the alley at all times freely used, by all who had occasion to make use of it. So far from tending to show an exclusive claim on the part of Hodgdon, it shows a recognition by him of the rights of others. He testifies that he himself made it an alley, and sidewalked it as such.

There was no error in the admission of the map and the street assessment. If they did not tend to prove an official acceptance of the alley, they were still admissible as tending to show general knowledge of the existence of the alley. There was no objection to the testimony of Center, and we think it could not have been harmful. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

WE CONCUR: BELCHER, C. C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1891.)

TRUSTS—DEED ABSOLUTE—LIMITATIONS—LACHES.

1. In an action to recover property claimed to have been conveyed in trust to plaintiff's aunt by deed which was absolute, the plaintiff testified that she signed a paper, and her aunt said, "I will hold the property for you;" that she did not know what the paper was, and did not discover it until her aunt's death; and that she received nothing for the conveyance. Held sufficient to establish the trust.

2. Where a trustee voluntarily assumes a trust, with an implied agreement to reconvey upon request, the statute of limitations does not run against the beneficiary.

3. Although plaintiff did not commence suit for 2 years after her trustee's death, 8 years after marriage, 16 years after attaining her majority, and 19 years after executing the deed, the delay will not be considered laches, when it appears that she lived with her trustee most of the time, and that the defendants have expended nothing upon the lands.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit, and from an order refusing a new trial. Plaintiff's father, as she avers, died June 5, 1858, leaving, as heirs, plaintiff, aged 8 years, and her brother, aged about 14. Her mother had previously died. Her father was the owner, at the time of his death, of the lot in controversy. Just before her father's death, her aunt, who was a widow with three children, the present defendants, came to live with her father on the lot in suit, and plaintiff became at once a member of her aunt's family, and lived with her until her own marriage, in 1879. While she was a minor, living with and in the custody of her aunt, her aunt represented to her that her brother would get her property from her, and said if plaintiff would convey it to her she would hold it in trust for plaintiff. Upon this representation and agreement she conveyed her right to her aunt. That by mistake the deed was made absolute in form, and purported to be made for a consideration of $500. That she and her aunt were both ignorant of this fact. That she received nothing for the conveyance, and did not discover the mistake until after the death of her aunt, in 1885. She never demanded or received a deed from her aunt, who remained in possession up to her death, and the defendants, who are the only descendants of her aunt, although fully aware of her rights, repudiate and deny them, and claim to be themselves the owners. She sues to recover the property, for a conveyance, and for general relief. The defendants do not deny the ownership of plaintiff's father, or the facts which show that plaintiff was his heir, but they deny the trust, and aver that the deed was in fact an absolute conveyance for a valuable consideration. They also plead the statute of limitations, and charge laches in the bringing of the suit.

At the trial the plaintiff was the only witness examined. She testified that her father died June 5, 1858, leaving herself and her brother as the only children, her mother having died before; that shortly before her father's death her aunt came to live with her father upon the lot in suit, and after her father's death they all continued to live there together. She said: "I continued to live with my aunt in the same house. My aunt took care of me, sent me to school, and I had no one else to provide for or look after me; but my uncle sometimes sent money to my aunt for me. I was received in and become a member of her family, and so continued until the time of my marriage, which took place April 30, 1879. * * * After my father's death, when I was about sixteen years old, and while I was still living under my aunt's care, my brother tried to get me to sign a paper while I was visiting him, and I wouldn't sign it; and when I got home I told my aunt what he wanted me to do. My aunt said, 'I will fix it so he can't get your property from you.' The next day a notary called at the house, and I signed a paper. My aunt said, 'I will hold your property for you.' I did not know what the paper was, and never discovered it until my aunt's death, and a short while before this suit was brought, but I suppose it was read over to me before I signed it. My aunt gave me nothing and I received nothing for signing the paper, and I was under age at the time." The witness recognized a deed shown her as the deed she executed, dated October 12, 1866, purporting to be in consideration of $500, acknowledged and recorded on the same day. She testified that her aunt died September 10, 1885, leaving, her surviving, the defendants, her children; that she never asked her aunt for a deed, and never received one. The rental value was $7.50 per month. On cross-examination she said that her aunt was in exclusive possession of the property at the time the deed was executed, and had paid all taxes and assessments, and that plaintiff had continued all the time to reside in the city and county of San Francisco, and knew these facts. The plaintiff here rested her case, and the defendants moved for a nonsuit, which was granted. In the motion for a nonsuit the alleged defects in the proof were specifically pointed out, but need not be formally repeated here. Such a motion is in the nature of a demurrer to evidence. The truthfulness of the testimony is admitted, but its sufficiency is challenged. The evidence shows that a confidential relation existed between plaintiff and the mother of defendants, and that at her request plaintiff conveyed to her an undivided half interest in the property, with the understanding that her aunt would hold it for her. The law, under such circumstances, implies an agreement to reconvey upon request, and it is immaterial that there was no proof of a distinct understanding that the trust was to have been set out in express terms in the deed, and was omitted by mistake. Immediately upon the death of her father, plaintiff became the owner of one undivided half interest in the premises, and it was not necessary for her to show administration and distribution of his estate.

This is not an action to disaffirm plaintiff's deed as the act of a minor, and to recover property thus conveyed. Plaintiff asks no relief which would not have been her due under the same circumstances had she been of mature age. Her minority is material only as tending to establish that the relations between herself and her aunt were confidential. It was not necessary, therefore, for her to disaffirm, under section 35 of the Civil Code. The testimony of plaintiff being taken as true, there can be no doubt that it establishes a trust under the rule laid down in Brisson v. Brisson, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. Rep. 689.

Nor can any plausible claim be made that the action is barred by the statute of limitations. It was not a constructive trust forced upon the conscience of the trustee, but one voluntarily assumed, and which, by the understanding of the parties to it, was to be a continuing one. The trustee—so far as the evidence goes—continued to hold according to the understanding, and never repudiated the relation, or did any act inconsistent with it. Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 565; Tiff. & B. Trusts, 19.

There is more plausibility in the claim that there have been such laches as will prevent the plaintiff obtaining relief. As respondent has succinctly stated, she commenced her suit "two years after her aunt's death; eight years after her marriage; sixteen years after she had attained her majority; nineteen years, eleven months and twenty days after the deed had been executed and recorded." But it must be remembered that, by the terms of the trust, her aunt was to hold the title for her. The conveyance was made for that purpose. For most of the time she was a member of her aunt's family, who stood in loco parentis to her. Between four and five years only elapsed after her own marriage before her aunt's death. The rental value of the place was small, and she knew that her aunt was paying the taxes, assessments, and repairs, the amount of which are not shown. The doctrine of laches is not applied so strictly between near relatives. 2 Story, Eq. Jur., §1520. On the other hand, nothing is shown which would make it inequitable to enforce the trust. It does not appear that plaintiff has stood by allowing the trustee to treat the property as her own, and under that belief expending money in improvements. There is nothing tending to show that up to her death Mrs. Hyland ever supposed or claimed that she had any interest in the property. The defendants have expended nothing upon the property. It does not appear, even, that the premises have been included in their mother's estate by any proceedings in probate. If any injury has resulted through the delay, it must be in rendering proofs of the real facts difficult, but there certainly was no culpable delay until after her aunt's death, since which nothing has occurred to increase the difficulties of the defendants as to the evidence. That the plaintiff waited so long after she ceased to be a member of her aunt's family before asserting her claim to the property may possibly have some bearing upon the probability of her story,—that is, upon her credibility. We have not considered the value of the testimony, weighed against other proofs or circumstances. We think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial awarded.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial awarded.

WHITE v. BUELL. (No. 14,077.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 10, 1891.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—FORFEITURE.

A contract for the sale of land provided for a payment of $1,000 at date of contract, $4,000 within 30 days, and $35,000 at a later date, and declared that, if the vendee failed to pay the $4,000 or the $35,000 as agreed, the contract should terminate, and the vendor need not return the $1,000. The vendee paid the $1,000, and the $4,000, and then abandoned the contract, and the vendor sold the land to another. Held, that the vendee was entitled to a return of the $4,000. Following Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

Wilber F. George, for appellant. W. C. Stratton, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The facts stated in the complaint in this case are as follows: On the 20th day of August, 1887, the parties to the action entered into a written contract, whereby the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff certain lands in Santa Barbara county for the sum of $120,000, to be paid as follows: $1,000 at the date of the contract; $4,000 within 30 days thereafter; $35,000 on or before November 1, 1887; and $80,000 at such time thereafter as the plaintiff should on November 1, 1887, elect, not exceeding 3 years from date. The contract then says: "At the time of the payment of said thirty-five thousand dollars, the party of the first part [defendant] shall execute to the party of the second part [plaintiff] a proper deed, conveying to said party of the second part said land by good title, free from incumbrances, and at the same time the party of the second part shall either pay to the party of the first part the balance of said purchase price, or shall execute to the party of the first part a first mortgage on said property to secure the payment of said eighty thousand dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of eight per cent. per year, payable yearly. It is further understood and agreed that if the party of the second part does not pay said four thousand dollars within thirty days, or said thirty-five thousand dollars on or before the first day of November, 1887, this contract shall terminate, and the party of the first part shall not thereafter be under any obligations by reason of this contract, nor need he return said one thousand dollars, or any part of it." As required by the contract, plaintiff paid to the defendant $1,000 at the time of the execution thereof, and $4,000 within 30 days thereafter. Nothing further was done by either of the parties until on or about November 1, 1887, when plaintiff decided and elected to proceed no further under the contract, and to forfeit the $1,000 first paid by him. He then so notified defendant, and demanded that he repay the said sum of $4,000, but defendant refused, ever since has refused, and still refuses, to pay the same, or any part thereof. Some time in 1888 defendant sold, conveyed and delivered possession of the property mentioned in the contract to other parties. Wherefore plaintiff prayed judgment against the defendant for the sum of $4,000, with interest and costs. The defendant interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, and it was sustained by the court. The plaintiff declined to amend, and thereupon judgment was entered that he take nothing. From that judgment plaintiff appeals. We think the demurrer was improperly sustained. The case in all material respects is like Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280, and Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. Rep. 749; and on the authority of those cases we advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

BELLE GARDE v. SAN FRANCISCO BRIDGE CO.
(No. 13,215.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 10, 1891.)

NEGLIGENCE—APPEAL—REVIEW.

In an action for injury to plaintiff's property caused by defendant in filling in a street, the court, in its instructions, limited plaintiff's right of recovery to the hypothesis of defendant's negligence, and the jury found for the plaintiff. Held, that as there was some evidence of negligence, and as the defendant asked for a reversal only in case of error in law, the judgment should be affirmed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

O'Brien, Morrison & Daingerfield and Hepburn Wilkins, for appellant. J. D. Sullivan and Henry McCrea, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an action for "willfully, recklessly, and without care or caution, dashing huge car-loads of rock and earth, weighing many tons, around and against" certain piles supporting the plaintiff's house, whereby these supports of the house were forced from their position, and that structure was pitched into the water which surrounded it, the result being, as claimed, the damages for which the suit is brought. The answer denies these allegations, and claims that what was done by the defendant was justifiable in prosecuting certain street work under its contract with the city and county of San Francisco; that the injury resulted, not from carelessness or negligence, but from the dumping of rock and earth into the mud and water across a part of the waters of the bay of San Francisco, in order to construct a street of said city, called "Railroad Avenue," and that this dumping of rock and earth onto the soft bottom of the bay, where the mud lay very deep, had the natural and inevitable effect to force out the mud from the sides of this avenue as it was being constructed of the rock and earth, so as to impinge upon the piles supporting the plaintiff's house, and without fault of the defendant, but as the unavoidable result of the prosecution of a lawful work, caused the damage to the plaintiff. It is evident that, according to the instructions of the court, the jury, under the facts, could not have found for the plaintiff except upon the idea that the defendant was negligent in prosecuting a lawful work. The defendant seems to be of the opinion that unless the appellate court shall declare that there is no evidence in the record to support this apparent view of the matter by the jury, or unless some different statement of the law than that laid down by the trial court shall be enunciated here, it would be useless and undesirable for it to have a reversal of the judgment and orders. In its opening brief it is announced that "we prefer an affirmance to a reversal involving a heavier verdict." They ask this court "to say, in its opinion deciding this cause, that Mr. Bellegarde has proved no case against appellant, or, at least, to lay down very unmistakably the law regarding the liability of street contractors. We prefer an affirmance rather than to be handed over to the tender mercies of another anti-corporation jury, without the protection of some such intimation from this court." We cannot say that the jury had no evidence on which to base their verdict, nor do we perceive any error in the law as laid down by the trial court, and given to the jury. It was as favorable as the defendant could ask. There is no necessity to enter into an abstract disquisition as to any further principles of law applicable to street contractors in some instances, perhaps, but inapplicable to the case in hand; and therefore we recommend that the judgment and orders be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and orders are affirmed.

JUDGMENT—FAILURE TO FILE BRIEFS—AFFIRMANCE.

Where appellant has filed no brief showing the particular ground on which he relies for reversal, and on examination of the record no error prejudicial to him is apparent, the judgment will be affirmed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

John F. Burris, Carroll Cook, and R. M. Swain, for appellant. Laughlin & Thompson, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The judgment in this case was rendered by the superior court of Sonoma county on October 1, 1888. Subsequently three appeals were taken by the defendant Hirschler. The first appeal was dismissed, without prejudice, on the ground that the transcript was not filed in time. The second appeal was from the judgment alone, on a bill of exceptions. The third appeal was from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, and, in so far as it was from the order, was dismissed on September 30, 1889. 80 Cal. 626, 22 Pac. Rep. 296. The records on the last two appeals from the judgment are the same, and they may be disposed of together. No brief has been filed on behalf of the appellant, and we are therefore not advised on what particular ground or grounds he relies for a reversal. We have, however, examined the records, and in our opinion no error prejudicial to the appellant is therein shown. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

PUB. CO. (No. 14,069.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1891.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—NONSUIT.

A nonsuit will be set aside on appeal where it does not appear that the attention of the court and of the plaintiff was called to the grounds on which it was asked.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; PHILIP W. KEYSER, Judge. Gordon & Young and E. A. Davis, for appellants. J. H. Craddock, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover possession of a certain printing-press delivered by plaintiffs' assignors to one McWhorter under a contract similar in terms to that which was under consideration in the case of Palmer v. Howard, 72 Cal. 293, 13 Pac. Rep. 858. When the plaintiffs rested at the trial, the defendant moved the court for a nonsuit upon several grounds. The motion was granted, and the only question for consideration is whether the court erred in its ruling. McWhorter sold the property to Holland & Crane, and they had full notice of the terms and conditions under which the former had secured possession of it. The agreement of June 27, 1887, was binding not only upon McWhorter, but upon subsequent purchasers with notice of the conditions under which McWhorter took and held the property. Assuming that the plaintiffs were required to prove that the defendant took the property with notice of the facts, the grounds of the motion for a nonsuit do not specify a failure to prove such notice; and, under the rule well established here, a nonsuit cannot be granted, unless the ground upon which it is supported was called to the attention of the court and the plaintiffs at the time the motion was made. None of the grounds stated in the statement on motion for a new trial is well taken. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

RAYMOND v. McMULLEN et al. (No. 14,357.)

APPEAL—RECORD—TIME OF FILING—STIPULATION.

When the sole consideration of a stipulation allowing appellants' counsel additional time to file his transcript was his agreement to do all things necessary to the speedy determination of the appeal in another case involving the same questions, and he fails to do so, the consideration has failed, and respondent will be entitled to a dismissal for failure to file the transcript in apt time, as if no stipulation had been made.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Motion to dismiss the appeal.

R. Percy Wright, for appellants. Edward R. Taylor, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The appeal in this case was taken January 29, 1889. At the same time, appeals were taken on behalf of the same appellants in several other actions involving the same or similar questions, one of which actions was Hartshorne v. McMullen; and on the 2d of February, 1889, at the request of the attorney for the appellants, the attorney for the respondent made the following stipulation: "In the supreme court of the state of California. Frances B. Raymond, Respondent, v. J. McMullen et al., Appellants. It is hereby stipulated that the appellants may have ten (10) days after the filing of the remittitur in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, in Hartshorne v. McMullen et al., on appeal to this court from the judgment and order denying the motion of defendants for a new trial, within which to file and serve their transcript on appeal herein. TAYLOR & HAIGHT, Attorneys for Respondent." The transcript in Hartshorne v. McMullen was filed in this court August 27, 1889, and the cause was placed upon the calendar of this court for the January session of the present year, and set down to be argued February 19, 1891. No points or authorities were filed on behalf of appellants, as required by rule 2 of this court; and on the 17th of February, upon the ex parte motion of the appellants, the appeal was dismissed. Prior to the issuing of the remittitur thereon, the respondent made a motion to dismiss the appeal in this cause upon the ground that no transcript had been filed in this court; and in response to the above stipulation, relied upon by the appellants in resisting his motion, contends that the consideration upon which the stipulation was given has failed, and that he is not bound thereby. In support of this contention, he presents an affidavit wherein he states "that, soon after said appeals were perfected, Mr. R. Percy Wright, the attorney for defendants and appellants, came to the office of this affiant, and represented to affiant that it would cost a good deal of money to print and file the transcripts on appeal in all of said actions, and that it was useless to do so, as one case in each set of said cases would probably determine all of the rest; and proposed to affirm that the transcripts in two of the said cases only be printed and filed, and that the necessary points and argument be made and presented on them, so that they might be determinative of the rest, and expense be saved to each party litigant; that affiant thereupon agreed to the said proposition of said Wright upon the express condition, and no other, that the two cases in which the transcripts were to be printed and filed should be fully argued by said Wright in the regular course of business of this court, to the end that the decision in said cases should, as soon as might be, serve to advise the parties litigant as to their legal rights; that the stipulation relied upon on this motion by defendants was signed by affiant upon the aforesaid express condition, and upon no other; and that there was no consideration for affiant's entering into said stipulation save that of the benefit which would result to his clients from having the aforesaid two cases, in which the transcripts were to be filed, fully argued and decided on the merits; and affiant further says that said Wright, at the time of the signing of the said stipulation by affiant, well knew, and has always known, that affiant would not have signed the same except upon the aforesaid condition and consideration." These facts are practically conceded by the respondent, as in his affidavit in reply thereto he merely avers that "neither at the time said stipulations were signed by the attorneys for respondent, nor at any time previous thereto, was it ever stated to the appellants, or to this deponent, that said stipulations were to be, or were, given upon any condition or on any terms other than those expressed therein."

It is very evident from the foregoing history of the case, and from the affidavits offered in behalf of the respective parties, that the only consideration for the stipulation given by the respondent was that the appellant should take such steps in the case of Hartshorne v. McMullen as would result in a decision of this court being rendered therein which should be a guide to the parties in determining the course to be pursued in the other cases. It was not necessary that the consideration should be expressed in the stipulation. A stipulation is only an agreement, and as in the case of any other agreement, not only can the consideration for making it be established outside of the agreement itself, but it can also be shown that such consideration has failed, and, when so shown, the stipulation cannot be invoked by the party through whom the failure has occurred. In the present case it is evident that the stipulation was for the sole benefit of the appellants. By obtaining it they were relieved from paying the costs of the appeal, as well as the expenses of printing the transcript. On the other hand, unless there should be some decision by this court in the case of Hartshorne v. McMullen by which a rule should be laid down for guidance in the other cases, the respondent gained nothing whatever, and was in reality deprived of advantages which but for the stipulation he would have enjoyed. The actions were brought for the purpose of removing a cloud from the title of the respective plaintiffs to certain land in San Francisco, caused by an adverse claim of the appellants thereto, and involved the same questions of law and fact. Judgment had been rendered in the court below in favor of the plaintiffs in the several actions, and the defendants had appealed from each of those judgments. By virtue of these appeals the operative effect of the judgments was suspended, and the adverse claim of the defendants left undetermined. The respondents were therefore deprived of the benefit of their judgment pending this appeal, and the cloud was left upon their title to the land involved in the action. The respondent would naturally be desirous of having the judgment become final at as early a day as possible, and without this stipulation would have realized this desire at the same time with the decision in the other case. The dismissal of the appeal before its presentation to this court, and the consequent failure on the part of the appellants to procure a decision of this court upon the matters in controversy, deprived the respondent of the benefit of having his judgment become final, and left it in the same condition in which it was at the time the stipulation was given, so that he failed to receive any of the benefit offered to him as the consideration for making the stipulation. We hold, therefore, that, inasmuch as the consideration for the stipulation has failed, it cannot be invoked as binding upon the respondent, and that he is entitled to have the appeal herein dismissed, and it is so ordered.

JUDGMENT—AMENDMENT—EXCUSABLE NEGLIGENCE.

Before the court's decision in a suit for divorce plaintiff entered into a stipulation to pay to defendant, whatever the decision might be, $1,000 in consideration of the release by defendant of all claims to plaintiff's property. Before judgment defendant, through her attorney, presented the stipulation to the judge in chambers, and asked that it be incorporated in the judgment, which request was refused by the judge. Judgment was entered for plaintiff. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused, but made no further request to have the stipulation included in the judgment. Held, that the omission of the stipulation from the judgment was a matter for which a remedy should have been sought on the motion for a new trial, or by appeal, and the court erred in subsequently amending the judgment to include it, on defendant's motion, on the ground that the omission was through inadvertence and excusable neglect.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

W. N. Barrows and J. F. Wendell, for appellant. M. L. G. O'Brien, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. A decree of divorce was rendered in this action February 6, 1888, in favor of the plaintiff, upon the ground of cruelty on the part of the defendant, and was entered of record February 8, 1888. It was alleged in the complaint that there was no community property, and that certain real estate described therein was the separate property of the plaintiff. In the decree it is recited "that all of the material allegations of the complaint are true, and all of the allegations of defendant's answer and cross-complaint are untrue, except those particulars wherein they corroborate the allegations of the complaint;" and, after decreeing a dissolution of the marriage, the court set apart and awarded to the plaintiff the said real estate "absolutely free and clear of all rights therein on the part of the defendant." February 16, 1888, the defendant served and filed her notice of intention to move for a new trial, and her statement on said motion was settled and filed June 27th. August 24, 1888, the court made and entered an order denying a new trial. Thereafter, on the 21st of November, 1888, defendant gave notice to the plaintiff of her intention to move the court for an order amending the judgment "so as to insert therein a provision awarding to the defendant the sum of $1,000, and requiring the plaintiff to pay the same as by him stipulated and agreed by written instrument, dated February 6, 1888," and stated in her notice that said motion would be made "on the grounds that said judgment was taken, made, and entered against her through her mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect," and upon the further ground "that the same was not made a part of said decision, judgment, and decree through the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect of defendant and her attorneys." Affidavits and oral testimony were presented to the court in support of the motion, and in opposition thereto; and after hearing the same the court, on the 29th of March, 1889, made the following order: "On motion of M. L. G. O'Brien, attorney for defendant herein, notice thereof having been duly served on plaintiff's counsel, and after hearing thereon, it is hereby ordered that the decree heretofore made and entered herein be, and the same is hereby, modified, as follows, to-wit: The following clause is hereby added to said decree:

Plaintiff is further ordered to pay to defendant the sum of $1,000, as by him stipulated herein, said stipulation having been signed previous to the entering of judgment in said cause. March 29, 1889. WALTER H. LEVY, Judge." From this order the plaintiff has appealed.

It appears from the bill of exceptions that after the trial of the cause, and its submission to the court for decision, the parties by their attorneys entered into the following stipulation: "It is hereby stipulated and agreed that the plaintiff in the above-entitled action will pay to the defendant therein the sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars in full satisfaction of all right and claim of every kind whatever that said defendant has or claims to have in that certain real property described in plaintiff's complaint herein, and also in full satisfaction and release of all claims against said plaintiff for support or otherwise. Said sum of $1,000 shall be paid to the defendant as soon as said defendant shall execute proper conveyance of her interest in, abandon homestead upon, and move out of said property. This agreement shall not be in any way affected by the decision in said action, but may be enforced by the court in the event of a divorce being granted to either party. W. H. BARROWS, Attorney for Plaintiff. GUSTAVE TOUCHARD, Jr., Attorney for Defendant."

After the stipulation had been signed by the attorneys for the respective parties, and before the decision of the cause, it was presented by them to the judge at his chambers, with the request that he would incorporate its provisions into the decree. The judge, however, declined to do so, upon the ground that, as he had no power or jurisdiction to award the defendant any of the plaintiff's separate property, he could not give any effect to the stipulation in the judgment that he might render. Thereupon, at the request of the defendant's attorney, the plaintiff's attorney caused the plaintiff himself to sign the stipulation in the following form: "I hereby consent to the above agreement, and ratify the same. MICHAEL EGAN. February 6, 1888." After having been thus ratified by the plaintiff, the stipulation was delivered to the defendant's attorney, but was never filed in the action. It also appears that the stipulation was fully explained to the defendant before its execution, and that it was made upon the understanding that it was a settlement of all property rights between the parties, and that, whatever might be the decision of the court in the cause, no appeal or motion for a new trial should be made. After the decision in the cause had been rendered, the defendant repudiated the stipulation, and, having employed another attorney, made her motion for a new trial, which was denied, as above stated, and thereafter she made the foregoing motion for an amendment to the judgment.

Section 473, Code Civil Proc., provides that the court may, "upon such terms as may be just, relieve a party, or his legal representative, from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, provided that application therefor be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after such judgment, order, or proceeding was taken." Inasmuch as the motion in the present case was made more than six months after the judgment was entered, the court had no jurisdiction under this section of the Code to order the judgment to be amended. The appellant, however, contends that, inasmuch as every court has an inherent power to correct its records at any time so as to enable them to speak the truth, the court was authorized to grant the motion.

In the present case, however, it cannot be claimed that the judgment was taken against the defendant through any mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Before it was rendered her attorney had presented the stipulation to the judge, with the request that he give effect to it in the judgment, and, upon being informed by the judge that he could not do so, caused it to be signed by the plaintiff in person, presumably for the purpose of having a personal obligation against him for the amount which had been agreed upon as the sum to be paid by him in settlement of all property differences between him and the defendant. Moreover, the defendant, after the entry of the judgment, made a motion for a new trial in the action. Upon this motion she had an opportunity to present to the court any surprise or excusable neglect on her part as a ground for granting her a new trial; and, if the court had been satisfied that such was the fact, her motion would have been granted. So, too, if the court had rendered its decision without sufficiently providing for her support, or if in making its decision it had failed to give to the stipulation such weight as in her opinion it should have received, she could have presented these facts as other reasons why a new trial should have been granted. In making her motion it was incumbent upon her to present to the court all the grounds upon which she had a right to have it granted. After a motion for a new trial in a cause has been denied by the court, a party is not at liberty to make a second motion therefor, either upon any grounds on which the court has once denied it, or upon any grounds which might have been presented in the first instance. The doctrine of res adjudicata applies to a decision of a motion for a new trial as fully as to the judgment in the cause. Neither can a party under the form of a motion to amend the judgment obtain relief which, if proper to be granted under any circumstances, should have been sought through a motion for a new trial. Courts have the power at all times to allow amendments to judgments for the purpose of having the judgment as entered express that which was rendered, so that the record will contain the actual decision of the court; and such amendments can be made after the expiration of six months from the entry of the judgment. Where the clerk fails to enter judgment as it was pronounced, the court has always the power to correct the matter, and order the proper entry to be made. Clerical mis-prisions can be corrected at any time by an order of the court, but judicial errors can be remedied only through a motion for a new trial or on appeal. Freem. Judgm. § 70; Forquer v. Forquer, 19 Ill. 68; Insurance Co. v. McCormick, 20 Wis. 265; Thompson v. Thompson, 73 Wis. 84, 40 N. W. Rep. 671; McLean v. Stewart, 14 Hun, 472. It clearly appears in the present case that the matter contained in the amendment made by the order appealed from was not omitted from the judgment by reason of any neglect of the clerk in recording the same, but was intentionally excluded therefrom by the court itself at the time it rendered the judgment. If it should be admitted that the court ought to have included the provisions of this stipulation in its decree, its failure to do so was an error resulting either from a misconception of the law applicable to the facts before it, or from a failure to give sufficient consideration to those facts. In either case it was an error of law committed at the trial, which the defendant should have sought to remedy through her motion for a new trial. The order appealed from is reversed.

RAYNER et al. v. JONES et al. (No. 9,021.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1891.)

CONTRACTS—BREACH—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—NEW TRIAL.

1. Where notice of a motion for a new trial is served and filed in due time, the court should either grant or deny it, though the judgment has been appealed from before the hearing on the motion; and, if the motion is dismissed, the appeal will be considered as an appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

2. Plaintiffs conveyed certain land to defendants, and took from them an undertaking conditioned that they should by a certain time furnish plaintiffs with Texas land-warrants for 3,200 acres of land. In an action on the undertaking for defendants' failure to furnish the warrants, the court found that, at and after the time for their delivery, warrants could have been readily obtained for $47.50 each, locatable on 640 acres. Held, that the measure of damages was the value of the warrants, ($237.50,) and not the difference between the value of the land conveyed by plaintiffs to defendants, and the liens thereon, assumed by defendants as part of the purchase money.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

W. H. H. Hart, for appellants. Wal. J. Tuska and P. J. Morgan, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. The complaint filed in this action is in this language: "Plaintiffs above named, complaining of defendants above named, for cause of complaint aver and allege: That on, to-wit, the 8th day of February, 1881, at, to-wit, the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, the said defendants, for a valid and valuable consideration, made and executed their undertaking in writing, a copy whereof is hereto annexed and made a part of this complaint; that in and by the terms of said undertaking it is stipulated and expressed that defendant Jones

(the principal in said undertaking) agrees to furnish to these plaintiffs certain Texas land-warrants for three thousand two hundred (3,200) acres of land; said warrants to be of the nature and character more particularly specified in said undertaking, (and to be deposited by said defendant Jones on or before the 1st day of April, A. D. 1881, at the banking-house of John Bremon, in the city of Austin, in said state of Texas.) That the condition therein specified, to-wit, the deposit of said Texas land-warrants, has not been fulfilled and carried out by said defendant Jones, or by any of or either of said defendants, and said defendant Jones has wholly failed and neglected to comply with the said condition on or before said 1st day of April, 1881, or at any time, and still fails and neglects to comply with the same. That by reason of the neglect and refusal of said defendant Jones to comply with the condition of said undertaking, as aforesaid, there was and became due on, to-wit, the 2d day of April, A. D. 1881, to these plaintiffs from these defendants, under and by the terms of said undertaking, the sum of $4,800, which sum, or any part thereof, the said defendants then, and ever since then, have wholly failed and refused to pay, and still so fail, neglect, and refuse. Wherefore plaintiffs pray for judgment against said defendants in the sum of $4,800, and for their costs." The bond mentioned therein is as follows: Know all men by these presents, that we, C. J. Jones, and J. C. Fisk and J. C. Beatty as sureties, parties of the first part, are held and firmly bound unto Wm. Rayner and Maggie Rayner, his wife, of the city of San Francisco, state of California, party of the second part, in the sum of four thousand eight hundred ($4,800) dollars, gold coin of the United States of America, to be paid to the executors, administrators, or assigns, for which payment well and truly to be made we bind ourselves, heirs, executors, administrators, firmly by these presents. Sealed with our seals, and dated the eighth day of February, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one. The condition of the above obligation is such that, whereas, the party of the first part has sold to the party of the second part Texas land-warrants for three thousand two hundred (3,200) acres, and has received payment in full, except three hundred and fifteen ($315) dollars, which is secured by promissory note made and executed by Wm. Rayner and Maggie Rayner, his wife: Now, the party of the first part agrees to furnish Texas land-warrants for the above number of acres; said warrants to be of such a series that they can be located upon any of the unlocated public lands of the state of Texas; said warrants to be free from all liens, incumbrances, and transfer fees, and deposited with the banking-house of John Bremon, in the city of Austin and state of Texas, and to be held by him until the said note of three hundred and fifteen ($315) dollars is paid. The said warrants and note to be deposited by the party of the first part on or before the first day of April, A. D. 1881, at said banking-house, and the said Rayner to have any time thereafter, and before the first day of January, A. D. 1882, to pay said note, and secure the transfer of said warrants. Now, if the said Jones shall well and truly deliver said warrants on or before the first day of April, A. D. 1881, then the above obligation to be void; otherwise, to remain in full force and virtue." A demurrer was interposed to the complaint, and overruled. A motion for a nonsuit was made, and denied. The cause was then tried, and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiffs in the sum of $1,350 and costs.

A notice of motion for a new trial was served and filed in due season, and upon the hearing of the motion the trial court dismissed it, upon the theory, evidently, that, as the judgment made and entered had been appealed from when the motion for a new trial came on for hearing, the court below had lost jurisdiction to determine it. This view of the matter is untenable, and the court should have heard the motion, and either granted or denied it, upon the bill of exceptions presented, which is a part of the record here on the appeal from the order of dismissal; the action of the court being, in legal effect, a denial of the motion for a new trial. Section 946, Code Civil Proc.; Naglee v. Spencer, 60 Cal. 10; Hayne, New Trials, § 2, p. 26; Carpentier v. Williamson, 25 Cal. 167, 168; Hayne, New Trials, p. 494; Chase v. Evoy, 58 Cal. 352. The case, then, is to be considered here as on appeal from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. As against the demurrer as filed, we think the complaint sufficient, although a special demurrer to it, as not properly alleging damages suffered, might have been sustained. After making certain findings of fact based upon evidence adduced on the trial, the court reached the conclusion of law that the plaintiffs should recover "the value of equity, over and above the mortgage, on the real estate in San Francisco, conveyed by the plaintiffs to defendant Jones, which was $1,000; also the value of the San Diego lot, amounting to $350,—making, in all, $1,350,—with interest from commencement of the suit." And the judgment of the court rendered thereupon went upon the idea that Jones and his sureties were responsible to the plaintiffs, by the terms of this bond, for the non-delivery of the warrants, to the extent of the difference between the value of certain real estate not mentioned or referred to in the bond sold and conveyed to defendant Jones, and the mortgage thereon, made before that time in favor of other parties, which Jones had assumed to pay as a part of the purchase price. This contract did not assume to fix the amount of damage in anticipation of a breach of the obligation of the instrument, as condemned by section 1670 of the Civil Code; nor does it appear from it, or the evidence, that it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage as allowed by section 1671 of the Civil Code.

The court below, as we think, improperly admitted evidence against the objection of the defendants, and made findings thereon upon the theory that the measure of damages recoverable for the failure to deliver the warrants at the time and place specified in the bond was the difference between the value of certain real property which the plaintiffs had sold and deeded to the defendant Jones (which was the origin of the execution of the bond) and the amount of a certain mortgage debt existing as against a portion of the property conveyed; that is, the sum of $1,350. It is found, upon sufficient proof, in the twelfth and thirteenth findings of fact: "That on the 1st day of April, A. D. 1881, and for several months thereafter, the market value of land-warrants specified in finding 7th have been $47.50 each at Austin, Texas, and readily obtainable in and on the market at said city of Austin, Texas, at said price of $47.50 each, on said 1st day of April, A. D. 1881, and at any time for and during the several months thereafter, if they had seen fit so to do." "That said warrants set out in finding No. 7 are of the same class and kind that the defendant Jones was to deliver to the plaintiffs, under the terms of said undertaking, and that they are and were free from all liens and incumbrances and transfer fees, and are and were of the character to be delivered by said Jones to said plaintiffs; that each warrant is locatable on 640 acres of land, on the conditions in said warrant specified." It would appear, therefore, that the measure of damages recoverable in the action was the value of the warrants as specified in the twelfth finding, viz., $237.50, with legal interest on same from the time when they should have been deposited according to the terms of the bond, subject to a reduction of $315 for amount due on the note. As it appears that the trial court erroneously measured the damages by a different rule, to the manifest prejudice of the appellants, the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

SMITH v. DAVIS et al. (No. 13,319.)

TRUSTS—ENFORCEMENT—JURISDICTION—PARTIES.

1. Where a deed of trust of land in another state is executed in California by persons residing there, stipulating that, if the trustee named therein cannot act, a court of competent jurisdiction may appoint a new trustee, a court of California, having jurisdiction of the parties, may appoint a new trustee, and direct him to carry out the trust.

2. A deed of trust purporting to be signed by the trustee is not affected by his failure to sign it, if his signature formed no element of the consideration for the signatures of the other parties, and the deed expressly provides that it shall be binding regardless of the trustee.

3. A judgment rendered in one state appointing a trustee to enforce a trust for the conveyance of land situated in another state will not be reversed on the ground that a third person, to whom the donor conveyed the land after his execution of the deed, was not made a party, if it does not affirmatively appear that such party was a resident of the state in which the court had jurisdiction.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Whittemore & Sears and James G. Maguire, for appellants. James L. Crittenden, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Respondent filed his complaint in equity to appoint a trustee, and to have the execution of a trust relating to certain lands in Washington Territory decreed. The complaint filed May 23, 1885, alleges that on July 27, 1881, said Smith and Davis executed and delivered each to the other a certain document, purporting to be an "indenture tripartite," whereby they purported to convey said land to the London & San Francisco Bank, Limited, (a corporation) in trust for certain specified purposes; that by the terms of its charter said bank was incapable of taking the title sought to be conveyed by the indenture, and was without power to act as trustee in the indenture specified; that defendant Davis refused to regard and carry out the conditions of the indenture; and plaintiff asks that the court appoint a trustee, and that the said trustee be directed to execute the trusts therein contained. Defendants filed a general demurrer, which was overruled, when defendant Davis answered, setting out, among other things, that after the filing of the complaint in this action he sold and transferred all his interest and right in the land described to one Margaret H. McDonald, and that since that time he has had no interest in and to said real estate. The defendant bank answered that it had no legal capacity to take the title sought to be conveyed; never consented to act as trustee, and refused so to act. The findings of the court are in consonance with the allegations of the complaint; and the court also found that defendant Davis had transferred his interest as set forth in his answer. This appeal is from the judgment appointing a trustee, and directing an execution of the trust.

Appellants insist that the court had no jurisdiction or authority to appoint or constitute a trustee of land lying outside of the territorial limits of the state of California. There is no question as to the general principle of law that in respect to realty every attempt of any foreign tribunal to found a jurisdiction over it must, from the very nature of the case, be utterly nugatory; for land is held by the laws of the country where it is situated, and the tribunals administering those laws are the proper forums in which titles to realty should be litigated. The effect of a court's decree is necessarily limited by the boundary lines of its jurisdiction. In the case of Lindley v. O'Reilly, 50 N. J. Law, 636, 15 Atl. Rep. 379, where a court of Pennsylvania adjudged a conveyance of land in New Jersey to be a mortgage, and canceled the same, all the parties living in Pennsylvania, the court said: "The decree cannot operate ex proprio vigore upon the lands in another jurisdiction to create, transfer, or vest a title. The courts of one state or country are without jurisdiction over title to lands in another state or country." While the rule is as above stated, yet there is another rule firmly established and of universal application, and it is: "In cases of fraud, trust, or contract, the jurisdiction of a court of chancery is upheld wherever the person be found, although lands in another state may be affected by the decree." In the case of Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 158, MARSHALL, C. J., said: "Was this cause, therefore, to be considered as involving a naked question of title,—was it, for example, a contest between Watts and Powell,—the jurisdiction of the circuit court of Kentucky would not be sustained. But where the question changes its character, where the defendant in the original action is liable to the plaintiff, either in consequence of contract, or as trustee, or as the holder of the legal title acquired by any species of mala fides practiced on the plaintiff, the principles of equity give a court jurisdiction wherever the person may be found; and the circumstance that a question of title may be involved in the inquiry, and may even constitute the essential point on which the case depends, does not seem sufficient to arrest that jurisdiction."

In Wimer v. Wimer, 82 Va. 901, we find this language of the court: "But, while this is true, it is undoubtedly well settled that, in cases of fraud, trust, or contract, courts of equity will, whenever jurisdiction over the parties has been acquired, administer full relief without regard to the nature or situation of the property in which the controversy had its origin, and even where the relief sought consists in a decree for the conveyance of property which lies beyond the control of the court, provided it can be reached by the exercise of its powers over the person, and the relief asked is of such nature as the court is capable of administering." Story quotes the following language of Lord KENYON, used in a case pending before him: "These cases clearly showing that, with regard to any contract made in equity between persons in this country, respecting lands in a foreign country, particularly in the British dominion, this court will hold the same jurisdiction as if they were situated in England." Story, Eq. Jur. § 1293. Referring to trusts, Story says: "If the proper parties are within the reach of the process of the court, it will be sufficient to justify the assertion of full jurisdiction over the subject in controversy." Barger v. Buckland, 28 Grat. 850, was a suit of creditors to subject to the payment of their claim lands of their debtor, situate in Virginia and West Virginia, which lands had been conveyed in trust to secure other debts. The trust was created in Virginia: the parties resided in Virginia, except the trustee, who resided in West Virginia, and who neglected or refused to carry out the trust. In Poindexter v. Burwell, 82 Va. 514, the court, in reviewing the decision in Barger v. Buckland, supra, says: "Upon default of payment, there being no trustee to execute the contract of the parties to sell the land and pay the debt, under the circumstances, the court, in order to perform the contract of the parties, and to fulfill its own maxim, that a trust shall not fail for want of a trustee, decreed that, unless the grantor should pay the debt within a prescribed period, then certain named persons should execute the trust by selling the land and applying the proceeds to the payment of the debt."

Upon principle, this case appears to be identical with the case at bar. If the London & San Francisco Bank had been competent to accept the trust, and had accepted it, and this plaintiff was here asking that the trustee execute the trust, there is no question but what a decree to that extent would be sustained by this court, for the authorities are universal to that effect. If the court has the power, and if it is its duty, to execute the trust, can it be deprived of that power and released from that duty because there is no trustee to carry out the mandate of the court? or, rather, is it not specially within the line of its duty to create an instrument whereby its decree may effect the true purpose and object intended? The decrees of courts of equity primarily and properly act in personam, and, at most, collaterally only in rem. If the parties are within the jurisdiction of the court, an injunction will be granted to stay proceedings in a suit in a foreign country. A trust will be enforced pertaining to realty, regardless of the situation of the property. Courts of equity have, as between the parties, reviewed the judgments of foreign courts, and even sales made under those judgments, when fraud or undue advantage was shown. A specific performance of a contract of sale of lands situated in a foreign country will be decreed in equity. These actions will be supported where the court has jurisdiction of the parties, and are familiar illustrations found in Story's Eq. Jur. § 1290 et seq. A decree to convey land lying in another state does not affect the title; it only operates upon the person who is to make the conveyance, and it is his act in making the deed that affects the title. This deed of trust was made and executed in San Francisco, Cal., by the plaintiff and defendant Davis, and was recorded in King county, Wash. T. It expressly provided that "the trusts hereby created shall not lapse or become void by reason of the failure or refusal of the party of the third part to accept or carry out the same;" and further provided that a new trustee should be appointed by the mutual consent of the parties, or by a court of competent jurisdiction, upon the happening of any of the foregoing contingencies. It is further provided that all the conditions and provisions of this agreement "shall apply to and be binding upon their heirs * * * or any other trustee that may be appointed in its place or stead." The defendant bank under its charter could not take the title to the realty, but the parties of the first and second part expressly guarded against such contingency defeating the trust provisions of the indenture by covenanting that, notwithstanding the happening of such event, the indenture should still remain in full force and effect as between themselves, and that a new trustee should be appointed to carry out the trusts, and that all the provisions and conditions of the agreement should apply to and be binding upon such trustee. There can be no question but that this indenture is still alive and in full force and effect as between the plaintiff and defendant Davis, for they expressly provided that such should be the fact.

Upon a careful reading of the decree of the court we find it simply appoints a trustee, and commands him to enforce the trust; there is nothing contained therein purporting or attempting to transfer title to or vest title in the trustee appointed by the court. If title to the Washington Territory realty does not vest in the trustee, then appellant is not injured, and his contention has no support. If the title to this realty does vest in the trustee, it must be by operation of law or by virtue of the contract of the parties, for the decree does not so provide, and does not purport ex proprio vigore to vest a title in the trustee Brittan. In this case the trust did not fail, as between the parties, by reason of the incapacity and refusal of the original trustee to act. "The assent of the trustee is not necessary to the validity of the trust-deed. He may refuse to act, be unable to comply with the statute, or die, and in such or similar cases a court of chancery will execute it." Furman v. Fisher, 4 Cold. 630. Field v. Arrowsmith, 39 Amer. Dec. 185, and note; Flint, Trusts, § 132. In Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs, 2 How. 188, Justice STORY said: "It is true that, if the trust be repugnant to or inconsistent with the proper purposes for which the corporation was created, that may furnish a ground why it may not be compellable to execute it, but that will furnish no ground to declare the trust itself void, if otherwise unexceptionable; but it will simply require a new trustee to be substituted by the proper court possessing equity jurisdiction to enforce and perfect the objects of the trust. This will be sufficiently obvious upon an examination of the authorities, but a single case may suffice. In Sonley v. Clock-Makers' Co., 1 Brown Ch. 81, there was a devise of freehold estate to the testator's wife for life, with remainder to his brother C. in tail male, with remainder to the Clock-Makers' Company in trust to sell for the benefit of testator's nephews and nieces. The devise, being to a corporation, was by the English statute of wills void, that statute prohibiting devises to corporations; and the question was whether, the devise being so void, the heir at law took beneficially or subject to the trust. Mr. Baron Eyre in his judgment said that, 'although the devises to the corporation be void at law, yet the trust is sufficiently created to fasten itself upon any estate the law may raise.' This is the ground upon which courts of equity have decreed in cases where no trustee is named."

The objection to the complaint that it is fatally defective in this: that it shows affirmatively that the indenture or deed of trust was intended to be signed by three parties, and was signed by only two,—cannot be sustained. The signature of the party of the third part formed no element of the consideration for the signature of the other two parties, and they expressly agreed that the indenture should be binding as between them, regardless of the third party.

The appellant insists that the judgment should be reversed because Margaret H. McDonald is not made a party defendant in this action. If said Margaret was a resident of the state of California when the answer was filed, we are at a loss to understand why she was not joined as a co-defendant, either upon the application of one of the parties or upon motion of the court. In order for appellant to successfully maintain his position he must show affirmative error, and in this case he has not shown by the record that she was a resident of the state of California, and therefore that the court had the power to order her joined as a defendant. We are not called upon to determine to what extent Margaret H. McDonald's interests have been adjudicated in this action. Respondent's position is that, owing to the fact she had notice of the recordation of the indenture in Washington Territory, and also purchased the land from appellant after the commencement of this action, that, therefore, she is bound in all respects by the judgment, to the same extent as if she were a party defendant. In this action no lis pendens was filed; indeed, it is quite difficult to see how or where one could have been filed to have had any vitality or effect. In this state the act of filing a complaint is no notice to the world of the matters contained therein, and, said Margaret having no actual or constructive notice of the proceedings at the time she purchased the realty, it is difficult to discern how she is in any worse position by reason of having purchased after the filing of the complaint than if she had purchased prior to that event. Again, the fact that she purchased with notice of the indenture of trust did not give the trial court the right of jurisdiction to litigate her title to the land. Appellant in making a deed to her undoubtedly repudiated the entire theory of trust, and she has probably bought and now holds in hostility to the trust; the question of her title is a matter to be hereafter considered in locus rei sitæ.

But, aside from all these considerations, how is the defendant injured by the fact of not having the company of this lady as a codefendant during the progress of the litigation? and, if her company, aid, and assistance were necessary to the best welfare of his interests in the cause, why did he not ask the court to have her joined with him? The court is expressly authorized by statute to make such order in a proper case. What is appellant's cause of complaint? If he has no interest in the subject-matter of this litigation, why did he not file a disclaimer in the lower court, and thus rid himself of the vexations of the law, and thereby escape a judgment against him for costs? If he has any interests which are affected by the judgment in this cause, he has had his day in court, and was held to be in the wrong. Why should he demand a new trial because a third party had interests which were not litigated? If the plaintiff has secured a judgment against the wrong party, he has done an idle thing, and his sins rest on his own head. We think the appellant should not be heard to insist upon a reversal of the judgment upon the last ground considered. Let the judgment be affirmed.

SMITH et al. v. BUTTNER. (No. 13,241.)

NEGLECT — DEFECTIVE PREMISES — PLEADING.

In an action for personal injuries, the complaint alleged that, while plaintiff was in possession of defendant's house as tenant, he raised it, and failed to provide safe or suitable means of exit therefrom; that, by reason of his negligence in failing to provide safe and proper means of exit, plaintiff, in attempting to descend to the ground from the house, fell, and was injured. Held, that the complaint did not state a cause of action, since it did not show whether the cause of the accident was a latent or patent defect.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Joseph Leggett, for appellants. Otto Tum Suden, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is on the judgment roll from a judgment against the plaintiffs on the pleadings. The plaintiffs are husband and wife, and the action is brought to recover damages for injuries received by the wife. Plaintiffs were occupying a house belonging to defendant as a residence, being his tenants from month to month. The complaint shows that some time prior to June, 1887, while plaintiffs were in possession as tenants, defendant caused the dwelling-house to be raised some six or seven feet; that plaintiffs continued to reside in the house after it had been raised, and to pay rent to defendant as before; that after raising the house, and while plaintiffs and their family were living in it, defendant wholly failed and neglected to provide any safe and proper means of entrance to or egress from the house, and, "by reason of the negligence and failure of defendant to provide safe, suitable, or proper means of exit from said house, said plaintiff Dora Smith, on said 30th day of June, 1887, in endeavoring to descend from said house to the ground, for a proper and lawful purpose, while in the exercise of due care and diligence, and without any fault or negligence on her part, fell to the ground, and dislocated her left wrist, and broke the bone of her left arm near the wrist, and sustained other severe and painful injuries," etc. To this complaint the defendant answered, specifically denying every allegation, except as to the relation of landlord and tenant. A jury being impaneled for the trial of the cause, plaintiff Dora was sworn as a witness, and her testimony taken. Thereupon counsel for the defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings, and the motion was granted.

It is manifest from the the complaint that the injury to plaintiff Dora did not occur while the work of raising the house was in progress. The complaint fails to show how long before the injury it was since defendant had been engaged in the work, but it is averred that they continued to occupy the house after it had been raised, and paid rent as before, and that the injury occurred after. The negligence consisted simply in failing to provide a safe, proper, and suitable means of entrance to or egress from the house, and it is alleged that this negligence caused plaintiff to fall. But no fact is averred which shows that such negligence had anything to do with the accident. How did it cause her to fall? It may have been because defendant neglected to provide any means of egress whatever, or through some patent defect in the plan of the contrivance, whatever it was. In such case plaintiff could not recover in this action. Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173, 18 Pac. Rep. 260. It may have been, consistently with this general statement, because the structure was insufficiently secured, and therefore gave way, although properly used. In such case, perhaps, plaintiffs might recover. Such complaint does not state the facts constituting plaintiffs' cause of action. It is well settled that negligence may be charged in general terms; that is, what was done being stated, it is sufficient to say it was negligently done, without stating the particular omission which rendered the act negligent. But it must appear from the facts averred that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury. To illustrate: Suppose a plaintiff injured by the falling of a sign, negligently and insecurely fastened by defendant. It would not suffice for him to allege the negligence in hanging the sign; that plaintiff, in lawfully and without negligence passing under it, was thrown down and injured through such negligence. This would be a mere assertion of the cause. It would be necessary to show that the sign fell upon him in consequence of such negligence, thereby causing his injury. Such a complaint would, however, be less objectionable than this now under consideration, for there would be but one conceivable way in which the injury could be supposed to result from the negligence; but, as here, that the negligence was the cause would rest upon the naked assertion as to causality, and would not appear through the statement of a fact. In construing pleadings before judgment, it is presumed the pleader has stated his case in the most favorable manner to himself possible. As we have seen, it is entirely consistent with the allegations of this complaint to suppose the injury occurred because defendant neglected to provide any mode of egress whatever. We are not at liberty to suppose anything gave way through the latent insecurity of the structure, for it is not so alleged. The presumption is, therefore, that the accident arose from a patent defect, and that the pleader has failed to make a more specific statement, because such a statement would have weakened his case. We think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

DORE v. THORNBURGH. (No. 13,477.)

ACTION ON FOREIGN JUDGMENT—PLEADING—LIMITATIONS.

1. A complaint, in an action on a judgment given against defendant in a foreign court, which alleges that, in the action in which the judgment was obtained, plaintiffs signed final judgment for £3,920, "which said judgment was then and there duly given, made, and entered," is not demurrable on the ground that it does not aver that the court ever made or gave the judgment.

2. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 339, requiring to be brought within two years an action upon a contract, obligation, or liability, founded upon an instrument of writing "executed" out of the state, does not apply to actions on a foreign judgment, but such action is within section 343, providing that "an action for relief not hereinbefore provided for must be brought within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued."

Commissioners' decision. Department 2.
Doyle, Galpin & Zeigler, for appellants.
T. I. Bergia, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. Appeal from a judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. This action was commenced by plaintiff on the 4th day of October, 1888, to recover upon a judgment given against the defendant on the 9th day of May, 1885, in the queens' bench division of the high court of justice in England. The complaint is demurred to on the grounds: (1) That it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (2) that the alleged cause of action is barred by the provisions of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer was sustained by the court below, and, upon plaintiff failing to amend the complaint, judgment final was rendered in favor of defendant. The appeal is taken upon the judgment roll alone.

The objection raised under the first ground of demurrer—that there is no averment in the complaint that the court ever made or gave the alleged judgment—is not well founded. The complaint alleges "that thereafter, to-wit, upon the 9th day of May, 1885, the said plaintiffs signed final judgment in the said action for the said sum of £3,920, in accordance with the terms of the said order, and which said judgment was then and there duly given, made, and entered." This allegation we think sufficient, as against a general demurrer.

Under the second ground of demurrer, the question presented for our determination is whether this action, which is founded upon a judgment rendered by an English tribunal, is barred by the statute of limitations within two years. Subdivision 1, § 339, Code Civil Proc., upon which respondent relies in support of her contention that the action is barred within that time, reads as follows: "An action upon a contract, obligation, or liability, not founded upon an instrument of writing, or founded upon an instrument of writing executed out of the state." That the judgment herein is not such an instrument in writing (Patten v. Ray, 4 Cal. 287) is evident from the use here made of the word "executed," which must be construed to apply to the act of the party sought to be charged. But it is a contract in writing in the full sense of the term "contract or obligation," as employed by our statute, (Stuart v. Lander, 16 Cal. 375; Reed v. Eldredge, 27 Cal. 346; Wallace v. Eldredge, Id. 498; Bean v. Loryea, 81 Cal. 152, 22 Pac. Rep. 513;) and, as such, is not embraced in the two-years limitation prescribed by the provisions of that subdivision of the section. Section 343, Code Civil Proc., ("An action for relief not hereinbefore provided for must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued,") was construed by this court in Piller v. Railroad Co., 52 Cal. 42, (which was an action for damages for injuries caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant,) to apply "to all suits in equity not directly of concurrent cognizance in law and equity," and that the two-years limitation found in the first clause of the first subdivision of section 339 is applicable to all actions at law not specifically mentioned in other portions of the statute." In Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 269, 10 Pac. Rep. 674, which was an action for equitable relief, its meaning was extended so as to embrace "all suits in equity as well as at law." And, while we do not think that the construction put upon this section was necessary to the decision of either case, we are satisfied with the reasoning and the conclusion reached in the latter, and regard it as the correct interpretation of the intention of the legislature as there expressed.

We are therefore of the opinion that this action, which is not specifically provided for by any other section of the statute of limitations, falls within the meaning of section 343; and, as it was commenced within the period of time therein prescribed, it follows that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer. We advise that the judgment be reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

ALLEN v. ALLEN et al. (No. 13,005.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1891.)

MORTGAGES—REDEMPTION—CONFLICT OF LAWS—LIMITATIONS—PLEADING.

1. Appellant caused land in California to be conveyed absolutely to respondents as security for a loan made in New York, of which state all were residents. After respondents' right to sue for the money loaned was barred in New York, appellant sued in California to redeem. Held that, as respondents' right of action for the loan was barred in New York, a suit by them to foreclose the mortgage was barred in California, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 361, which provides that when a cause of action has arisen in another state, and by the laws thereof an action cannot be maintained by reason of the lapse of time, an action cannot be maintained against him in California, except in favor of one who has been a citizen of California. The right to foreclose being barred in California, the right to redeem was barred also.

2. The time for redemption from a mortgage is fixed by the laws in force at the time the mortgage is given, and cannot be extended by subsequent legislation.

3. Persons entering into a contract, relying on a decision of the supreme court, are bound in the performance thereof by the law as declared by a subsequent decision of the same court overruling the former decision as erroneous.

4. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 458, providing that in pleading the statute of limitations it is not necessary to state the facts showing the defense, but it may be generally stated that the cause of action is barred by a certain section of the Code, and, if such allegation be controverted, the party pleading must establish the facts showing the bar, a plea of the statute of limitations to a cause of action which arose in another state need not allege facts to show that the cause of action arose in that state, and under the laws of that state is barred by the statute of limitations.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; J. J. DE HAVEN, Judge.

J. N. Gillett and E. W. Wilson, (Stanley, Stoney & Hayes, of counsel,) for appellant. Chamberlin & McGowan and S. M. Buck, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. Appellant received from the state a certificate of purchase for the lands described in the complaint on March 28, 1860, and in August following assigned the same to one Collins to secure an indebtedness of $30, and thereafter a patent was issued from the state to Collins. Appellant paid Collins the amount due him; and the latter, by request of appellant, conveyed the land to John H. Allen, who paid no consideration therefor. Respondents thereafter advanced to the appellant certain sums of money for the payment of taxes which had become delinquent, and, to secure the repayment to them of said sums the appellant, on June 12, 1869, caused said John H. Allen to convey the lands to them as security for the repayment of the money they had advanced. This deed was absolute in form. John H. Allen received no consideration for the deed. Neither of the parties has ever been in actual possession of the land. The contract of loan was oral, and no time was fixed in which appellant was to make repayment. Plaintiff never made any demand for an accounting, or any offer to redeem, prior to the year 1885, and defendants did not prior to that time assert any claim of title to the lands adverse to plaintiff's right to a reconveyance upon payment of the indebtedness. This action was commenced March 15, 1887. The court below rendered judgment for the defendants. A motion for a new trial was denied, and plaintiff appealed from the order, and from the judgment.

1. The court below held that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 361, Code Civil Proc. That section provides: "When a cause of action has arisen in another state or in a foreign country, and by the laws thereof an action thereon cannot be maintained against a person by reason of the lapse of time, an action thereon shall not be maintained against him in this state, except in favor of one who has been a citizen of this state, and who has held the cause of action from the time it accrued." It is claimed by appellant that under that section it was incumbent on respondents to set out the facts upon which they rely, to show that the cause of action arose in the state of New York, and that under the laws of that state it was barred by the statute of limitations. A complete answer to this contention is found in section 458, Id., which provides: "In pleading the statute of limitations, it is not necessary to state the facts showing the defense, but it may be generally stated that the cause of action is barred by the provisions of section [giving the number of the section and subdivision thereof, if it is so divided, relied upon] of the Code of Civil Procedure; and, if such allegation be controverted, the party pleading must establish, on the trial, the facts showing that the cause of action is so barred." The rule thus established was intended to simplify the form of pleading such defenses, and is one which the court cannot depart from on a conjecture that the legislature intended to except from its operation cases of this kind. The contract was made in New York, where all the parties resided, and neither of them was in this state thereafter until the year 1885; and it is claimed by appellant that under sections 346, 351, Id., and 2903, Civil Code, the respondents' right to foreclose their mortgage was not barred at the date of the commencement of this action; that appellant remained the equitable owner of the property, and his right to redeem was kept alive. Those sections read as follows: "Sec. 346. An action to redeem a mortgage of real property, with or without an account of rents and profits, may be brought by the mortgagor, or those claiming under him, against the mortgagee in possession, or those claiming under him, unless he or they have continuously maintained an adverse possession of the mortgaged premises for five years after breach of some condition of the mortgage." "Sec. 351. If, when the cause of action accrues against a person, he is out of the state, the action may be commenced within the term herein limited after his return to the state; and if, after the cause of action accrues, he departs from the state, the time of his absence is not part of the time limited for the commencement of the action." "Sec. 2903. Every person, having an interest in property subject to a lien, has a right to redeem it from the lien at any time after the claim is due, and before his right of redemption is foreclosed." Civil Code. In support of this contention, counsel for appellant say, in substance: "Respondents' action to foreclose could have been brought only in this state. The word 'return,' as employed in section 351, supra, is applicable to persons coming from abroad, as well as to citizens who have left the state for a temporary purpose, and returned thereto. The statute had not commenced to run in 1885, because the respondents had never been in the actual occupancy of the premises. Section 2903, Civil Code, and section 346, Code Civil Proc., provided rules of limitation different from those which had previously been followed by the courts of this state, and those new rules are applicable to mortgages made before, as well as those made after, the adoption of the Codes, unless the remedy was extinguished at the time the Codes took effect. Respondents were not only mortgagees, but trustees, of appellant; and the statute could not commence to run in their favor until an offer to redeem was made by appellant. There could be no laches on the part of appellant, because the legal title remained in him, and no adverse claim was made by respondents." These contentions cannot be lightly passed over. They deserve to receive, and they have received, our careful consideration.

In the solution of the question presented as to the effect of the deed, we must read as a part of the contract the laws of this state existing at the time the contract was made, (Klinck v. Price, 4 W. Va. 4; U. S. v. Crosby, 7 Cranch, 115,) although the nature and construction of the contract of loan, which was made in New York, are determined by the laws of the latter state, (De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. 367.) It is true, an action to foreclose must be brought where the property is situated; but it does not follow that respondents could have maintained an action to foreclose at the time this suit was commenced. Both parties resided in the state of New York, where the contract was made, and either could have maintained an action there on the contract. The plaintiff could have enforced his right to redeem, and the defendants could have recovered the amount for which they held the land as security. Montgomery v. Spect, 55 Cal. 352; Kanawha Coal Co. v. Kanawha & O. Coal Co., 7 Blatch. 415; Gardner v. Ogden, 22 N. Y. 327; Williams v. Fitzhugh, 37 N. Y. 444. In this state, when an action on a promissory note, secured by mortgage of the same date upon real property, is barred by the statute of limitations, the mortgagee has no remedy upon the mortgage. Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482; Heinlin v. Castro, 22 Cal. 100. The debt is regarded as the principal, and the mortgage as a mere incident. When the debt is barred, the remedy upon the mortgage is also barred. McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 495. If, therefore, respondents could not maintain an action in New York for the recovery of the money due, they could not maintain an action in this state to foreclose the mortgage. Section 361, Code Civil Proc. At the time the conveyance was made by John H. Allen to the respondents, a deed absolute in form, but intended as a mortgage in this state, transferred the legal title, and there was left in the person executing it a mere equity of redemption; and whenever the debt, to secure which the deed was made, became barred by the statute of limitations, the right to redeem was barred. Hughes v. Davis, 40 Cal. 117; Espinosa v. Gregory, Id. 58. The right to redeem and the right of the creditor to sue on a contract were reciprocal. Where one was lost, the other could not be enforced. Cunningham v. Hawkins, 24 Cal. 403; Arrington v. Liscom, 34 Cal. 366; Grattan v. Wiggins, 23

Cal. 35. No subsequent legislation could change the rights or obligations of the parties, or extend the time for action. The right and time to redeem were fixed by the laws in force at that time. Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. 316; Walker v. Whitehead, 16 Wall. 318; Heyward v. Judd, 4 Minn. 483, (Gil. 375;) Phinney v. Phinney, 81 Me. 450, 17 Atl. Rep. 405. Under the decisions just cited, section 346, Code Civil Proc., is inapplicable, because it would effect a material change in the rights and obligations of the parties. Phinney v. Phinney, 81 Me. 450, 17 Atl. Rep. 405; Heyward v. Judd, 4 Minn. 483, (Gil. 375.) And for the same reason Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 307, 13 Pac. Rep. 866, and other and later cases declaring the rule stated in that section are not in point. They are based upon that section of the Code, and it was passed posterior to the time the parties entered into the contract.

That plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the laws of New York at the time this action was commenced there can be no doubt; and it is immaterial whether the court below based its conclusion upon the proper section of the statute of limitations of that state or not. It was shown that both of the parties resided in the state of New York for 16 years after the contract was entered into before they came to this state, and during that time no action was taken by either of them to put the other in default; and, if it be conceded that the section of the statute of New York which was put in evidence has no bearing upon the question at issue, it must be presumed that the laws of that state are the same as our own. Marsters v. Lash, 61 Cal. 624; Tolman v. Smith, (Cal.) 24 Pac. Rep. 744; Osborn v. Blackburn, (Wis.) 47 N. W. Rep. 175.

It is claimed that at the time the contract was entered into it was the established rule in this state that a conveyance absolute in form, but intended merely as security, did not pass the legal title to the grantee. It is true, there had been decisions to that effect; but, in the year following, it was held (Espinosa v. Gregory, and Hughes v. Davis, supra) that a deed absolute in form, intended as a mortgage, did convey the legal title. These decisions did not change the law; they simply declared what was the law. Every one is conclusively presumed to know the law, although the ablest courts in the land often find great difficulty and labor in finally determining what the law is. The courts cannot make or repeal a law. "They can say what a law means; and if, afterwards, they see that they have made a mistake, they can correct their error by an overruling of a former decision; the consequence of which overruling is that the blunder is thenceforward deemed never to have been law." Bish. Cont. § 569; Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 649. It has been held here that, although it appears the parties have entered into a contract relying upon a previous decision of the supreme court, they will not be relieved from the obligations thereof because of a subsequent decision by the same court overruling the former one, and declaring a different rule upon the same subject. Kenyon

v. Welty, 20 Cal. 637. There are some cases in which the supreme court of the United States has held that the construction given to a statute by the highest tribunal in the state, whether sound or not, must be taken as correct, so far as contracts made under the act are concerned, and no subsequent decision altering the construction can impair their validity. The construction becomes a part of the statute; as much so as if it were an amendment made by the legislature. Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175; Louisiana v. Pilsbury, 105 U. S. 294; Douglass v. Pike, 101 U. S. 677; Thomson v. Lee, 3 Wall. 327. These cases, however, all involved the question as to the validity of negotiable securities, and in one of them a distinction is made between cases of that kind and cases like the one at bar in which the court had previously applied the doctrine stated above. Gelpcke v. Dubuque, supra, 214. We think the court below held the right view of the case, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

STEVENS v. LOVEJOY. (No. 13,825.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1891.)

SWAMP LAND—APPLICATION BEFORE SURVEY.

The swamp lands granted to the state by Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850, are not subject to application for purchase until they have been segregated to the state by a United States survey, and an application filed prior to such segregation confers no rights on the applicant, though it is subsequently approved, and a certificate of purchase issued after segregation. Following Buchanan v. Nagle, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 512.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Action by Stevens against Lovejoy to determine a contest arising in the state land-office as to the right to purchase from the state certain swamp and overflowed lands granted to the state by Act Cong. September 28, 1850. The court below found, among other things, that defendant's application to purchase was made before the land was surveyed and segregated to the state by the United States, and that no rights attached by reason of the application or its subsequent approval, and the issuance of a certificate of purchase based thereon. Judgment for plaintiff, new trial denied, and defendant appeals.

PER CURIAM. Upon the authority of Buchanan v. Nagle, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 512, (No. 13,705, opinion filed April 4, 1891,) the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SWIM v. WILSON. (No. 12,634.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1891.)

STOCKBROKERS—INNOCENT SALE OF STOLEN STOCK—LIABILITY TO OWNER.

A stockbroker is liable to the owner for the value of mining shares received for sale from one who had stolen them, although he acted in good faith, without notice, and paid the proceeds to the thief, relying on his representations of ownership. BEATTY, C. J., and PATERSON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Wilson & Wilson, for appellant. Tilden & Tilden, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff was the owner of 100 shares of stock of a mining corporation, issued to one H. B. Parsons, trustee, and properly indorsed by him. This stock was stolen from plaintiff by an employe in his office, and delivered for sale to the defendant, who was engaged in the business of buying and selling stocks on commission. At the time of placing the stock in defendant's possession, the thief represented himself as its owner, and the defendant relying upon this representation, in good faith, and without any notice that the stock was stolen, sold the same in the usual course of business, and subsequently, still without any notice that the person for whom he had acted in making the sale was not the true owner, paid over to him the net proceeds of such sale. Thereafter the plaintiff brought this action to recover the value of said stock, alleging that the defendant had converted the same to his own use, and, the facts as above stated appearing, the court in which the action was tried gave judgment against defendant for such value, and from this judgment, and an order refusing him a new trial, the defendant appeals. It is clear that the defendant's principal did not by stealing plaintiff's property acquire any legal right to sell it, and it is equally clear that the defendant, acting for him and as his agent, did not have any greater right, and his act was therefore wholly unauthorized, and in law was a conversion of plaintiff's property. "It is no defense to an action of trover that the defendant acted as the agent of another. If the principal is a wrong-doer, the agent is a wrong-doer also. A person is guilty of a conversion who sells the property of another without authority from the owner, notwithstanding he acts under the authority of one claiming to be the owner, and is ignorant of such person's want of title." Kimball v. Billings, 55 Me. 147; Coles v. Clark, 3 Cush. 399; Koch v. Branch, 44 Mo. 542. In Stephens v. Elwall, 4 Maule & S. 259, this principle was applied where an innocent clerk received goods from an agent of his employer, and forwarded them to such employer abroad; and, in rendering his decision on the case presented, Lord ELLENBOROUGH uses this language: "The only question is whether this is a conversion in the clerk, which undoubtedly was so in the master. The clerk acted under an unavoidable ignorance and for his master's benefit, when he sent the goods to his master; but, nevertheless, his acts may amount to a conversion; for a person is guilty of conversion who intermeddles with my property, and disposes of it, and it is no answer that he acted under the authority of another, who had himself no authority to dispose of it." To hold the defendant liable, under the circumstances disclosed here, may seem upon first impression to be a hardship upon him. But it is a matter of every-day experience that one cannot always be perfectly secure from loss in his dealings with others, and the defendant here is only in the position of a person who has trusted to the honesty of another, and has been deceived. He undertook to act as agent for one whom it now appears was a thief, and, relying on his representations, he aided his principal to convert the plaintiff's property into money, and it is no greater hardship to require him to pay to the plaintiff the value of this property than it would be to take it away from the innocent vendee who purchased and paid for it. And yet it is universally held that the purchaser of stolen chattels, no matter how innocent or free from negligence in the matter, acquires no title to such property as against the owner, and this rule has been applied in this court to the innocent purchaser of shares of stock. Barstow v. Mining Co., 64 Cal. 388, 1 Pac. Rep. 349; Sherwood v. Mining Co., 50 Cal. 413.

The precise question involved here arose in the case of Berch v. Marye, 9 Nev. 312. In that case, as here, the defendant was a stockholder who had made a sale of stolen certificates of stock for a stranger, and paid him the proceeds. He was held liable, the court in the course of its opinion saying: "It is next objected that, as the defendant was the innocent agent of the person for whom he received the shares of stock, without knowledge of the felony, no judgment should have been rendered against him. It is well settled that agency is no defense to an action of trover, to which the present action is analogous." The same conclusion was reached in Kimball v. Billings, 55 Me. 147, the property sold in that case by the agent being stolen government bonds, payable to bearer. The court there said: "Nor is it any defense that the property sold was government bonds payable to bearer. The bona fide purchaser of a stolen bond payable to bearer might perhaps defend his title against even the true owner. But there is no rule of law that secures immunity to the agent of the thief in such cases, nor to the agent of one not a bona fide holder. * * * The rule of law protecting bona fide purchasers of lost or stolen notes and bonds payable to bearer has never been extended to persons not bona fide purchasers, nor to their agents." Indeed, we discover no difference in principle between the case at bar and that of Rogers v. Huie, 1 Cal. 571, in which case, BENNETT, J., speaking for the court, said: "An auctioneer who receives and sells stolen property is liable for the conversion to the same extent as any other merchant or individual. This is so both upon principle and authority. Upon principle, there is no reason why he should be exempted from liability. The person to whom he sells, and who has paid the amount of the purchase money, would be compelled to deliver the property to the true owner or pay him its full value; and there is no more hardship in requiring the auctioneer to account for the value of the goods than there would be in compelling the right owner to lose them, or the purchaser from the auctioneer to pay for them." It is true that this same case afterwards came before the court, and it was held, in an opinion reported in 2 Cal. 571, that an auctioneer, who in the regular course of his business receives and sells stolen goods, and pays over the proceeds to the felon, without notice that the goods were stolen, is not liable to the true owner as for a conversion. This latter decision, however, cannot be sustained on principle, is opposed to the great weight of authority, and has been practically overruled in the later case of Cerkel v. Waterman, 63 Cal. 34. In that case the defendants, who were commission merchants, sold a quantity of wheat, supposing it to be the property of one Williams, and paid over to him the proceeds of the sale before they knew of the claim of the plaintiff in that action. There was no fraud or bad faith, but the court held the defendants there liable for the conversion of the wheat. In this case it was the duty of the defendant to know for whom he acted, and, unless he was willing to take the chances of loss, to have satisfied himself that his principal was able to save him harmless if in the matter of his agency he incurred a liability by the conversion of property not belonging to such principal. Judgment and order affirmed.

GILLASPIE v. HAGANS et al. (No. 13,037.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT — ACTION FOR RENT — PLEADING — HARMLESS ERROR — EVIDENCE — APPEAL.

1. Where a counter-claim for damages for breach of covenant by a landlord to build a laundry on the premises was set up in an action for rent, and that issue tried, the overruling a demurrer to the complaint, on the ground that it neither alleged performance nor excused non-performance of the covenants, was error without prejudice, where it appears that the tenants agreed to use other portions of the building as a laundry, and that the verdict for plaintiff for rent was diminished by more than the amount of damages shown to have been sustained by the breach.

2. Where a complaint contained a count for rent due on a lease, and one for damages for breach of covenant by the tenant to restore the property to its former condition, error in overruling a demurrer on the ground of misjoinder is without prejudice, where the count for damages was abandoned on the trial, and the count so charged, and the verdict was for less than the rent claimed.

3. Questions as to the monthly value of the use of a laundry attached to the leased building, or one like it, do not correctly state the rule of damages for breach of covenant to build a laundry on the premises, and are properly disallowed.

4. Error in excluding competent evidence is cured by afterwards admitting.

5. Where counsel fail to indicate the particular objections to a charge, errors assigned thereon will not be considered on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGARVEY, Judge.

T. L. Carothers, for appellants. J. A. Cooper, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. This action is brought by plaintiff against the defendants to recover the sum of $1,002.93 for rent alleged to be due and unpaid on certain leased premises, described in the amended complaint as the "Capitol Hotel," and for damages in the sum of $200 for breach of covenant to restore the property in the condition provided for by the terms of the lease. The amended complaint, which is unverified, separately states two independent causes of action, in both of which the contract of lease, which is in writing, is pleaded in hac verba. In the first count it is substantially alleged that on the 13th day of May, 1884, plaintiff let to the defendants upon the terms and conditions set forth in the lease the property known as the "Capitol Hotel," and described therein as the hotel then in the possession of one Fairbanks. The second cause of action, after adopting paragraphs 1 and 2 of the complaint, sets up the covenant in the lease to restore the property, and aver damages in the sum of $200 for breach thereof. The instrument in writing executed by the parties hereto, and set out as stated in each of the foregoing causes of action, contains, as we think, two independent contracts of lease of separate and distinct properties, with the rent specifically fixed for each, and the terms commencing at different periods of time, as will be seen from the terms and conditions thereof, which are substantially as follows: One of the properties referred to is the building in course of construction at the time of the execution of the lease, and afterwards known as the "Palace Hotel." The lease of this property was for the term of five years from the date of its completion, at a monthly rental of $150, payable on the first day of each month, plaintiff agreeing to finish the building within a reasonable time, according to the original plans and specifications, except as varied by consent of parties, and to build on the premises a laundry and wood-shed of rough boards. It was further agreed that all improvements made upon the property during the said term should be enjoyed by defendants without further rent. "But that the storehouse under the hotel was no part thereof." The other piece of property, designated as the "Capitol Hotel," plaintiff "also leases" to defendants for the term of five years from the date of the expiration of the lease of one Fairbanks, then in the possession thereof, at a monthly rental of $25, payable on the first day of each month, defendants agreeing to yield up the premises in as good condition as when leased, reasonable wear thereof and damages by the elements excepted. But it is immaterial, in the view that we take of this case, whether this instrument in writing is construed as one contract of lease for both properties, or as separate contracts of lease for each piece thereof. Defendants demurred generally to each cause of action stated, and specially on the ground that the amended complaint improperly unites in one action a claim for money due on a written contract with a claim for unliquidated damages for waste and injury to realty. The demurrer was overruled by the court, and thereupon defendants answered by a general denial, and as a separate defense set up as counter-claim damages in the sum of $6,137.50, for breach of covenants to complete the Palace Hotel according to plans and specifications, and to build a laundry upon the premises thereof, and pray judgment therefor and costs of suit. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered and judgment entered thereon in favor of plaintiff for $833.73, from which judgment and the order refusing a new trial this appeal is taken.

Defendants base their contention in support of the first ground of demurrer on the failure of the complaint to allege performance, or excuse non-performance, of the terms and conditions of the lease, out of which it is alleged this action arose. The amended complaint alleges the execution of the lease, which is set out in full therein, possession of the premises thereunder, and the non-payment of the rent alleged to be due and unpaid thereon. The covenants, the breach of which are set up as counter-claim for damages, are contained in and apply only to the lease of the Palace Hotel property. There are no such covenants in the lease of the Capitol Hotel property. But, conceding that the amended complaint should have alleged performance or excused non-performance of these covenants, they are set up in the counter-claim, and the breach thereof alleged, and, as the case was tried upon those issues, we fail to perceive in what way the defendants were injured thereby.

It is further contended that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the amended complaint on the ground of misjoinder of causes of action. As to whether the second cause of action is in tort, or for breach of covenant to return the property in good condition, we are not called upon, in view of what transpired at the trial of the case, to decide. Admitting, however, that the causes of action were improperly united, and that the court erred in overruling the demurrer, it appears that this cause of action was wholly abandoned by plaintiff at the trial of the case, and no evidence offered thereon, and that the court so charged the jury. It is therefore evident that the jury could not have considered the question of damages claimed thereunder in the rendition of their verdict, which position is further strengthened by the verdict itself, which was for a sum less than the amount claimed to be due for rent. It therefore follows that the ruling of the court on this ground of demurrer, if erroneous, is affirmatively shown by the record to be error without injury. Code Civil Proc. § 475; Hayne, New Trials, § 286; Campbell v. Water, etc., Co., 35 Cal. 682; Reynolds v. Lincoln, 71 Cal. 184, 9 Pac. Rep. 176, and 12 Pac. Rep. 449.

It is further claimed that the court erred in granting plaintiff's motion to strike out the testimony of the witness Tanner, as to the value of the use of the laundry to the Palace Hotel. Admitting that the evidence was competent for this purpose, and that the court erred in striking it out, the error was cured by this witness being subsequently recalled, and giving substantially the same testimony without objection.

The other rulings of the court excepted to and assigned for error are, save one, upon questions as to the value of the use per month of a laundry attached to the Palace Hotel, or to an hotel like it. The objections to these questions were properly sustained, as they failed to correctly state the rule of damage in such cases. It is indisputably shown by the evidence that the building of the laundry was waived by the defendants, and that they agreed to use the west wing of the Capitol Hotel as such, and that, after plaintiff had prepared it by making the necessary improvements at his own expense for that purpose, it was so used by the defendants during the remainder of the time they were in the possession thereof. The witness Hagans, one of the defendants, testified that such a laundry as the one referred to would be worth from $8 to $15 per month; and by the witness Tanner, that, in connection with the Palace Hotel, it would be worth $20 per month. The evidence shows, and it is nowhere contradicted, that the amount of rent due was $1,002.93. The verdict was for $833.73, thus allowing the defendants the very liberal sum of $169.20 for the three months that they had the washing done elsewhere.

It is lastly claimed that the court erred in its charge to the jury, but counsel for appellant has failed to point out what particular part of it he objects to. We have, however, carefully gone over the charge, and, if any objection can be urged to it, it would come, it seems to us, more appropriately from the other side. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C. C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PACIFIC FACTOR CO. v. ADLER (No 13,354.)

ILLEGAL CONTRACTS — MONOPOLIES — LIQUIDATED DAMAGES — PLEADING — MOTION TO STRIKE OUT.

1. Where a contract for the sale of grain-bags provides that the vendee shall have the exclusive sale of the same to the amount of 187,500, and the vendor agreed not to sell or offer the same for sale to any other person, and, if the vendee failed to sell the full amount, the vendor agreed to accept the sale of a pro rata amount, and such contract is a part of a scheme to gain a monopoly, it is void, as against public policy, and there can be no recovery for a breach thereof.

2. Civil Code Cal. § 1670, provides that "every contract by which the amount of damages to be paid * * * for a breach of an obligation is determined in anticipation thereof is to that extent void, except as expressly provided in next section." Section 1671 provides that "the parties to a contract may agree therein upon an amount which shall be presumed to be the amount of damages sustained by a breach thereof when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damages." Held, that a contract for the sale of grain-bags, which provides that the vendor shall pay the vendee three cents for each bag which he refuses or neglects to deliver as liquidated damages, is void, although it recites that, from the nature of the case, it will be extremely difficult to determine the damages.

3. Where, in an action for a breach of contract, the answer is in avoidance, alleging that contracts were made as part of a scheme to gain a monopoly, but fails to allege that the contract sued upon was a part of the scheme, the defect cannot be taken advantage of by motion to strike out such allegation. The proper practice would be to demur.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Henry K. Mitchell, for appellant. Naph-taly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action upon a contract to recover liquidated damages. The portions of plaintiff's complaint necessary to consider in the decision of this cause are: "That plaintiff is a corporation, incorporated in this state for the purpose of conducting and carrying on the business of buying, selling, and otherwise dealing in goods, wares, and merchandise, either in its own behalf or as agent for others on commission; that on the 16th day of May, 1888, in consideration of one dollar, defendant entered into an agreement in writing with plaintiff, whereby he agreed to give it (plaintiff) the exclusive sale of all grain-bags or burlaps amounting to one hundred and eighty-seven thousand and five hundred bags, which was or would be under his control prior to January 1, 1889; and defendant further agreed to accept for said bags or burlaps the average price the plaintiff might obtain for all grain-bags or burlaps it might sell between the date of said contract and January 1, 1889. And, in case plaintiff should fail to sell said one hundred and eighty-seven thousand five hundred bags, defendant agreed to accept the sale of a pro rata amount of grain, bags or burlaps as 187,500 is to the entire number of grain bags and burlaps which plaintiff should sell from this date until the 1st day of January, 1889; and defendant agreed to deliver to said company, or on their order, whatever number of grain-bags or burlaps, up to 187,500, the said company should call on him to deliver between this date and the 1st day of January, 1889, on payment to him, when such bags were delivered, (less one per cent. commission,) of seven and one-half cents for each bag or burlap delivered; and in case defendant should receive more money or deliver more bags or burlaps than his pro rata of the whole number sold by plaintiff between this date and the 1st day of January, 1889, the defendant would refund the excess of money received, and accept other bags in lieu thereof; and defendant agreed not to sell or offer for sale said 187,500 bags or burlaps to any one other than to the plaintiff or upon its order; and defendant further agreed to pay plaintiff one per cent. on all sales of said bags, or any part thereof; and defendant further agreed to pay plaintiff three cents for each bag or burlap which he refused or neglected to deliver on demand as liquidated damages; and the said plaintiff agreed to sell and draw on defendant from time to time, as sales were made, as near as its judgment it could determine, a pro rata amount of said 187,500 bags or burlaps as 187,500 is to the entire number of bags that are placed in its hands for sale between this date and January 1, 1889." The complaint further alleges that plaintiff, in pursuance of the covenants in said agreement, demanded of said defendant prior to January 1, 1889, said 187,500 bags, and defendant at that time had said bags in his possession, but neglected and refused to deliver them to plaintiff.

The answer of defendant practically admits the allegations of the complaint, and sets out certain matters in avoidance, as a special defense, to the effect that plaintiff, through its board of directors, about the 16th day of May, 1888, devised a scheme to control the sale and supply of all or the greater portion of the grain-bags and burlaps which were then within the state of California, or to arrive prior to January 1, 1889, for the purpose of increasing the price of bags and burlaps, and of limiting the number of dealers from whom such bags could be obtained, and compelling the farmers of this state to purchase said bags from plaintiff at a price in excess of their real value; that the demand in this state for such bags and burlaps, for the purpose of sacking the grain, amounts annually to between 32,000,000 and 35,000,000 bags; that plaintiff calculated that the quantity of grain-bags and burlaps which were then within this state, and which were to arrive prior to January 1, 1889, amounted to 42,000,000 bags, and that, if plaintiff could make contracts with the holders and owners of said bags whereby it could secure the exclusive right of making sales thereof, thereby competition for the sale of said bags among said owners and dealers would be removed, and the plaintiff would be enabled to fix a larger price therefor, and compel the parties who required said bags, to remove the grain raised on the Pacific coast, to purchase the same from plaintiff, and pay therefor the price which plaintiff might demand; that in pursuance of said scheme plaintiff entered into contracts with other holders and owners of grain-bags and burlaps, in all respects similar to the contract made with defendant; that the entire quantity of said grain-bags and burlaps, covered by all the contracts of plaintiff, aggregated 30,000,000 bags, or thereabouts; that all of said contracts, including the contract with defendant, are contrary to public policy, and void. The foregoing matters, in addition to others not necessary to note at this time, are set out in detail by defendant.

At the trial plaintiff introduced the contract in evidence, and rested. Defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, which motion was granted. This is an appeal from that judgment. Appellant insists that his motion to strike out the affirmative matter in the answer should have been granted, and also that the court erred in not granting his motion for judgment upon the pleadings. The affirmative defense of the answer is defectively pleaded, and should not be allowed to stand if attacked by demurrer. It fails to allege that the contract under consideration in this cause was entered into as a part of, and in pursuance of, the scheme or plan set out; and if the contract relied upon by plaintiff to recover formed no part of the general "plan" to make a "corner" of the bag and burlap market of the state, then such plan was outside of the questions involved in this litigation, constituted no defense to this suit, and should have been stricken out as surplusage. But it is quite apparent from the pleadings, taken as a whole, that the defendant intended by this defense to claim that the contract embraced in the complaint formed part of this "scheme" or "plan," and was therefore void, as being against public policy.

A defective pleading cannot be stricken out by reason of its defects upon the ground of surplusage. In this case a demurrer would have been the proper means to have tested the sufficiency of the answer, and the motion to strike out was properly denied. Without passing upon the question as to whether any of the allegations of the complaint were denied by the answer, we think the affirmative defense relied upon by defendant was sufficient to defeat the motion of plaintiff for judgment upon the pleadings, when considered in the light of the construction just placed upon it. While it is clear that public policy favors the utmost freedom of contracts within the limits of the law, and requires that business transactions should not be fettered by unnecessary restrictions, yet agreements in restraint of competition, that threaten the public good, entered into with the object and view of controlling, and, if necessary, suppressing, the supply, and thereby enhancing the price of articles of actual necessity, that embrace in their evil effects all the territory and practically all the people of this great state, become a grave menace to the best interests of the commonwealth, and therefore are opposed to sound public policy. The entire number of bags in the state on the 16th day of May, 1888, and which would arrive prior to January 1, 1889, amounted to 42,000,000. The annual demand for bags was 32,000,000. The plaintiff entered into this "scheme" or "plan" to obtain the control of these 42,000,000 bags, and in pursuance of said plan by contract, did actually secure the control of 30,000,000 of these bags from the owners and holders thereof. The plaintiff did not purchase the bags; at the same time, by the rigor of its contract, it prevented the owners from selling them. It is clear this "scheme" or "plan" was devised, and these contracts entered into, for the purpose of removing all competition, and thereby compelling the farmers to purchase bags from plaintiff at a price in excess of their real value. Plaintiff controlled three-fourths of all the bags which were in the state, or which would arrive within the ensuing six months. It held the bag market in its hands, for competition was gone, and the price demanded must be paid. These agreements were not entered into for the purpose of aggregating capital, nor for greater facilities in the conducting of their business, nor for the protection of themselves by a reasonable restraint upon active competitors, but for the purpose of regulating, controlling, and withholding the supply of bags, and thereby to take an unjust advantage of the farmers' necessities, by disposing of the fruits of its unlawful labors at an unreasonable advance in price.

The supreme court of the state of Ohio, in speaking upon this question, said: "The clear tendency of such an agreement is to establish a monopoly, and to destroy competition in trade, and for that reason, on grounds of public policy, courts will not aid in its enforcement. It is no answer to say that competition in the salt trade was not in fact destroyed, or that the price of the commodity was not unreasonably advanced. Courts will not stop to inquire as to the degree of injury inflicted upon the public; it is enough to know that the inevitable tendency of such contracts is injurious to the public." Salt Co. v. Guthrie, 35 Ohio St. 672. In considering the question as to what is a reasonable restraint of trade, Chief Justice TINDAL in Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing, 743, used the following language: "We do not see how a better test can be applied to the question * * * than by considering whether the restraint is such only as to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in favor of whom it is given, and not so large as to interfere with the interests of the public; * * * whatever is injurious to the interests of the public is void on the ground of public policy." Craft v. McConoughy, 79 Ill. 346; Arnot v. Coal Co., 68 N. Y. 558. It is difficult to distinguish upon principle the case of Lumber Co. v. Hayes, 76 Cal. 387, 18 Pac. Rep. 391, from the case at bar. "Plaintiff, being a manufacturer of lumber, entered into contracts with various manufacturers of lumber to purchase so many thousand feet from each during the year 1881, and said parties agreed not to manufacture during said time any other lumber to be sold in the four counties where plaintiff was doing business. The sole object and consideration in entering into these contracts was for the purpose of increasing the price of lumber, limiting the supply, and giving the plaintiff control of the lumber market within the territory specified." Chief Justice SEARLS, in holding one of the contracts void, said: "With the results naturally flowing from the laws of demand and supply, the courts have nothing to do; but when agreements are resorted to, for the purpose of taking trade out of the realm of competition, and thereby enhancing or depressing prices of commodities, the courts cannot be successfully invoked, and their execution will be left to the volition of the parties thereto."

After plaintiff had introduced the contract in evidence and rested, defendant was granted a nonsuit upon two grounds: (1) That no proof of actual damage was offered, and the clause of the contract fixing liquidated damages is void, under sections 1670 and 1671 of the Civil Code. (2) That the contract is void, as being in restraint of trade and against public policy. Section 1670 of the Civil Code provides: "Every contract by which the amount of damage to be paid, or other compensation to be made, for a breach of an obligation, is determined in anticipation thereof, is to that extent void, except as expressly provided in the next section." Section 1671: "The parties to a contract may agree therein upon an amount which shall be presumed to be the amount of damage sustained by a breach thereof, when from the nature of the case it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage." The allegation of the complaint that "it was understood and agreed between plaintiff and defendant at the time of making the contract that, owing to the nature of the case, it would be impracticable and extremely difficult to fix the actual damage," added no merit to the pleading, and its denial in the answer was unnecessary labor. Whether a contract is such that, "from the nature of the case," it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage sustained by a breach thereof, is a question of fact, which must be determined in each particular case; and for the purpose of determining this question the court must examine the attendant and surrounding circumstances under which the contract was entered into, as well as the terms of the contract itself. Parties cannot by their arbitrary agreement preclude such examination by the court, or avoid the provisions of the statute. Brick Co. v. Moore, 75 Cal. 205, 16 Pac. Rep. 890; Eva v. McMahon, 77 Cal. 472, 19 Pac. Rep. 872. In the present case we think that, when the plaintiff rested, the "nature of the case," as presented by the terms of the contract, and its breach as admitted by the answer, was such that the court could decide as a fact that it was neither extremely difficult nor impracticable to fix the actual damage sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the defendant's breach of the contract. The refusal of the defendant to deliver the bags may have deprived the plaintiff of its commissions for selling, and under certain circumstances it may have suffered other damage; but we can imagine no case where any damage could have resulted to the plaintiff by reason of a breach of this contract, and which the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover in a court of law, where it could be said that it was impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage. Is the contract void as being in restraint of trade and against public policy? This question, when the motion for a nonsuit was made, was to be determined by an examination of the terms of the contract itself. We have already decided that it was so corrupted by the bad company with which it associated, as set forth in the answer of defendant, as to be beyond the pale of the law at that time; but at an earlier age, when it appears in the complaint, no stain or blemish is found to discolor it. The plaintiff contracted to sell the bags and burlaps of defendant at a certain commission. Defendant agreed to accept for them the average price it received for all bags it sold, plaintiff had the exclusive sale of the bags, and was bound to sell a certain portion of them. Standing alone, a total stranger to the "scheme" or "plan" set out in the answer, this contract must be considered good, for no illegal object appears; no transgression of the law is apparent; no public interest is injuriously affected. It follows from the foregoing views that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

ONTARIO LAND & IMP. CO. v. BEDFORD
et al. (No. 13,692.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 10, 1891.)

MORTGAGE—RELEASE—FORECLOSURE SALE.

1. A mortgage of property that had been platted into lots and blocks provided that the mortgagor should be entitled to a partial release of the mortgage on payment of a certain sum for each lot released. The blocks contained 32 lots each, but a few of the blocks had not been subdivided into lots. Held, that such unsubdivided blocks were not "lots," within the meaning of the release provision of the mortgage.

2. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 694, which provides that at execution sale the judgment debtor may direct in what order the property shall be sold applies also to foreclosure sales where the decree does not specify any order of sale.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge.

Chas. J. Perkins and H. C. Rolfe, for appellants. Waters & Gird, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. There are appeals in this case from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, foreclosing a mortgage, from an order refusing defendants' motion for a new trial, and also from an order of the court denying the motion of defendants to set aside a sale of the mortgaged premises made under an execution in the action. The mortgage covers separate parcels of land in what is known as "Ontario Colony," and contains a provision by which the mortgagees agree to "release from the lien of this mortgage those parts, portions, or subdivisions of said mortgaged premises designated on said plat of said town of Magnolia, as fronting on Euclid avenue, upon the payment to said parties of the sum of two hundred dollars for each of said lots. All lots fronting on First, Second, and Third streets, north of D street, upon the payment to them of one hundred and twenty dollars for each of said lots; all lots fronting on First, Second, and Third streets, north of D street, upon the payment to them of one hundred and forty dollars for each of said lots; all lots fronting on Fourth street, upon payment to them of ninety dollars for each of said lots; and all lots fronting on Fifth and Sixth streets, and Camper's avenue, upon the payment to them of eighty dollars for each of said lots." The map referred to shows that the town of Magnolia is laid off into streets and blocks; the latter, with the exception of blocks 33 and 25, being subdivided into lots. The lots are of different sizes; some of the blocks being divided into a greater number of lots than others. Appellants claim that the unsubdivided blocks 33 and 25 are "lots," within the meaning of that part of the mortgage above quoted, and so subject to release, in accordance with its terms.

1. The word "lot" may undoubtedly be so used in a conveyance as to mean the entire premises conveyed, whether such premises consist of a farm or even a block in a city. But the ordinary meaning of this word, when used with reference to town or city property, is a subdivision of a block according to the map or survey of such town or city; and there is nothing upon the face of this mortgage to indicate that it was used in any different sense by the parties thereto. The map of the town of Magnolia is expressly referred to, and, for the purpose of construing the mortgage, must be deemed a part of it. This map shows that there are town lots fronting upon all the streets named in that part of the mortgage relating to releases, and, as these answer or satisfy the description given to the parcels subject to release, the mortgage must be construed as referring to them; and the amount to be paid for the release of each lot refers to a town lot, as designated on the map, and not to an entire block. To hold that block 33 is a lot would enable the defendants to secure its release upon payment of the same sum as is provided for the release of the one thirty-second part of the adjoining block 34; and, while it would have been competent for the parties to have made such an agreement, the intention to do so is not to be inferred from the use of a word which, in ordinary acceptance, as applied to town property such as this, conveys a different meaning.

2. The judgment in this case did not mention the particular manner or order in which the several parcels of the mortgaged property should be sold. The record shows that the attorneys for the defendants directed the officer making the sale to sell the lots separately, and also the order in which they should be sold. These directions were disregarded, and the defendants subsequently moved the court to set aside the sale because of the failure of the officer to follow such instructions. The motion was denied. This ruling of the court was erroneous. The process under which the judgment in this class of cases is enforced is provided for in section 684 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the subsequent section 694,¹ which is a part of the same chapter dealing with the general subject of the execution of judgments, is applicable to sales of real property under judgment of foreclosure; and when, as in this case, the judgment is silent as to the manner or order in which the separate parcels shall be sold, the judgment debtor has the right to require that separate lots or parcels shall be sold separately, and may also direct the order in which they shall be sold. The practice act in force prior to the adoption of the Code of Civil Procedure contained a chapter relating to the execution of judgments in civil cases substantially the same as the one upon the same subject in the Code of Civil Procedure; and in the case of Leviston v. Swan, 33 Cal. 480, it was held that a decree of foreclosure need not contain any special directions as to the mode or place of sale, because such matters are regulated by law, and that, by virtue of process to enforce such a judgment, the sheriff is required "to sell the mortgaged property in the mode and manner, and at the place, designated in the practice act for the sale of real estate under judicial process, and make a return of his proceedings, as in the case of an execution upon a money judgment." Judgment and order denying motion for new trial affirmed. The order refusing to set aside the sale of the property directed by the judgment to be sold is reversed.

REDINGTON v. CORNWELL. (No. 13,008.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1891.)

CORPORATIONS — PAYMENT OF DEBTS BY STOCKHOLDERS — SUBROGATION — PLEADING — AMENDMENTS — LIMITATIONS.

1. Civil Code Cal. § 5322, provides, among other things, that each stockholder of a corporation is individually and personally liable only for such proportion of any corporate debt as the amount of his stock bears to the whole subscribed capital stock. Held that, where one stockholder and director pays more than his proportionate share of such debt, the payment is not voluntary, and he is entitled, as against a co-director who knew of and acquiesced in such payment, to contribution, and to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor, since he has a beneficial interest in the property of the corporation, which is answerable for the debt, and from which the other stockholders' proportion must be paid, if not paid by them individually.

2. Where, in such action, the stockholder asks to be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the creditor, the period of limitation is that defined by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 359, providing that actions against a stockholder of a corporation to enforce a liability created by law must be brought within three years after the creation of the liability.

3. Although an amended complaint is filed after the cause of action is barred, it is not demurrable on this ground when it does not show upon its face when the original was filed, or that the cause of action is different from that set up in the original.

4. The original complaint is not superseded by an amendment which alleges substantially the same cause of action, and it remains a "pleading," within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 670, subd. 2, which makes the pleadings part of the judgment roll, and it may also be brought up by bill of exceptions, under Code Civil Proc. §§ 647, 648, providing that "documents on file in the action" may be incorporated therein.

5. Where the original complaint declares on two notes, alleging that they were given "for value received," and were assigned by indorsement, and also alleges facts from which an equitable assignment would result, an amended complaint which omits the allegation of indorsement, and alleges that the debt was for money loaned, and for a balance due on account, sets up substantially the same cause of action; the averment as to value received being equivalent to the more specific allegations of the items of money loaned and due on account.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; R. CROUCH, Judge.

Action in equity by John H. Redington against George N. Cornwell. The amended complaint alleged that plaintiff, who was a stockholder in a corporation, had paid the whole of a certain debt owed by it, and asked to be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the creditor, and for contribution from another stockholder. Civil Code Cal. § 5322, provides, among other things, that each stockholder of a corporation is individually and personally liable only for such proportion of any corporate debt as the amount of his stock bears to the whole subscribed capital stock. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 359, provides that actions against a stockholder of a corporation to enforce a liability created by law must be brought within three years after the creation of the liability. It was claimed by defendant that under these statutes the payment by plaintiff of more than his proportion was voluntary, and that he had no right of contribution or subrogation, and also that the action was barred. A demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals.

Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for appellant. F. E. Johnston, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This appeal is from a final judgment in favor of the defendant, rendered on demurrer to plaintiff's third amended complaint in two counts, and presents for decision the general question, should the demurrer have been sustained? The facts alleged in the first count of the complaint are substantially as follows: During a period of time embracing all the transactions alleged, the plaintiff and defendant were stockholders and directors of the Redington Quicksilver Company, a California corporation, and the plaintiff was president of the board of directors. During the same period the subscribed capital stock of the corporation consisted of 1,260 shares, of which the defendant owned 461 shares. From September 1, 1879, until June 1, 1882, the corporation had "a mutual, open, and current account" with Redington & Co., a copartnership. At divers times during that period the copartnership received from the corporation consignments of quicksilver, which it sold and disposed of for the corporation, and collected the proceeds thereof, advanced and loaned money to the corporation, and paid out money for its use, and also received partial payments from the corporation on the account. In this account the corporation was debited with all moneys loaned and advanced to it, and with all sums paid out and expended for its use by the copartnership, and was credited with all proceeds of sales of quicksilver, and with all payments made on the account. On June 1, 1882, the copartnership and the corporation had an accounting, by which it was found that there was a balance of $64,126.24 due from the latter to the former, for which the corporation then made its promissory note, of which the following is a copy: "$64,126.24. San Francisco, June 1st, 1882. On demand, for value received, the Redington Quicksilver Company hereby promises to pay to Mess. Redington & Company, or order, at its office in San Francisco, sixty-four thousand one hundred and twenty-six 24-100 dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of eight (8) per cent. per annum until paid. Interest payable monthly, and, if not so paid, to become a part of the principal, and bear a like interest. [Signed] THE REDINGTON QUICKSILVER COMPANY, JOHN H. REDINGTON, President. [Corporate Seal.] GEORGE PENLINGTON, Secretary." After formally alleging the above facts, the complaint proceeds as follows: "(6) That thereafter, to-wit, on or about the 7th day of June, 1882, said firm of Redington & Co. pressed for and demanded of the said corporation the collection and payment of the balance of the indebtedness aforesaid and of said promissory note; that at the time of said demand said corporation was wholly without funds wherewith to pay the same; that thereupon, to-wit, on or about the said last-named day, at said city and county of San Francisco, this plaintiff, in good faith, and for the honor, use, and benefit of the said Redington Quicksilver Co., advanced and paid the said sum of $64,126.24 to said firm of Redington & Co. in full satisfaction and discharge of the said balance, and of the said indebtedness evidenced by the said promissory note; that thereby all of the indebtedness of said corporation then subsisting to said Redington & Co., and all claims and demands of said firm upon said corporate note, were fully paid and extinguished; that said Redington & Co. thereupon surrendered and delivered said promissory note to this plaintiff. (7) That no payments have been made by said corporation, or on its behalf, or at all upon said account, or the said balance thereof, or upon said indebtedness evidenced by said promissory note, or upon or on account of said sum so advanced by said plaintiff, except the sum of $24,126.24, which was repaid to plaintiff thereon, on or about the 31st day of May, 1884, and that on said 31st day of May, 1884, there remained and was, and that there now is, due and wholly unpaid from said the Redington Quicksilver Co. to this plaintiff of the said balance, and of the said indebtedness, and of said sum advanced by plaintiff as aforesaid, the sum of $40,000, with interest thereon from said last-named day, together with interest upon the sum of $24,126.24 from the 7th day of June, 1882, up to said 31st day of May, 1884. (8) That at all the times and dates aforesaid the said defendant was one of the directors of the said Redington Quicksilver Co.; that, as such director, he acted for said corporation in and about the execution of said promissory note, and also in incurring the indebtedness evidenced thereby, and in making the payments that have been made on account of the same as aforesaid; that said defendant, as such director, and also individually, had at all times and dates aforesaid full notice and knowledge of the facts hereinabove alleged, and of each and every one thereof; that he has at all the times, and with notice and knowledge as aforesaid, acquiesced in, confirmed, and ratified all and singular the acts of said corporation, and of said firm of Redington & Co., and of this plaintiff hereinabove mentioned and averred. * * * (10) That by reason of the premises defendant is, and at all the times since the said 31st day of May, 1884, has been, liable and holden to plaintiff for 461-1260 of the said sum of $40,000, and of the interest remaining due to plaintiff from said corporation as aforesaid, to-wit, the sum of $14,635, together with interest thereon from the said 31st day of May, 1884, at the legal rate, together with 461-1260 of the interest at the legal rate upon the said sum of $24,126.24 from the 7th day of June, 1882, to the 31st day of May, 1884. (11) That, though frequently requested so to do, the said defendant has hitherto wholly failed, neglected, and refused to pay to plaintiff the said last-mentioned sum, or the said interest, or any part thereof. (12) That upon receiving from defendant payment of his proportionate part of the balance and indebtedness aforesaid due from said corporation to this plaintiff, and of the moneys so as aforesaid advanced and paid by plaintiff, and of said interest, this plaintiff is ready and willing, and now here and hereby offers, to discharge and satisfy, to the extent of such payment, the said obligation of the said corporation, or of its stockholders to this plaintiff, and otherwise to abide by and perform the judgment of this court touching the same." The second count is upon another promissory note of the corporation to the same copartnership firm for the sum of $14,800.43 dated December 31, 1883, for a balance of the account running to the date of this second note. In all other respects the second count is like the first. The grounds of the demurrer are (1) that neither count states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and (2) that both counts appear to be barred by the first subdivision of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

1. It is contended by counsel for respondent that the payment of the debt of the corporation by the plaintiff, in excess of that part for which he was individually liable as a stockholder, was purely voluntary, and extinguished the debt as to all other stockholders; and, therefore, that plaintiff cannot be subrogated to the rights or remedies of Redington & Co. against the stockholders. It is true that the doctrine of subrogation "is not to be applied in favor of one who has, officiously and as a mere volunteer, paid the debt of another, for which neither he nor his property was answerable, and which he was under no obligation to pay," nor where "it would work injustice to the rights of others." Sheld. Subr. § 1. It is also true that the plaintiff was not directly liable to pay defendant's proportion of the debts of the corporation, but, as a stockholder, he had a common, well-de-financed beneficial interest, with all other stockholders, in the fund (the property of the corporation) from which defendant's proportion of the debts must have been paid if not paid by defendant; and that fund was answerable for the debt. Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 591; San Diego v. Railroad Co., 44 Cal. 116. There can be no doubt that the plaintiff was entitled to contribution from the defendant to the extent of defendant's proportion of the debt paid. Cook, Stocks, § 27, and authorities there cited; Larrabee v. Baldwin, 35 Cal. 156. From which it follows that his payment was not voluntary since contribution no more than subrogation, is allowed in favor of a mere volunteer. But in this case the plaintiff, in addition to contribution, asks to be subrogated to the rights and remedies of Redington & Co. against the defendant "for the purpose of compelling contribution." Sheld. Subr. § 45; Lamb v. Montague, 112 Mass. 353. Should he be thus subrogated, he will be entitled to the same remedy that Redington & Co. were entitled to, as to which the statute of limitations is three years, (Green v. Beckman, 59 Cal. 545; Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 167, 15 Pac. Rep. 670;) whereas, if he simply sought contribution upon an implied assumpsit, his remedy would be barred in two years, (Chipman v. Morrill, 20 Cal. 131.) This seems to be all he can gain by subrogation, as it does not appear that Redington & Co. held any securities for the debt except the promissory note of the corporation, which added nothing to their remedy against the stockholders, so far as the statutes of limitation are concerned. Larrabee v. Baldwin, 35 Cal. 168; Stilphen v. Ware, 45 Cal. 110; Hyman v. Coleman, 82 Cal. 650, 23 Pac. Rep. 62. In Mosier's Appeal, 56 Pa. St. 76, THOMPSON, C. J., said: "I regard the doctrine [of subrogation] as applicable in all cases where a payment has been made under a legitimate and fair effort to protect the ascertained interests of the party paying, and where intervening rights are not thereby jeopardized or defeated. Such payments, whatever their effect might be at law in extinguishing the indebtedness to which they apply, will not be so regarded in equity, if contrary to equity to regard them so." See, also, McCormick v. Irwin, 35 Pa. St. 111; Heart v. Bryan, 2 Dev. Eq. 147; Wall v. Mason, 102 Mass. 316; Robinson v. Leavitt, 7 N. H. 99. The case of Guy v. Du Uprey, 16 Cal. 198, recognizes the principle that a payment is not voluntary when made by a party who is interested in having the payment made. In the first section of Sheldon on Subrogation, the author, by way of definition, gives the following, which, so far as it goes, seems to be well sustained by the authorities cited: "It is the substitution of another person in the place of a creditor, so that the person in whose favor it is exercised succeeds to the rights of the creditor in relation to the debt. The substitute is put in all respects in the place of the party to whose rights he is subrogated. It is derived from the civil law, from which it has been adopted by courts of equity. In this country, under the initial guidance of Chancellor Kent, its principles have been more widely developed, and its doctrines more generally applied, than in England. It is treated as the creature of equity, and is so administered as to secure real and essential justice without regard to form, and is independent of any contractual relations between the parties to be affected by it. It is broad enough to include every instance in which one party pays a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which, in equity and good conscience, should have been discharged by the latter; but it is not to be applied in favor of one who has, officiously and as a mere volunteer, paid the debt of another, for which neither he nor his property was answerable, and which he was under no obligation to pay; and it is not allowed where it would work any injustice to the rights of others."

The complaint is unnecessarily verbose, and perhaps uncertain and ambiguous as to some material matters; but I think it shows that plaintiff was interested in having the debt to Redington & Co. paid, and that he made the payment "under a legitimate and fair effort to protect" his own interest in the fund which was liable for the whole debt; and, therefore, that the payment was not voluntary in that legal sense which would preclude his right to contribution from the defendant, or his right to be subrogated to the remedies of Redington & Co. as a necessary means to enforce such contribution. Counsel for respondent insists, however, that the complaint shows that the debt of the corporation to Redington & Co. was extinguished, and that it necessarily follows that the debt of the stockholders was also extinguished. After sufficiently alleging the payment of the indebtedness on the account and the note, the complaint adds, as a conclusion from those facts, "that thereby all of the indebtedness of said corporation then subsisting to said Redington & Co., and all claims and demands of said firm upon said corporate note, were fully paid and extinguished." Even if the averment had been that the debt of all the stockholders was extinguished by the payment, it would have been only an erroneous conclusion from the facts stated, and evidently contrary to the intention of the pleader, whose sole object, plainly expressed, was to recover a stockholder's proportion of the debt. The word "extinguished" was probably used as synonymous with "paid and satisfied." But it is not alleged that the debt of the defendant or other stockholders was "thereby extinguished." As to what will so extinguish the debt that the party paying cannot be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the creditor, see Mosier's Appeal, 56 Pa. St. 76, and Lamb v. Montague, 112 Mass. 353.

2. It is contended that both causes of action appear to have been barred by section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure at the time the third amended complaint was filed. But it does not appear on the face of the third amended complaint when the original complaint was filed, nor that the third amended complaint states a cause of action substantially different from those stated in the original complaint; and therefore it does not appear on the face of the third amended complaint that either of the causes of action therein stated were barred. Ord v. De la Guerra, 18 Cal. 75; Farris v. Merritt, 63 Cal. 118; Kraner v. Halsey, 82 Cal. 209, 22 Pac. Rep. 1137. For aught that appears on the face of the third amended complaint, the original complaint may have been filed on the 8th day of June, 1882, and within the period prescribed by section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and may have stated, or imperfectly stated, a cause of action substantially the same as that stated in the first count of the complaint demurred to.

The original complaint, however, which was filed October 7, 1884, has been brought up as a part of the judgment roll, and also by a bill of exceptions; but the respondent contends that it is improperly here, that it does not belong to the judgment roll, and that, as there was no trial of any issue of fact, there was no proper occasion for a bill of exceptions. By the second division of section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is applicable to this case, "the pleadings" are made a part of the judgment roll. But counsel for respondent contends that the original complaint has been wholly, and for all purposes, superseded by the third amended complaint, and, therefore, that it is not to be considered a pleading in the case, and consequently no part of the judgment roll. It has been said in a number of cases that an amended pleading supersedes the original, but I think a careful examination of those cases will show that it was only intended to decide that the amended pleading superseded the original for certain specified purposes, and only to the extent of the amendment. Beyond this, whatever may have been said is mere dictum. But in none of the cases has it been even said that the original is not a part of the judgment roll; nor has it been decided that an original complaint is superseded for the purposes of showing when the action was commenced, and whether or not a new or different cause of action was introduced by the amendment. For the purpose of determining these questions, and perhaps others that may arise which often become material on appeal, the amended complaint can by no possibility supersede the original. Unless otherwise required by the court, an amendment to a complaint, whether it consists of a mere additional averment, or effects a change in the original, may be filed by itself, without being incorporated in the original by engrossment of the complaint as amended, (Code Civil Proc. 432,) in which case it could hardly have been contemplated that the original should not become a part of the judgment roll. It is certainly always included as such by the clerk in making up the roll.

Is not the original complaint, though defective or imperfect, a pleading in the case? The trial court certainly was authorized to consider it as a part of the record of the pleadings in this case, for the purposes of ascertaining when the action was commenced, and determining whether a new cause of action was stated in the third amended complaint; otherwise, that court could not have disposed of the questions of law raised by the demurrer as to the effect of the statute of limitations, since there was no opportunity to introduce evidence on the trial of pure questions of law which must be tried on the pleadings alone. If the trial court was authorized to consider the original complaint as one of the pleadings of record without the introduction of it in evidence, I think it should be regarded as a part of the judgment roll. If, however, the original complaint is not a part of the judgment roll I think it is properly brought up by the bill of exceptions. By section 647 of the Code of Civil Procedure an order sustaining a demurrer is deemed excepted to, and in drafting his bill of exceptions the appellant was entitled to incorporate therein "documents on file in the action," and such other available matter as was necessary to explain it. Code Civil Proc. § 648. The original complaint was a document on file in the action, and it is necessary to explain the exception to the order sustaining the demurrer, and is, therefore, properly incorporated in the bill of exceptions. The objection that a bill of exceptions is allowable only upon the trial of an issue of fact is answered by the case of Tregambo v. Mining Co., 57 Cal. 501, and by numerous other authorities. The word "trial," in section 650, Code Civil Proc., means a trial of an issue of law as well as the trial of an issue of fact. And, Law Dict., and numerous authorities there referred to.

I think the third amended complaint does not state a cause of action substantially different from those stated in the original complaint. The original complaint is upon the same two promissory notes set out in the third amended complaint, alleging that they were made for value received by the corporation, and that for value received the corporation assigned the same to plaintiff by indorsement, and delivered the same to the plaintiff. It does not state that the value received for the making of the notes was money loaned to and paid for the corporation at divers times between September 1, 1879, and June 1, 1882, nor that it was the balance of a "mutual, open, and current account," running from September 1, 1879, to June 1, 1882, as stated in the third amended complaint; but the substance of these more special, yet indefinite, statements is included in the general averment of the original complaint that the notes were made "for value received." Had the original complaint merely added to the phrase, "for value received," the words, "to-wit, moneys loaned to and paid for the corporation at divers times between September 1, 1879, and June 1, 1882," it would have been quite as specific as to what was the consideration of the notes, as is the third amended complaint. The amendment, in this respect, only made the general averment in the original complaint, that the corporation received value for the notes a little more specific, still leaving it indefinite as to the dates and amounts of the several loans and payments. The averment as to the mutual open account in the third amended complaint is of doubtful sufficiency to extend the period of limitation, even against the corporation. As to the stockholders it can have no effect whatever, even though sufficiently alleged. The corporation had no more power to extend the period of limitation, as against the stockholders, by a mutual open account, than by making its promissory note. The liability of the stockholders is created and exists by statute. It arises when a debt is contracted by the corporation. It is limited to three years from the time it arises; and it is well settled in this state that the corporation has no power to extend that limitation without direct authority from the stockholders. The original complaint alleges an assignment of the notes by indorsement and delivery, and also states facts from which an equitable assignment and subrogation would result in the absence of a legal assignment. The amended complaint omits the legal assignment by indorsement, this being the only difference. The effect of each mode of assignment against the defendant would be the same. I think each count of the third amended complaint, subject to some degree of uncertainty and perhaps ambiguity, states a cause of action not substantially different from those defectively stated in the original complaint; and that so much of the alleged indebtedness as accrued after the 7th day of October, 1881, does not appear to have been barred by the statute of limitations at the time of the commencement of the action. Unless the payments made by the corporation were otherwise specially applied by either party, they should be applied to the items of indebtedness in the order in which they were contracted, as to time. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

EXCELSIOR WATER & MIN. CO. v. PIERCE.
(No. 12,973.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1891.)

CORPORATIONS — WRONGFUL PAYMENT OF DIVIDENDS — DIRECTORS' LIABILITY — INVESTMENTS AND PROFITS.

1. Civil Code Cal. § 309, provides that "the directors of a corporation must not make dividends except from the surplus profits arising from the business thereof," and for a violation thereof the directors are personally liable "to the corporation and the creditors, in the event of its dissolution, to the full amount of the capital stock so divided." Held, that the directors of a hydraulic mining corporation, which became indebted by acquiring incumbered property, and making improvements on the mine, are not liable to the corporation for dividends declared and paid out of the net profits of the mine before paying the whole of such debt, when a sinking fund has been provided, sufficient to extinguish the debt before the mine shall be exhausted.

2. It was not a violation of the above statute to borrow money temporarily with which to pay dividends, when the corporation had used the current profits to make improvements.

3. Where investments of the corporation have resulted in loss because of an injunction restraining the company from washing dirt into a stream to the injury of riparian owners, which action could not reasonably have been anticipated, such loss must be treated as a loss of capital, and the directors are not liable because such expenditure was not converted ex post facto into a working expense.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

D. M. Delmas, (W. S. Goodfellow, of counsel,) for appellant. Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action by a California corporation against one of its former directors to recover the amount of certain dividends declared and paid to its stockholders with the concurrence of the defendant while a director. It is alleged by the plaintiff that such dividends were not paid out of the surplus profits of its business, and the action is based upon the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "The directors of corporations must not make dividends, except from the surplus profits arising from the business thereof; nor must they divide, withdraw, or pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock; nor must they create debts beyond their subscribed capital stock, or reduce or increase the capital stock, except as hereinafter specially provided. For a violation of the provisions of this section the directors under whose administration the same may have happened (except those who may have caused their dissent therefrom to be entered at large on the minutes of the directors at the time, or were not present when the same did happen) are, in their individual and private capacity, jointly and severally liable to the corporation, and to the creditors thereof, in the event of its dissolution, to the full amount of the capital stock so divided, withdrawn, paid out, or reduced, or debt contracted; and no statute of limitations is a bar to any suit against such directors for any sums for which they are made liable by this section. There may, however, be a division and distribution of the capital stock of any corporation which remains after the payment of all its debts, upon its dissolution or the expiration of its term of existence." The complaint counts upon 19 separate dividends, aggregating about $266,000, but, it appearing that the defendant had ceased to be a director before the last dividend was paid, plaintiff limits its claim to the first 18. As to these there is but one question to be decided here: Were they or were they not paid out of the surplus profits of the plaintiff's business? To this issue the attention of the superior court seems to have been confined, and in reviewing its decision it will not be necessary for us to consider any question relating to the special defense interposed by defendant to some of the separate counts upon particular dividends. Aside from this special defense, the only matter put in issue by the pleadings of the parties was that above stated; and, the superior court having found that all the dividends were in fact paid out of surplus profits, its judgment was given in favor of the defendant upon that ground alone. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The record upon which the decision of the superior court is to be reviewed is exceedingly voluminous, and consists in great part of tabulated statements and accounts intended to show the gross earnings, the current and other expenses, of the plaintiff, the amount and nature of its assets and indebtedness, and, in short, the exact condition of its affairs at the date of each of the 18 dividends in question. We are, however, spared the labor of deducing for ourselves the results of these involved and conflicting statements by reason of the fact that counsel for both parties have agreed to accept the results stated by the learned judge of the superior court in an opinion filed by him in connection with his decision of the cause, and which has been included in the transcript of the record. It appears therefrom that the plaintiff was incorporated in March, 1877, with a nominal or share capital of $5,000,000, divided into 50,000 shares of $100 each. The object of the incorporation was to carry on hydraulic mining, etc., and the defendant was, from the beginning down to September, 1879, a stockholder and director in the company. In April, 1877, plaintiff acquired all the property of the Excelsior Water Company, consisting of mining ground, farm, ditches, flumes, store, and merchandise, stock in other mining companies, bills, notes, bullion in flumes, etc., giving in exchange 36,732 shares of stock; and shortly afterwards it obtained a like conveyance and transfer of all the property of the Pactolus Mining Company in exchange for 3,000 shares of its stock. These, with a few others, amounting in all to 39,809 shares, were the only shares ever issued by plaintiff. The Excelsior Water Company and Pactolus Mining Company were largely indebted at the time they transferred their property to plaintiff, and this indebtedness was assumed by plaintiff as a part of the purchase price of the property. Its net amount, over and above the solvent credits transferred by the two companies, was $173,710.80, which was paid during the directorship of the defendant. During the same time the sum of $233,723.60 was expended by plaintiff in the purchase of other mining property, the construction of ditches, tunnels, permanent improvements on farm, machinery on mine, procuring United States patents for mining ground, and in assessments on stock in other companies. During the same time the plaintiff was carrying on its mining and other multifarious business, and it received from sale of bullion and water, and as profits of its store and farm and other investments, the gross sum of $1,095,719, while its outlay for operating its mines, salaries, taxes, interest, and other strictly current expenses was $638,303, leaving a balance of earnings of $457,416. The amount of the 18 dividends declared and paid during this time was only $241,629, or $215,724 less than the net earnings. But the plaintiff contends that the surplus profits were only about $98,000, and that about $143,000 over and above the surplus profits were divided, while the defendant claims that much less than the surplus profits was divided. This difference between counsel for plaintiff on the one side and the superior court and counsel for the defendant on the other arises out of a difference of theory as to what constitutes surplus profits of a mining corporation. Counsel for plaintiff contends that the payment of the debts which plaintiff assumed as part of the price of the property acquired from the Excelsior Water Company and the Pactolus Mining Company, as well as most of the items of expenditure for construction of tunnels, levees, ditches, etc., should be rated as current expenses, and charged against its gross earnings, in order to ascertain the actual surplus profits of its business; while counsel for defendant contends, on the contrary, that the payments of the principal of its indebtedness, and its investments in what are called "betterments of its property" should not be charged to current expenses of the business. As to the payment of the debt assumed by the plaintiff when it commenced business, or that incurred in making improvements, we do not understand its counsel to contend that it was necessary to pay them off before any dividends could be declared, but merely that whenever any part of its gross earnings was applied to the payment of a debt it was unlawful thereafter to replace such sum with the proceeds of a loan, and thereupon declare a dividend. The fact is not disclosed by the opinion of the judge of the superior court, but it seems to have been proved, that in several instances money was borrowed by the plaintiff in order to any dividends, and it seems to have happened in this way: The debts assumed by the plaintiff became due from time to time, and the permanent improvements on its property were made from time to time, so that large payments on both accounts were constantly occurring. Instead of borrowing money to make such payments at the time of making them, any money that happened to be on hand in the company's treasury was used as far as it would go, and afterwards replaced by the proceeds of bonds, overdrafts, or notes of the company, which, to the extent necessary, were used to pay the regular dividends. It is in this course of proceeding that counsel claims that defendant was clearly guilty of a violation of section 309 of the Civil Code, irrespective of any difference of views as to what are and what are not current expenses justly chargeable against the gross receipts of a mining corporation, in order to determine its net or surplus earnings or profits. To determine the question presented by this aspect of the case it will be necessary, in the first place, to lay down some general propositions which we think are clearly established by the authorities to which we shall refer.

The term "capital stock" has a double meaning as applied to corporations. In one sense it is the sum mentioned in the articles of incorporation as the amount of the capital stock; in other words, it is the share capital or nominal capital, and does not necessarily represent a corresponding amount of actual capital. In case of mining corporations it is always arbitrary, and generally extravagant in amount. The capital stock referred to in the statute, however, (Civil Code, § 309,) is the actual property of the corporation contributed by the shareholders of the nominal capital. In this case the nominal or share capital of the plaintiff was $5,000,000. Its actual capital was its mining and other property (less the debt with which it was incumbered) received in exchange for the shares which it issued, and this actual capital was what it was forbidden to divide. This inhibition, however, did not extend to the net proceeds of its mining operations; for a mining corporation, like any other corporation organized for the purpose of utilizing a wasting property—a property that can be used only by consuming it—as a mine, a lease, or a patent, is not deemed to have divided its capital merely because it has distributed the net proceeds of its mining operations, although the necessary result is that so much has been subtracted from the substance of its estate. Mor. Priv. Corp. § 442; Lee v. Asphalte Co., 41 Ch. Div. 24. It may distribute its net earnings, although the value of its mine is thereby diminished. But it may not sell the mine, or any part of it, and distribute the proceeds. In this sense, and in this sense only, provisions of law similar to those of section 309 of our Civil Code have been held to apply to mining corporations. If the mine belonging to a mining corporation when it commences operations is free from debt, and provided with all the necessary openings and appliances for its convenient working, the problem of ascertaining the amount of its surplus profits from time to time would be very simple, and would consist in merely deducting the gross outlay from the gross receipts; and the balance, less a reasonable reserve to meet contingencies, would be the legitimate subject of a dividend. But when the mining property has been taken subject to a debt, or when, as a preliminary operation, it becomes necessary to incur a debt in running an expensive tunnel, or sinking an expensive shaft, the problem becomes complicated. Must the whole of such debts be paid out of the first earnings before making a dividend, or must only a part be paid, and, if so, what part? We do not think it would be necessary to pay, in the first place, the whole of such debts, but it would be necessary to pay accruing interest, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to extinguish the principal before the mine was exhausted. There can be no doubt, we think, that this is a correct theory; but in case of a property of such uncertain, fluctuating, and precarious value as a mine, it would undoubtedly be extremely difficult in most cases to practically apply it. Fortunately, however, the right of the creditors to insist upon payment of their demands as they fell due, and the prudence of capitalists to whom the company would be compelled to resort for loans with which to extend the payment of its maturing indebtedness, would always furnish a sure corrective for any disposition of the directors of a corporation to provide an inadequate fund for the extinguishment of its indebtedness, and it may be safely assumed that in the cases supposed, unless the debts of the corporation were paid at a rate satisfactory to its creditors, they would put a stop to the payment of dividends by the means within their power. At all events, we are clear that the directors of a mining corporation which has become indebted either by acquiring its property incumbered with debt, or by making permanent improvements for the thorough and systematic working of its mines and other property, are not guilty of an infraction of section 309 of the Civil Code merely because they declare and pay dividends out of the net proceeds of their mine without first paying the whole of such debts. On the contrary, if they have fairly and honestly applied towards the payment and extinguishment of the debts of the company a share of the net earnings satisfactory to its creditors and reasonably proportioned to the amount of its indebtedness, the extent and permanence of its mine, or the rate at which it is being exhausted, they may properly and safely pay out the remainder in dividends, because such remainder may in such cases be justly regarded and treated as surplus profits of the business.

Now in this case it appears that out of the net earnings, amounting to $457,000, (I use round numbers for the sake of brevity,) only $241,000 were paid in dividends, while $216,000, or nearly one-half, was applied in payment of the debts of the corporation, originally assumed in the acquisition of its capital stock, and afterwards incurred in making permanent improvements thereon. It further appears that a large and valuable part of plaintiff's capital consists of property other than its mining ground, which will remain after the mine is exhausted; and there is evidence in the record, though there is no finding to that effect, that the mine itself has been but slightly encroached upon. It does not appear that any creditor has been defrauded, or his claim even endangered; and, in short, there is nothing to show that the capital of plaintiff has been impaired. True, its debt has increased, but not in an amount equal to the value of its betterments. The fact, however, remains, that money was borrowed to pay some of the dividends, and the question remains whether such a course admits of justification. We think there are circumstances which do justify it. A mining company is working its mines at a profit, but discovers that they can be worked to better advantage by constructing a new tunnel; that is to say, it will be wise economy to incur an expense of say a hundred thousand dollars to construct such a tunnel; that it will in fact add more than that sum to the value of the property. Clearly, we think, the corporation would be justified in incurring a debt to that amount to carry out the object, and that it could go on declaring dividends after providing for the payment of the accruing interest, and for the gradual extinction of the principal of such debt. But suppose, instead of borrowing in advance to meet payments on the tunnel, it makes some of the payments out of the current profits of its mining operations,—profits justly applicable, at its option, to the payment of dividends, but not presently needed to meet a declared dividend. Afterwards it borrows money,—no more than it might have borrowed originally on account of the tunnel,—and out of the money so borrowed replenishes the fund applicable to dividends. In such a case the result is precisely the same as if the money had been borrowed sooner, and the identical money borrowed paid out on the tunnel. Nothing has been accomplished beyond what the directors had a right to do, and surely the mode in which it has been done can make no difference. In fact the transaction may be regarded as a temporary borrowing from the dividend fund of a sum necessary to meet an immediate demand, with the advantage to the corporation of keeping its money employed, and saving it the payment of interest.

If the general results stated by the superior judge in his opinion and accepted by counsel are correct, the defendant in this case did nothing more than borrow from the fund applicable to the payment of dividends in the manner outlined above; or if it was the earlier, rather than the later, dividends that were paid with borrowed money, then such borrowed money was finally repaid out of the dividend fund; for, taking the whole period covered by the declaration of the 18 dividends, it appears that no more than the legitimate surplus profits were divided. We say that this fact appears, but we do not lose sight of the fact that counsel for appellant insists upon his contention that $143,000 in excess of surplus profits was divided, and it is proper that we should state more specifically the ground of our contrary opinion. To make up this sum of $143,000, counsel for plaintiff in his estimate of net earnings or surplus profits includes in his current expense account a number of large items, which we think are improperly there; or, to speak more accurately, there is evidence to sustain the finding of the superior court (implied in its general finding) that they are improperly there. We need specify only two of these items, viz.: Assessments Deer Creek tunnel, $113,295.55; machinery and Blue Gravel branch tunnel, $43,962.65; making a total of $157,258.20; which more than overbalances the $143,000 which plaintiff claims to have been paid out of capital or borrowed money. Plaintiff was a stockholder in the Deer Creek Company, and paid its assessments for the construction of its tunnel run for the purpose of working its mines. Clearly this was an investment of capital, and not a current expense. The other item mentioned stands on similar grounds, and so do a number of others, aggregating a large amount, which we have not mentioned. It is argued by plaintiff that a number of these investments turned out to be unprofitable in the end, and reference is made to the fact disclosed by the evidence in his case, and otherwise notorious, that all these hydraulic mines have been shut up by injunction, sued out by the riparian proprietors on the streams into which they were washing their earth. This is undoubtedly a serious misfortune to the present stockholders in the various companies, including the plaintiff; but the defendant is not responsible for the losses they may have suffered in consequence of the injunctions, nor is the wisdom or the prudence of his investments to be measured by a result which at the time few persons anticipated. When the expenditures were made they were no doubt considered judicious, and, if the event has proved the contrary, the result must be treated as a loss of capital, and the expenditures must not be converted ex post facto into a current working expense.

It is proper, in conclusion, to refer to some of the authorities which support the positions herein assumed. For a definition of net earnings used in the sense of surplus profits, we refer to Railroad Co. v. U. S., 99 U. S. 420, note to Goodwin v. Hardy, 99 Amer. Dec. 762. The case in 99 U. S., and Park v. Locomotive Works, 40 N. J. Eq. 114, 3 Atl. Rep. 162, and Minot v. Paine, 99 Mass. 101, are also authority for the proposition that the apportionment of net earnings to the payment of cash dividends, stock dividends, increase of capital, reserve or contingent fund, or to provide for future obligations, is largely one of policy, intrusted to the discretion of the directors, which, when honestly and intelligently exercised, will not be lightly overruled. See, also, Stringer's Case, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 490, and Williams v. Telegraph Co., 93 N. Y. 187. The case of Minot v. Paine, supra, is cited by counsel for plaintiff to sustain his proposition that money of a corporation, when once expended in the purchase of new capital, or in improvements, can never be reclaimed for the purpose of paying dividends. We do not think it sustains the proposition. It goes only to the extent of holding that a trustee of shares for the purpose of paying the income to A. during life, and the principal to B. on the death of A., holds additional shares issued as a stock dividend subject to the same disposition. It rests upon the ground that such is the only safe rule for a trustee, rather than upon the justice of the rule, which is very questionable. But, conceding its correctness upon the point decided, it does not hold that surplus capital cannot be used for making cash dividends; but, on the contrary, expressly holds that, while it can never be regarded as income of the stockholders until converted into a dividend, it may nevertheless be income to the corporation, and as such the subject of a dividend in the discretion of the directors. We find no error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.

The other justices of the court, not having heard the argument, did not participate in the decision.

JACOBS v. WALKER. (No. 13,049.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1891.)

SCHOOL LANDS—APPLICATION TO PURCHASE—FINDINGS—AGRICULTURAL LANDS.

1. In a contest for school land, a finding that defendant made an application and affidavit, as required by the California statute, on the 23d day of February, 1883, and that the affidavit was true, and on the 3d day of June, 1883, a certificate of purchase was issued accordingly, and that on the 18th day of April, 1884, plaintiff made an application and affidavit as required, which was not true, is sufficient to sustain a judgment that plaintiff is not entitled to patent.

2. Under Const. Cal. art. 17, § 3, which provides that "lands belonging to this state which are suitable for cultivation shall be granted only to actual settlers," the fact that land was heavily timbered, and more valuable for timber than agricultural purposes, did not render it "unsuitable for cultivation," although it would not produce ordinary agricultural crops in average quantities, and patent will not issue where there has not been an actual settlement.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. MCGARVEY, Judge.

T. L. Carothers, for appellant. J. A. Cooper, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action to determine a contest between the plaintiff and defendant as to which of them is entitled to purchase certain school lands. The court below gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom on the judgment roll. The court found the facts of the case to be, in substance, as follows: On the 23d day of February, 1883, the defendant filed in the office of the state surveyor general his affidavit and application to purchase the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of a certain thirty-sixth section of land in Mendocino county. He was at the time qualified to purchase school lands, and his affidavit was in the form then prescribed by section 3495 of the Political Code, and all the facts set forth therein were true. On the 3d day of May, 1883, the application was duly approved by the surveyor general; and thereafter, on the 16th day of June following, defendant paid 20 per cent. of the purchase money and the first year's interest on the balance, and received from the register of the land-office a certificate of purchase for the land, in the usual form. On the 23d day of February, 1884, the plaintiff went upon the land in dispute, and began to build a cabin thereon for himself, and ever since has been and now is an actual settler on the land. At the time of his settlement there was no one in the adverse possession of the land, or any part thereof; but about the 27th of the same month one Thomas Dingwall went upon a portion of the land, and commenced erecting a cabin thereon. He completed the cabin, and moved into it, with his family, prior to the 18th of April, 1884, and continued to live in it with his family till about the middle of June following. Dingwall claimed the land, and offered to sell out his claim to plaintiff, and plaintiff knew of his possession, and that his family were in the cabin prior to April 18th. While Dingwall was on the land, he was engaged a part of the time getting out redwood timber for the defendant. On the 18th day of April, 1884, plaintiff made an affidavit and application to purchase the whole of the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the said section 36, and on the 6th of May following filed the same in the office of the surveyor general. He was also qualified to purchase school lands, and his affidavit was in proper form, and all the facts therein set forth were true, except the statement that there was no adverse occupation of the land, which at the time of making and filing the affidavit was untrue.

The land in controversy "is situate on the top and sides of a high ridge, and is covered heavily in most places with redwood timber and brush, and is now chiefly valuable for its timber. The surface is broken, cut up with deep ravines in places, and steep, while in places there are a few acres level enough that it could be plowed if it were cleaned of timber. The soil is poor and rocky in places. There are two or three of the 40's in dispute that, if the timber was moved therefrom, the greater part thereof would be suitable for cultivation, but would not produce ordinary agricultural crops in average quantities, and is more valuable for timber than for agriculture." The conclusion drawn from the facts was that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that the defendant was entitled to a patent for the land applied for by him, upon his surrendering his certificate of purchase, and paying the balance due for purchase money and interest. That the judgment was properly entered against the plaintiff appears to be clear. He stated in his affidavit that there was no occupation of the land applied for by him adverse to any that he had, and this statement was found by the court to be untrue, so far as regards the land in controversy. It is contended that this finding was not justified by the probative facts found as to Dingwall's occupation, but we think it was. Dingwall built a cabin on the land, and was living in it with his family. He claimed the land, and offered to sell his claim to the plaintiff; and the plaintiff knew of his residence and claim when he made his application. But, even if these probative facts were not sufficient to justify the finding, still the evidence is not before us, and we cannot say that that did not justify it. It results that, under the well-settled rule in such cases, the plaintiff acquired by his application no rights to the land in contest which can be enforced in the courts. McKenzie v. Brandon, 71 Cal. 209, 12 Pac. Rep. 428; Mosely v. Torrence, 71 Cal. 318, 12 Pac. Rep. 430; Plummer v. Woodruff, 72 Cal. 29, 11 Pac. Rep. 871, and 13 Pac. Rep. 51; Harbin v. Burghart, 76 Cal. 119, 18 Pac. Rep. 127.

It is further contended that judgment should at least have been entered in favor of the plaintiff for the 80 acres applied for by him, and not included in the application of defendant. But there was no contest as to that 80-acre tract, and the court had therefore no jurisdiction to determine the plaintiff's rights to it. The judgment was necessarily limited to the land in contest, and could determine nothing in regard to land not in contest.

The only remaining question is as to the rights of defendant. The rule is settled that, when one seeks to purchase land from the state, he must state in his affidavit, and state truly, all the facts required to be stated therein; and, when a case is brought into court for the determination of conflicting claims to the land, each party must set forth in his pleadings, and show by his proofs, that he has strictly complied with the law, and by such compliance has become entitled to make the purchase. If he fails to do this, judgment will be entered against him. Gilson v. Robinson, 68 Cal. 543, 10 Pac. Rep. 193; McKenzie v. Brandon, 71 Cal. 211, 12 Pac. Rep. 428; Harbin v. Burghart, 76 Cal. 119, 18 Pac. Rep. 127. The constitution provides that "lands belonging to this state which are suitable for cultivation shall be granted only to actual settlers, and in quantities not exceeding three hundred and twenty acres to each settler, under such conditions as shall be prescribed by law." Article 17, § 3. The statute in 1883 (Pol. Code, § 3495) provided that an applicant to purchase any portion of a sixteenth or thirty-sixth section must state in his affidavit, among other things, "that he is an actual settler thereon," without regard to the character of the land. This section was amended in 1885, so as to read: "The affidavit must also state whether the land is or is not suitable for cultivation; and, if it is, that the applicant is an actual settler thereon." The defendant stated in his affidavit that he was an actual settler on the land applied for, and the court found that the affidavit complied with the law, and all the facts set forth were true. The affidavit was therefore sufficient at the time it was made, and it was not rendered insufficient by the subsequent change in the statute. He alleged in his answer that he was an actual settler on the land when he filed his application, and when the certificate of purchase was issued to him, but as to this averment there was no finding. He also alleged that the land was not suitable for cultivation, and the only finding as to the cultivatable character of the land was that above quoted. Now, as there was no finding that defendant was an actual settler on the land when he obtained his certificate of purchase, it must be presumed that he was not. It follows, if one-half or more of any legal subdivision was suitable for cultivation, that as to such subdivision the certificate was improperly issued, and the defendant acquired no rights thereto under it.

The question, then, is, was the land or some portion of it suitable for cultivation? The finding is of somewhat doubtful import, but, as we construe it, we think the question must be answered in the affirmative. The language used is: "There are two or three of the forties in dispute that, if the timber was moved therefrom, the greater part thereof would be suitable for cultivation, but would not produce ordinary agricultural crops in average quantities." The fact that the land in most places was heavily covered with redwood timber and brush did not render it unsuitable for cultivation, within the meaning of the constitution. Manley v. Cunningham, 72 Cal. 236, 13 Pac. Rep. 622. Nor did the fact that it would not, when cleared, produce ordinary agricultural crops, in average quantities, render it so. To make an average, some lands must necessarily produce less than the average, while others produce more; and it would seem absurd to say that all lands producing less than the average must, for that reason, be held unsuitable for cultivation. Nor do we think the fact that the land was more valuable for timber than for agriculture decisive of the question. Land may be very valuable for the timber upon it, and also be valuable for agricultural purposes after it is cleared; and this may be true of the land in question. It follows that, if any of the 40's were suitable for cultivation, within the meaning of the constitution, they should not have been included in the judgment for defendant. We advise, therefore, that the judgment, in so far as it is against the plaintiff, be affirmed; and that, in so far as it is in favor of the defendant, it be reversed; and the cause remanded to the court below for a new trial.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment, in so far as it is against the plaintiff, is affirmed; and, in so far as it is in favor of the defendant, it is reversed; and the cause remanded to the court below for a new trial.

AGASSIZ et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT. (No. 14,050.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1891.)

PROHIBITION — ATTACHMENT AGAINST NON-RESIDENT — REMEDY BY APPEAL.

Where, in an action against non-residents to enforce payment of subscription to the capital stock of a corporation, an attachment was issued against land in this state belonging to defendant, a writ of prohibition will not lie to restrain plaintiff from proceeding in the cause upon the ground that it is not a cause wherein an attachment would lie, since there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, in the ordinary course of law, by appeal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Edward J. Pringle, for petitioners.
Pillsbury & Blanding, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition, commanding the respondent to refrain from entering default or judgment against petitioners in a certain action in which Charles Kohler, assignee in insolvency of the California Land & Timber Company, a corporation, is plaintiff, and these petitioners and others are defendants. It appears from the petition that the petitioners are stockholders in said corporation above named, which was organized under the laws of California, for the purpose of doing business here, and are also, individually, the owners of certain lands in this state; but that they are citizens and residents of Massachusetts, and absent from California, and have been served only by publication of summons. One purpose of the said action of Kohler, assignee, against said corporation, was to collect from the defendants (petitioners here) certain moneys alleged to be due from petitioners to said corporation upon subscriptions to the capital stock thereof; and, upon the proper statutory affidavits being made, a writ of attachment was issued by virtue of which certain lands of petitioner were attached, — the said lands being in this state. Petitioners specially appeared in said action for the purpose of moving to discharge said attachment. They made such motion, and it was denied by the court. Whereupon they commenced the present proceeding in this court, and ask that respondent be prohibited from proceeding further in said action against petitioners, because, as they say, respondent has no jurisdiction so to do, for the reason that petitioners are non-residents. They concede that there would be such jurisdiction if the writ of attachment was properly issued and levied; but they contend that, no matter how sufficient the affidavits for attachment may have been, the complaint itself shows the action to be one in which no attachment could be legally obtained. On the surface said action seems to have been "an action upon a contract, express or implied, against a defendant not residing in this state," within the meaning of subdivision 2 of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and therefore one in which an attachment would lie; but we do not propose to examine or determine that question, because, in our opinion, prohibition is not a remedy which petitioners in this instance can invoke. Petitioners had the right to appeal from the order refusing to dissolve the attachment, and would have an appeal from any final judgment in the case; and such appeal, being a "plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law," within the meaning of section 1103 of the Code of Civil Procedure, prohibition does not lie. A remedy does not fail to be speedy and adequate because, by pursuing it through the "ordinary course of law," more time would probably be consumed than in the proceeding here sought to be used. And it makes no difference that in this instance a question of jurisdiction incidentally depends upon the validity of an attachment. If that were so, then, in every ordinary civil action, whenever a defendant chose to raise a point of jurisdiction, either of the person or of the subject-matter, he could, by prohibition, stop the ordinary progress of the action towards a judgment, until this court had passed upon the intermediate question; and thus this tribunal would, in innumerable cases, be converted from an appellate to a nisi prius court. Petitioners complain of the hardship which they would suffer if obliged to pursue ordinary remedies, but their complaint really is that further special privileges and advantages are not added to those which, as non-residents, they already possess. Owing to our particular system of government, and certain judicial decisions, residents of other states, although doing business and owning property in California, are not compelled, in most instances, to submit themselves to the jurisdiction of our courts when our citizens seek to enforce rights against them, although they may seek the aid of our courts when desirous of enforcing their own rights. But with respect to the question before us they are in no different position from that of a resident defendant who chose, in the ordinary course of a civil action, to raise a question about the validity of an attachment, or the jurisdiction of the court. In either case, the remedy is by appeal, and whatever hardship that remedy might impose would be common to both. The substantially correct rule is stated in High's Extraordinary Legal Remedies as follows: "Like all other extraordinary remedies, prohibition is to be resorted to only in cases where the usual and ordinary forms of remedy are insufficient to afford redress; and it is a principle of universal application, and one which lies at the very foundation of the law of prohibition, that the jurisdiction is strictly confined to cases where no other remedy exists, and it is always a sufficient reason for withholding the writ that the party aggrieved has another and complete remedy at law." Section 770. And, further, the same author says: "Thus, where the defendant, in an action instituted in an inferior court, pleads to the jurisdiction of such court, and his plea is overruled, no sufficient cause is presented for granting a prohibition, since ample remedy may be had by an appeal from the final judgment in the cause. Nor will the writ go to restrain an inferior court from proceeding with certain attachments, upon the ground of the insufficiency of the affidavit on which the attachments were issued, since the court itself may afford relief, or the party aggrieved may resort to an appeal." Section 771. Moreover, the point was directly decided by this court, and applied even to a criminal case, in Strouse v. Police Court, 85 Cal. 49, 24 Pac. Rep. 747. In that case the petitioner for the writ had pleaded to the jurisdiction of the police court; but the court here, PATERSON, J., delivering the opinion, said: "If the petitioner should be convicted in the police court, he will have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law by an appeal to the superior court. Application for writ denied." See, also, Murphy v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 598, 24 Pac. Rep. 310; Levy v. Wilson, 69 Cal. 105, 10 Pac. Rep. 272; State v. Cory, 35 Minn. 178, 28 N. W. Rep. 217. The demurrer to the application is sustained, and the proceeding dismissed.

MILLER, (McCoy, Intervenor,) v. BYRD.
(No. 13,879.)*(Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1891.)SWAMP LAND—PURCHASE by COUNTY TREASURER.

Since, under the laws of California, the duties of the county treasurer in respect of swamp lands are merely to receive payment of the purchase money, whose amount and the conditions of whose payment are fixed by statute, and report the same to the register of the land-office, he is not disqualified to apply for and purchase such land himself.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Brown & Daggett, for appellant. N. O. Bradley and Lambertson & Taylor, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The plaintiff, E. O. Miller, brought this action against five defendants, to determine a contest as to which one of the parties thereto was entitled to purchase from the state a certain tract of swamp and overflowed land in Tulare county. The court below found that all of the applications to purchase the land were null and void, and accordingly gave judgment that neither of the parties to the action was entitled to purchase the land, or any part thereof. From this judgment the defendant Byrd alone appeals, and the case is brought here on the judgment roll.

The only question presented for consideration and decision is as to the rights of the appellant. The facts, as shown by the pleadings and findings, may be briefly stated as follows: During the year 1873 the appellant was the duly elected, qualified, and acting treasurer of the county of Tulare. He desired to purchase the land in controversy, and, for the purpose of doing so, on the 3d day of January, 1873, made an affidavit in the form prescribed by section 3443 of the Political Code; and all the facts and matters therein stated were true. On the same day the affidavit was filed in the office of the surveyor of the county, and within 30 days thereafter the surveyor made a survey of the land, and completed the survey, plat, and field-notes thereof, and recorded them in a book kept in his office, and forwarded duplicate copies thereof, together with a copy of the application, to the surveyor general of the state for approval. These papers were received by the surveyor general, and filed in his office, on the 25th of January, 1873, and on the same day he duly approved the survey and application. On the 15th day of March, 1873, the appellant paid to the county treasurer of Tulare county, in gold coin of the United States, 20 per cent. of the purchase price of the land, and interest on the balance thereof at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from January 25, 1873, to January 1, 1874, together with $3 for the certificate of purchase. The county treasurer reported to the register of the state land-office the fact of the payment of these sums, and thereafter, on the 8th of April, 1873, the register issued to and in the name of the appellant a certificate of purchase for the land, signed by him and attested by his official seal. At that time no other application to purchase the land, or any part thereof, had been made. When appellant made his application, on the 3d of January, the land had been segregated as swamp and overflowed land, under authority of the United States, for more than six months. At the time of the trial the land was suitable for cultivation. It will be observed that the court found all the facts necessary to show that the land in controversy was subject to sale by the state, and that the appellant was qualified to purchase the land; and his proceedings to accomplish that end were regular and effective, unless the fact that he was county treasurer at the time debarred him of the right. It seems clear, therefore, that in making its decision that appellant's application was null and void the court below must have acted on the theory that, because appellant was county treasurer, he was an agent of the state for the sale of swamp lands in his county, and hence was disqualified to purchase the land in question. In Edwards v. Estell, 48 Cal. 194, it was held that a county surveyor, in receiving an application to purchase swamp lands, and making a survey of them, was an agent of the state for the sale of such lands, and therefore could not himself become the purchaser; and incidentally it was said that a county treasurer, in receiving the purchase money for swamp lands, was an agent of the state for the sale of the lands.

It is a settled rule that one acting in a fiduciary capacity cannot deal with himself as an individual, for the reason that an opportunity would thereby be presented for the commission of frauds. Under the provisions of the Code in 1873 the rule thus declared was clearly applicable to a county surveyor. He received the application to purchase, surveyed the land applied for, if a survey had not already been made, and then forwarded the survey and application to the surveyor general for approval. It would have been possible for him, after an application had been presented and a survey requested, to have made another application for himself, and to have forwarded his own application with the survey to the surveyor general first; or he might, in making a survey for himself, have included more acres within the lines surveyed and marked out than appeared and were reported; thus committing a fraud upon the first applicant or the state. But does the rule apply to a county treasurer? He had no duties to perform until after all the preliminary steps to effect the purchase had been taken and approved by the surveyor general. Then he was simply to receive from the purchaser, if offered within 50 days after the approval, 20 per cent. of the purchase money, with interest on the balance till the 1st of January following, and $3 for a certificate of purchase, and to report these payments to the register of the land-office. The money was to be placed to the credit of the "Swamp Land Fund" of the county. The statute fixed the price of the land, the rate of interest to be paid, and the terms and conditions of payment. The treasurer had, therefore, no opportunity to commit frauds upon the state unless he did so by misappropriating or stealing the money. But such a fraud might have been committed as well by misappropriating any other money paid into the treasury. If the theory suggested be true, it would seem to follow that, if appellant had applied to purchase the land, and his application had been approved, before he became county treasurer, he could not have completed the purchase by the payment of the money after he became county treasurer, because he would then have been the agent of the state to sell the land and receive the purchase money; or, if he had applied to purchase the land, and his application had been approved, and he had made the first payment of principal and interest, and a certificate of purchase had been issued to him, and thereafter he had become county treasurer, he could not have completed the purchase by paying the interest and balance due the state, because he would have been compelled to make such payment to himself, and, being the agent of the state for the sale of the land, his agency would have disqualified him in the premises; and, as a consequence, he would have forfeited his rights under the certificate of purchase if the state had proceeded against him on account of his non-payment. But this would be giving the law an absurd construction, and one never contemplated or intended by the law-makers. We see no practical difference between the duties of a county treasurer in the sale of swamp lands and those of registers and receivers in the sale of government lands at private entry. It is, however, well settled that registers and receivers may purchase government lands at private entry at the price fixed by the government. Lester, Land Laws, pp. 337, 338. The practice has been sanctioned by the land department of the general government, and it has not been suggested that the practice has violated any rule of public policy, or that the government or any citizen has been defrauded by means thereof. In our opinion, therefore, the decision as to the validity of appellant's application to purchase the land in question was erroneous.

It is further suggested in the brief filed by the intervenor that appellant was not entitled to have judgment entered in his favor, because it appeared that the land had become suitable for cultivation, and it did not appear that he was or had ever been an actual settler thereon. We see no force in this suggestion. When appellant made his application and obtained his certificate of purchase the land was not suitable for cultivation, and there was no provision of the constitution or statutes at that time that state lands suitable for cultivation could only be sold to actual settlers thereon. The certificate of purchase as prima facie evidence of legal title in the holder, (Pol. Code, § 3514; Code Civil Proc. § 1925;) and it must be presumed that the new constitution did not, and was not intended to, impair the obligation of contracts already made. The validity of the certificate must therefore be determined by the law in force at the time it was issued, and it cannot be affected by law subsequently passed. The case of Dillon v. Saloude, 68 Cal. 267, 9 Pac. Rep. 162, is not in conflict with what has been said. That case simply held that where one had only made application to purchase land suitable for cultivation before the adoption of the constitution in 1879, he could not, after its adoption, complete the purchase unless he was an actual settler on the land. It results, in our opinion, that the judgment against defendant Byrd should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in his favor on the findings.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment against defendant Byrd is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in his favor on the findings.

BRADY V. BURKE et al. (No. 13,207.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1891.)

STREET ASSESSMENTS—PRIORITY OF LIENS—FORECLOSURE—PARTIES—APPEAL—TIME OF TAKING—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. Where findings and an order for judgment are filed, but the judgment is not formally entered, an affirmance on appeal does not divest the trial court of jurisdiction to afterwards enter it, since an appeal, before formal entry, is premature and unauthorized, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 939, providing that an appeal from a final judgment may be taken within one year after entry thereof.

2. A judgment foreclosing a prior lien for street assessments conveys a superior title to one foreclosing a junior lien, although the latter judgment was first entered; and, although the junior lienholder had no notice of the pendency of foreclosure proceedings, the purchaser of such superior title may show, in an action to determine adverse claims, that the junior liens were invalid.

3. The purchaser, under foreclosure of such subsequent assessment, has no equitable right to require a sale of the property for the satisfaction of liens in the order of their priority, where the liens under which he claims have expired.

4. One who, without notice, takes title under foreclosure of a street assessment pending a suit to foreclose junior assessment liens, is a necessary party to the latter suit, since he holds the legal title, and, if not so made, he is not bound by the decree.

5. Where the bill of exceptions does not set out the evidence, but merely states that it was sufficient to justify certain findings, insufficient of themselves to establish the validity of a street assessment, it will be assumed that the evidence was sufficient to establish such validity, and the omission of the necessary findings, without which the assessment would be invalid, is not ground for reversal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

J. M. Wood and J. C. Bates, for appellants. Sawyer & Burnett, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine adverse claims to two lots in the city of San Francisco. All of the parties claim under a common source of title. The plaintiff, who is the respondent her-claims title to both lots upon sales made under judgments foreclosing certain street assessments, recorded November 14, 1870, and deeds executed by the sheriff on October 3, 1885, in pursuance of such sales. The defendants claim an interest in the lots in controversy, based upon various street assessments against said lots made and recorded subsequently to the commencement of the foreclosure suits under which plaintiff claims, and prior to the rendition of final judgment therein. Defendant Diggins claims the legal title to lot 5 by virtue of a sheriff's deed, under a judgment foreclosing one of these assessments, and the defendant Wood the legal title to lot 6 by virtue of two deeds, based upon judgments foreclosing two of said assessments. These deeds were executed during the pendency of the foreclosure proceedings under which plaintiff claims. These defendants also claim to hold the legal title in trust for certain of their co-defendants, to the extent of their interest, under street assessment liens. It is argued here by the appellants that the plaintiff acquired no title to lot 6 by the execution sale under which he claims; that the court erred in allowing plaintiff to show that the assessments resulting in the judgments upon which deeds of defendants depend, were invalid; and that, in any event, the defendants are entitled to have the lots sold, and the proceeds applied to the satisfaction of the several liens of all the parties in the order of their priority.

1. The ground upon which defendants attack the deed under which plaintiff claims title to lot 6 is this: Findings and an order for judgment were filed in plaintiff's action against Louisa Page, the owner of this lot, on March 21, 1878, but no judgment was ever entered until January 7, 1882. On March 20, 1878, plaintiff's attorney in said action served upon defendant therein notice of the rendition of judgment, and in November, 1878, said defendant appealed from said judgment to this court, and the judgment was affirmed. There is among the papers in said action a formal decree entitled in that action, dated March 19, 1878, and signed by R. F. Morrison, then judge of the district court in which the action was pending. This formal decree was never entered as the judgment therein, and on January 7, 1882, in the same action, a judgment and decree, signed by O. P. Evans, a judge of the superior court of San Francisco, was entered. On appeal to this court from such judgment, taken by the defendant therein, it was affirmed. 5 Pac. Rep. 103. Upon the return of the remittitur execution was issued upon this judgment, and it is upon the sale thereunder that plaintiff claims title to lot 6. The appellants contend that the judgment so entered on January 7, 1882, was void under the rule announced in Mulford v. Estudillo, 32 Cal. 139. We do not think that the case cited is in point. It may be conceded that, after a final judgment of the trial court has been affirmed on appeal to this court, the court from which such appeal was taken would be without jurisdiction to retry the case, and render another judgment, and that, consequently, such subsequent judgment would be void. The reason which supports this rule is that by a valid appeal the case is removed from the jurisdiction of the lower court, and final judgment in the case is rendered in the appellate court. This, of course, terminates the litigation. But such a rule has no application here, because this court never acquired jurisdiction of the first appeal. Under section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was in force at the date of the first appeal in the case of Brady v. Page, no appeal could be taken to this court until after the entry of the judgment in the trial court, and it has been uniformly held here that an appeal taken before such entry is premature. It has also been held that the trial court can at any time before its judgment is entered change its conclusions of law, and order a different judgment. Condee v. Barton, 62 Cal. 5. Until the judgment is entered, such court retains complete jurisdiction of the case, of which it cannot be divested by any unauthorized appeal to this court. If the attention of this court had been called to the fact that it had before it an appeal from a judgment which had never been entered, and which was still within the control of the lower court, the appeal would have been dismissed. But, whether this was done or not, the appeal was ineffectual, and this court was in fact without jurisdiction to entertain it. The appeal was futile, and the case remained in the lower court undisturbed. Home for Care of Inebriates v. Kaplan, 84 Cal. 488, 24 Pac. Rep. 119. It follows that the superior court had jurisdiction to enter the judgment of January 7, 1882, and that the execution sale thereunder, under which plaintiff purchased, was not void.

2. The judgments under which plaintiff claims were conclusive as against the owners of the lots in controversy, as in each of said actions the owner of the lot upon which the lien was foreclosed was a party defendant, and therefore the execution sales transferred the legal title of such owners to the plaintiff; and, although the sheriff's deeds made to defendants Wood and Diggins antedated those of plaintiff, and are based upon judgments rendered prior to those under which plaintiff claims, yet, as the liens under which plaintiff's title has its origin are older than the liens to which the deeds of defendant relate, plaintiff has the superior legal title. Littlefield v. Nichols, 42 Cal. 374. The most that defendants can claim is that, as they were without actual or constructive notice of the pendency of plaintiff's foreclosure suits, he took such legal title incumbered with all valid liens thereon held by them at the date of his judgment. Assuming that defendants were without this notice, which is the most favorable view for appellants, the court did not err in allowing the plaintiff to show that the liens foreclosed in the actions, which resulted in the sheriff's deeds to defendants, were invalid. The plaintiff was not a party to said actions. He was not in privity with the defendants therein, within the meaning of the rule which makes those in privity with parties to an action bound by the judgment therein, because his title relates back to the date of the original liens foreclosed by the judgments under which he claims, which liens were prior in point of time to the origin of defendants' alleged title under their deeds. Shay v. McNamara, 54 Cal. 169; Chester v. Association, 64 Cal. 42; Horn v. Jones, 28 Cal. 203; Campbell v. Hall, 16 N. Y. 575. In this latter case will be found a very full and satisfactory discussion of the rule which makes those in privity with parties to a judgment also concluded by it. As to two of the deeds relied upon by defendants, it is found that the work for which the assessment underlying said deeds was made was not completed within the time fixed by the contract, and that the order of the board of supervisors granting an extension was not made until after the expiration of the time allowed by the contract for its completion. This being so, it has been repeatedly held that the contractor never acquired any valid lien upon the property. Beveridge v. Livingston, 54 Cal. 54; Raisch v. City and County of San Francisco, 80 Cal. 1, 22 Pac. Rep. 22; Fanning v. Schammel, 68 Cal. 428, 9 Pac. Rep. 427. As to the other deed to defendant Wood, the court finds that the board of supervisors failed to publish for the length of time required by law the resolution of intention to do the street-work, which resulted in the subsequent assessment, foreclosure, and deed. This failure to publish rendered the assessment void. Richardson v. Tobin, 45 Cal. 32. Upon the facts found by the court, the alleged liens, upon which defendants' deeds depend for their validity, were void, and defendants acquired no interest in said lots as against plaintiff by said deeds.

3. The point, however, most earnestly insisted on by appellants, is that the court should at least have directed the lots to be sold, and the proceeds applied in satisfaction of all liens which were originally valid, in the order of their priority. The argument seems to be that, as plaintiff is asking for relief from a court of equity, the court may require him to do equity. All of the liens asserted by defendants are creations of the statute, and most of them have long expired by the lapse of time given for their enforcement by the statute in which they have their origin. As to some, no steps whatever have been taken to enforce them, while others were foreclosed more than six months before the commencement of this action, and no execution issued on the judgments of foreclosure, and by the express language of the statute the lien obtained by recording the assessment expires at the end of six months after the final determination of the action foreclosing it. Upon this state of facts, to say that in equity the liens still exist, and to refuse plaintiff a judgment to the effect that they do not exist, would be for the court to give the statute, which authorized their creation, an effect in direct conflict with its terms. The maxim that he who asks equity must do equity cannot be made rightfully to support such a conclusion. We have examined the cases cited by appellants on this point, and we do not think that any of them support their position. Liens of this class are purely statutory, and only exist for the term given by the statute. In their creation and enforcement they are at every step adverse to and against the consent of the owner of the property affected thereby, and he may, without violating any rule of equity, insist that the claimant shall find his right to enforce them in the statute which authorized their creation.

4. Two of the judgments foreclosing the asserted liens were rendered October 12, 1886, after the commencement of this action, and less than six months prior to the filing of the answer herein. The plaintiff was not a party to either of them, and it does not appear that he had any notice, actual or constructive, of their pendency, and is therefore not bound by them. On the day of their rendition the defendant was not the owner of the lots upon which the liens were decreed to exist, and plaintiff's deeds, showing title in him, were duly recorded. It is true that at the time of the commencement of these actions the plaintiff was not a necessary party, but he became so when he acquired the legal title, and should then, by proper proceedings, have been made a party thereto. The statute which authorized the enforcement of the liens contemplates that the legal owner, at the time of the rendition of the judgment, shall be a party, unless he is a purchaser pendente lite, affected with notice of the action. It follows that these judgments are ineffectual for any purpose, as against the title of plaintiff.

5. In regard to the pending suits for the foreclosure of the liens asserted by defendants, if it should be assumed that the defendants may yet make the plaintiff a party thereto, it is sufficient to say that the findings do not disclose that any of these alleged liens are valid. The substance of the findings on this point is that the superintendent of streets made, recorded, and issued an assessment, with a warrant and diagram thereto annexed, for the cost of the street-work named, under a contract which had been before that awarded to the contractor by the board of supervisors. All that is said in the findings may be true, and still the proceedings prior to the making and recording of the warrant, assessment, and diagram have been invalid. The board of supervisors may not have had any jurisdiction to award either of the contracts upon which the assessments were made. It was incumbent upon the defendants, asserting such liens, to show the facts establishing their validity.

As no objection was made to the answer, and the case seems to have been tried upon the theory that it was sufficient, it must be deemed here as sufficiently alleging the validity of these liens. But the court should have found the facts in regard to their creation. The bill of exceptions does disclose that evidence was introduced on this point, but there is nothing therein to indicate how the facts should have been found from such evidence. It is simply stated that the evidence was sufficient to justify certain findings named, but these findings do not assert that any of the steps required by the statute to be taken prior to the awarding of the contracts were taken. The omission of these necessary findings is not, therefore, a ground for the reversal of the judgment. Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. Rep. 1098; Winslow v. Gohransen, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 504. The opinion of HARRISON, J., in the latter case, applying the rule of Himmelman v. Henry, supra, in which opinion it was assumed that evidence had been given in relation to a matter upon which the findings were silent, is satisfactory, and leaves nothing to be added by way of argument in support of our conclusion that the judgment ought not to be reversed because of this defect in the findings. Judgment and order affirmed.

GARNIER et al. v. PORTER. (No. 14,171.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1891.)

SETTING OUT PRAIRIE FIRES—NEGLIGENCE—TREBLE DAMAGES—CRIMINAL ACT.

One who burns stubble on his own land to prepare it for the plow does not commit an unlawful act within the meaning of Penal Code Cal. § 384, providing that every person who willfully or negligently sets on fire any woods, prairies, or grasses on any lands is guilty of a misdemeanor; and, where due care and diligence are exercised in building the fire, and in endeavoring to control it after it has spread to adjoining land, there is no liability for the treble damages imposed by Pol. Code Cal. § 3344 upon one who negligently sets fire to his own woods, or who negligently permits it to extend beyond his own lands.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by Camile Garnier and Leon Garnier against George K. Porter for damages for setting out a fire. A jury was waived, and the cause tried to the court, which found for the defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Glassell, Smith & Patton, Smith, Howard & Smith, and Smith, Winder & Smith, for appellants. Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland and Chapman & Hendrick, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from judgment and order refusing plaintiffs a new trial. This action is for damages for the destruction of the hay, grasses, and pasture on 2,880 acres of land. It is charged that defendant "willfully and negligently kindled a fire on his land, and set fire to grasses growing thereon in the vicinity of the plaintiffs' land, and so negligently watched and tended the said fire that it spread over the immediate space and came to and spread over the plaintiffs' land, and consumed the hay, grass, and pasture," etc. Plaintiffs claim that they were damaged in the sum of $40,000, and that by reason of section 3344 of the Political Code they are entitled to judgment for treble that sum. The answer contained a general denial. A jury having been waived, the action was tried by the court, which found for the defendant, specifically negating all the material allegations of the complaint, and also finding that "said fire did not come upon the lands so occupied by the plaintiffs, or any portion thereof, by reason of any negligence on the part of the defendant whatever." We think the findings sufficient, and there is undoubtedly evidence to sustain them. But the plaintiffs contend that the act of defendant in setting fire to the stubble on his own lands, although an ordinary agricultural process, was unlawful, and therefore the defendant is liable for the natural consequences, irrespective of the question of negligence. This is supposed to be the effect of section 384 of the Penal Code, which is as follows: "Every person who willfully or negligently sets on fire, or causes or procures to be set on fire, any woods, prairies, grasses, or grain, on any lands, is guilty of a misdemeanor." The section is similar to section 142 of the act concerning crimes and punishments, passed April 16, 1850. That contained, however, a proviso excepting fires set by any one near his own farm for the necessary preservation thereof, after giving notice to his neighbors. St. 1850, p. 247. In 1872 an act was passed making it a misdemeanor to set fire to any wooded country or forest belonging to the state or the United States. Section 3344 of the Political Code provides that any one negligently setting fire to his own woods, or negligently suffering any fire to extend beyond his own lands, is liable in treble damages to the party injured. These citations show that from the very beginning similar penal statutes have existed in this state; and yet it has always been the policy of the state to encourage settlement of the country, the clearing of lands, and reducing them to a condition in which they would be suitable for cultivation. We all know that fire has always been one of the most common and efficient agencies in clearing and subduing wild lands; and in this state burning stubble has been from the first an ordinary agricultural process in annually preparing lands for the plow. It is not to be believed that it was intended by these penal laws to prohibit common farming operations. When the law was first enacted the lands of this state were generally uninclosed and unoccupied save for grazing purposes. Frequent fires spread over the country, destroying timber, grass, and other property. Nor are such fires very uncommon now. Unquestionably the law was designed to prevent such calamities as far as possible. To construe the statute literally, so as to interfere with ordinary farming processes, would evidently be giving it an effect not intended. Nor is such construction necessary. If one sets fire to the weeds or brush on his own land, so as to prepare it for the plow, intending to limit and control the fire, and actually does so, he has not set fire to the prairies within the meaning of this statute. If, under such circumstances, the fire gets out of his control, he has set fire to the prairie, but not willfully, although it may be negligently. It is premised that such fire is set for a lawful purpose, and there can be no doubt that agriculture constitutes such lawful purpose. If, on the other hand, a hunter, or one designing to camp upon the land of another, were to set such fire, he would perhaps be civilly liable for the natural consequences of his act, although using the greatest diligence to control the fire he had set. And there is much in the statutes cited, besides this general presumption, which favors this conclusion. The act of 1872 (St. 1871-72, p. 96) implies that one may lawfully set a forest fire on his lands, and makes it a misdemeanor to allow such fire, though "made for a lawful purpose," to spread. Section 3344 of the Political Code, in pursuance of which plaintiffs claim the right to treble damages, seems to imply that the act of setting the fire was not criminal; for it makes the liability depend upon negligence in setting the fire, or in permitting its spread. In this case the defendant, when the fire got away from him and spread over the lands of the plaintiffs, was engaged in back firing, as the custom of the farmers in that vicinity is, preparatory to burning the stubble upon his own lands in order that it might be plowed, and the evidence is that such burning was necessary to fit the land for that purpose; that in fact it could not be plowed by the ordinary means without such preparation of the land. And there was evidence which tended to show due care in setting the fire, and due diligence in endeavoring to control it after it had spread from his own land. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FITZGERALD, C.

HUNT v. MALDONADO. (No. 14,350.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1891.)

GUARDIANS—LIABILITY FOR ATTORNEY'S FEES.

A guardian is primarily liable for a debt incurred in the performance of his duties upon his contract with an attorney for professional services, and no action can be maintained thereon against the ward.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Dooner & Burdett, for appellants. J. M. Damron, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal on judgment roll from judgment on demurrer. The demurrer was properly sustained. The action is to recover an attorney's fee for services rendered to the guardian of a minor in pursuance of a written contract. The action is against the minor. If the guardian made a valid contract with the attorney, he may be held liable, and, if he pays it, and the probate court shall deem the expenditure reasonable and necessary to protect the interests of the ward, it may be allowed from the ward's estate. But it is an expense incurred by the guardian in the performance of his duties for which he is primarily liable. If an attorney's fee could ever be in the nature of a necessary for which the ward could contract, the complaint shows that the service here was not of that character. We notice that the transcript fails to show that the ward appeared by guardian, as required by section 372, Code Civil Proc. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

COSGROVE v. FISK. (No. 13,364.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1891.)

MISJOINDER OF ACTIONS—PLEADING—AVERMENTS OF FRAUD.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 427, providing that only those causes of action can be joined in the same complaint which all belong to one only of the classes therein enumerated, claims for breach of covenants of warranty of lands, for costs expended in another suit between the parties, and for fraud, malice, and oppression, cannot be joined, since they do not all belong to any one of the enumerated classes.

2. A complaint alleging a cause of action based on fraud, which does not aver the facts constituting fraud, is demurrable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Ida M. Cosgrove against Asa Fisk. Demurrer sustained, and complaint dismissed. Affirmed. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 427, provides that the plaintiff may unite several causes of action in the same complaint, where they all arise out of (1) contracts, express or implied; (2) claims to recover specific real property, with or without damage, for the withholding thereof, or for waste committed thereon, and the rents and profits of the same; (3) claims to recover specific personal property, with or without damages, for the withholding thereof; (4) claims against a trustee by virtue of a contract, or by operation of law; (5) injuries to character; (6) injuries to person; (7) injuries to property. The causes of action so united must all belong to one only of these classes.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Daniel Titus, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiff, going by the name of Ida M. Carroll, when a certain agreement, marked "Exhibit A," to the amended complaint herein, was entered into, which affected certain of her rights and interests, brought this action against the defendant, Fisk, under her present name of Ida M. Cosgrove. The complaint was demurred to upon several grounds, and the demurrer sustained. Thereupon, the plaintiff declined to amend the complaint, leave having been given her to do so, judgment was made and entered that she take nothing by her action, and that the same be dismissed. From that this appeal is taken.

The complaint contains but one count, and has united therein and mingled together a cause of action based upon the incurring by the plaintiff of $60 costs, etc., in having to bring suit against the defendant to force him to comply with his agreement in writing to reconvey certain lands and premises to the plaintiff, which she had before that conveyed to him, which sum of money, claimed to be reasonably due the plaintiff by the defendant, it is alleged he refuses to pay; with a cause of action based upon the alleged fraud, malice, and oppression of the defendant, which omits to state the facts showing such fraud; and a cause of action arising from the breach of the defendant's covenant contained in an instrument (Exhibit B) made by him to the plaintiff, which covenant, it is claimed, binds him that the property he has conveyed is free and clear of all incumbrances and liens made, done, or suffered by him. It will readily be perceived, from an examination of the pleading objected to, that it mingles together several distinct causes of action, not all belonging to any one of the classes mentioned in section 427 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which rendered the complaint obnoxious to the demurrer, that several causes of action were improperly united. Section 430, Code Civil Proc. subd. 5; Canal Co. v. Kidd, 43 Cal. 184; White v. Cox, 46 Cal. 170; Watson v. Railroad Co., 41 Cal. 17.

Furthermore, the cause of action, based upon the alleged fraud of the defendant, failed to aver the facts showing the fraud, and comes within the fourth ground of the demurrer, which is well taken. Payne v. Elliott, 54 Cal. 340; Pehrson v. Hewitt, 79 Cal. 598, 21 Pac. Rep. 950. For these reasons we advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1891.)

PRACTICE IN CIVIL CASES—DISMISSAL—LACHES—APPEALABLE ORDER.

1. It is not an abuse of discretion to dismiss a cause for want of prosecution where a demurrer to the complaint had been on file for nearly three years and a half without being called up for determination by the plaintiff, and the evidence as to a stipulation for delay is conflicting, and by the neglect of plaintiffs' counsel the attention of the court was not called to an order, previously entered by consent, continuing the cause for trial at a time to be agreed between counsel.

2. The supreme court will not entertain an appeal from an order refusing to vacate a judgment which is itself appealable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. GREENE, Judge.

Action by Casper Kubli and others against A. W. Hawkett, E. C. Robinson, and J. Robinson. Judgment dismissing the action as to the two defendants Robinson. Plaintiffs appeal therefrom, and from an order refusing to vacate such judgment. The appeal from the order dismissed. Judgment affirmed.

Geo. M. Shaw, for appellants. Edw. C. Robinson and W. R. Davis, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. The appeals here are from a judgment dismissing the action as to two of the defendants, E. C. Robinson and J. Robinson, for the want of prosecution thereof, and from an order refusing to set aside and vacate that judgment.

It has been decided by the appellate court that it will not take jurisdiction of an appeal from an order refusing to set aside a judgment or order which is itself appealable. Railroad Co. v. McGrath, 74 Cal. 51, 15 Pac. Rep. 360; Larkin v. Larkin, 76 Cal. 323, 18 Pac. Rep. 296; Goyhinech v. Goyhinech, 80 Cal. 409, 410, 22 Pac. Rep. 175. The judgment of dismissal in this action was appealable, hence the appeal from the order just mentioned must be dismissed.

From the record it appears that the action was instituted against the defendants here and one Hawkett on the 3d of November, 1883. On the 8th of July, 1885, the default of Hawkett was duly made and entered. After admission of service of summons the two defendants here concerned filed demurrers to the complaint on the 18th of July, 1885. On the 10th of December, 1888, a motion was made by them to dismiss the action, which, upon being heard upon affidavits on both sides, was granted, and a judgment of dismissal of the action made and entered. It was set up in the affidavits for the appellants that the delay in speeding the cause to a hearing upon the issue made by the demurrers to the complaint arose from an agreement by stipulation between the parties, made at the instance of one of the defendants, which delay at his instance this defendant denied in his affidavit, as also that any such stipulation existed. Upon this state of facts the trial court dismissed the action. It appears, however, that a minute order had been made in the action, which appeared upon the minutes of the court in volume 4, at page 587 thereof, as follows: "Upon motion and consent of respective counsel it is ordered that the above cause be continued and set for a time to be agreed upon by counsel, or upon five days' notice of either." But this order was never called to the attention of the court on the hearing of the motion to dismiss the action, but was made the basis of the motion to set aside the judgment of dismissal. The court below, as is readily perceived, decided the motion to dismiss, and ordered judgment upon the facts as then presented, and did not have the benefit of this order being called to its attention, which, by an inspection of the records of the court, might easily have been done by the attorney for the appellants here, especially since the affidavit of R. A. Redman had asserted the existence of a stipulation that such action as the minute order contemplated had been entered into by him with one of the appellants, an attorney of record in the case also. The point to be decided, then, is whether the trial court was guilty of an abuse of discretion in dismissing the action, upon the facts as then presented. The affidavits were conflicting in some respects, and the facts that could have been shown by the presentation of this minute order were not before it. The appellants' attorney could have found the order, and presented it. He knew that Redman's affidavit set up the existence of such a stipulation as would perhaps excuse the delay in speeding the cause to hearing. Should the appellants now be successful in maintaining the abuse of discretion of the trial court when they or their representative failed to inform the court of the existence of this order? As it seems to us, the neglect of the appellants was the cause of the court not being fully informed in the premises, and their contention should not prevail. But it is said that it was not the duty of the appellants to have urged the hearing of the demurrer; that this should have been done by the respondents, who filed it; and hence that the court was wrong in assuming that the laches of the appellants justified a dismissal of the action. The appellants brought the action. It would seem that upon them rested the burden of prosecuting it to a finality, and that, as a step in that direction, from the facts then appearing to the court, they should have taken measures to have the demurrers determined, so that the action could progress. Simmons v. Keller, 50 Cal. 39. So that we perceive no abuse of the discretion vested in the court as to this part of the transaction. Grigsby v. Napa Co., 36 Cal. 589. Again, it is argued, notwithstanding the admission that the decisions of the appellate court are to the contrary, that the trial court possesses no power to dismiss an action for the want of prosecution. As this has been declared to be within the power of the superior court, we do not concur in appellant's view. See Pardy v. Montgomery, 77 Cal. 327, 19 Pac. Rep. 530; Cowell v. Stuart, 69 Cal. 525-527, 11 Pac. Rep. 57. For these reasons we advise that the appeal from the order refusing to set aside the judgment be dismissed, and the judgment affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeal from the order refusing to set aside the judgment is dismissed, and the judgment affirmed.

CARRIE V. CLOVERDALE BANKING & COMMERCIAL CO. (No. 13,201.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1891.)

PARTNERSHIP—ABSENCE OF PARTNER—UNAUTHORIZED SALE—INSOLVENCY—PREFERENCES.

1. Under Civil Code Cal. § 2430, providing that a partner has no authority to do any act which would make it impossible to carry on the business unless his copartner has abandoned the business to him, or is incapable of acting, the fact that one partner is temporarily absent from the state does not render him incapable of acting, nor of itself constitute an abandonment of the business, and a sale by his copartner of a flock of sheep which constituted the entire property of the firm does not pass his interest therein.

2. In an action by the assignee in insolvency of the firm against the purchaser, such sale is valid as to the interest of the partner making it, when it was made in payment of a firm debt, and not fraudulent as to creditors.

3. A complaint, in an action by the assignee of an insolvent firm against a purchaser, alleging that a sale of firm property by one partner was void for preferences under Insolvent Act Cal. 1880, § 55, may be amended by adding a count alleging that it was also void, as having been made in excess of the authority of the partner.

Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; JOHN G. PRESSLEY, Judge.

Action in trover by Carrie, as assignee of the insolvent firm of Scott & Staley, against the Cloverdale Banking & Commercial Company. Trial to the court. Judgment for plaintiff for the full amount claimed, and defendant appeals. Reversed. The complaint alleged that the sale by one of the partners to defendant of the entire property of the firm was in violation of Insolvent Act Cal. 1880, § 55, providing, among other things, that if a person, being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, within one month before the filing of a petition against him, with a view to give a preference to any creditor, makes any transfer of any part of his property to one having reason to believe such person to be insolvent, such transfer is void, and the assignee may recover the property, or its value, as assets of the insolvent. An amendment to the complaint alleged in another count that the sale had been made by one of the partners during the temporary absence from the state of the other, who had not abandoned the business to his copartner, and that the sale, covering all of the property, was invalid, under Civil Code Cal. § 2430, providing, among other things, that a partner, as such, has no authority to do any act which would make it impossible to carry on the ordinary business of the partnership, or to dispose of the whole of the property at once, unless it consists of merchandise, unless his copartners have wholly abandoned the business to him, or are incapable of acting. The court found that the sale was not void under section 55 of the insolvent act, and that the sale was in satisfaction of the firm indebtedness, and was not fraudulent as to creditors.

McGee & Barham, for appellant. A. B. Wade and W. E. McConnell, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff, as assignee in insolvency of the firm of Scott & Staley, to recover the value of certain sheep, alleged in one count of the complaint to have been sold to defendant by said firm, in violation of section 55 of the insolvent act of this state. The second count of the complaint charges the sale of said sheep to have been made by only one of the partners, Staley, and that, as the sheep constituted the entire stock owned by the partnership, the sale made it impossible thereafter to carry on the ordinary business of said firm, and that the business of said firm had not been abandoned to the partner making this sale, nor was the surviving partner incapable of acting, and further alleges a conversion of the sheep by the defendant. This second cause of action was not in the original complaint, but was added by way of amendment during the trial. The court, in its finding of facts, negated the first cause of action stated in the complaint, and found the above facts alleged in the second count. It also found the full value of the sheep to be $5,157, and gave judgment against the defendant for that sum.

1. The court did not err in permitting the complaint to be amended by adding thereto the second cause of action, and thus to attack the contract under which defendant claims, upon the grounds therein alleged as well as upon those stated in the original complaint. In both the original and amended complaints the plaintiff bases his right to maintain the action upon the alleged invalidity of the said contract of sale, and it was certainly proper for the court to allow the complaint to be so amended as to state all of the grounds upon which it is claimed that such contract is invalid.

2. The fact that Scott was temporarily absent from the state at the time of the sale did not render him incapable of acting, within the meaning of section 2430 of the Civil Code, nor of itself constitute an abandonment of the business of the firm to his copartner, and the sale of the sheep made to defendant by Staley was therefore in excess of his authority as a member of the firm of Scott & Staley, (Civil Code, § 2430,) and did not pass Scott's interest in the sheep.

3. The court below, in rendering judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the full value of the sheep, proceeded upon the theory that this sale was absolutely void, and that the defendant acquired no rights thereunder which it can assert against the plaintiff. We cannot concur in this view. The sale, though ineffectual to pass the title of Scott, was binding upon Staley, and transferred his interest in the sheep, and neither he nor the firm of Scott & Staley, represented by plaintiff, can maintain an action for their conversion upon the ground that Staley had exceeded his authority in making the sale. This is the rule which is laid down by the best-considered cases, in passing upon the rights of a copartnership growing out of an unauthorized sale of partnership property by one of its members in payment of his private indebtedness. Homer v. Wood, 11 Cush. 68; Farley v. Lovell, 103 Mass. 387; Craig v. Hulschizer, 34 N. J. Law, 364. Such an act of a partner is neither more nor less in excess of his authority as such than was the sale by Staley in this instance, and we see no reason why the remedy for the unauthorized act should not in this, as well as in that class of cases, be confined to the non-consenting partner. This must be so, because he is the only person wronged, and he only to the extent of the value of his interest in the property sold. A sale of partnership property made by one partner, under the circumstances found by the court in this case, is valid as against every person, except such non-consenting partner, or one who has succeeded to his right of action therefor. The creditors of the firm of Scott & Staley have no ground for complaint which can be asserted through plaintiff as the successor of Scott, or as assignee of Scott & Staley, the court having found that the sale was made in satisfaction of an indebtedness of the firm, and that such sale was not fraudulent, nor made for the purpose of giving the defendant a fraudulent preference. The judgment in favor of plaintiff for the full value of the whole property cannot, therefore, be justified upon the claim that Scott's right, as a partner, to have the property applied to the payment of the firm debts was violated by such sale, and we know of no ground upon which the judgment can be sustained upon the facts as alleged and found. It cannot be assumed, without either allegation or proof, that Scott owned more than an undivided half of the sheep, or that upon a settlement of the accounts between himself and partner it would appear that he had a lien upon the other half, for a balance due him as a partner, and therefore a special interest therein to that extent. The sale was, as to Scott, a conversion of his interest in said property, and he had a right to so treat it as against the defendant claiming title to the whole property under it; or, in a proper action, he could have enforced against the whole property transferred, or its value in the hands of defendant, a lien for any balance which might be found due him from his copartner upon a settlement of the partnership accounts, and, these being vested rights of action relating to property, passed to the plaintiff as assignee of the insolvent firm of Scott & Staley.

Plaintiff does not ask for an accounting between the partners, for the purpose of ascertaining the interest of each in the property sold after the satisfaction of any partnership liens to which in equity it is subject, but has elected to sue for a conversion; and, we think, the amount of damages he is entitled to recover, in this form of action, is measured by the value of the undivided half of the sheep sold, without any reference to the state of the partnership accounts between Scott & Staley. This is the rule that was applied in the case of Walsh v. Adams, 3 Denio, 125. That was an action of trover, brought by one partner against a sheriff, who, on an execution against another member of the firm, had seized and sold the whole of certain property belonging to the partnership. It was contended for the defendant in that case that the plaintiff was only entitled to recover what the value of his interest in the property would appear to be on an accounting with his copartner. The trial court refused to so instruct the jury, and the supreme court of New York, on appeal, Jewett, J., delivering the opinion of the court, affirmed this action, and said: "As to the question of damages, I entertain no doubt but that the general rule must control the question in this case. Under the rule the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of his undivided share in the property converted by the defendant, irrespective of the question whether the partnership was or was not solvent, and without regard to the state of the partnership accounts." We find no error in the record for which a new trial should be ordered, and will therefore remand the case, with directions to enter the proper judgment upon the facts as found. Judgment and order reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment on the findings in favor of plaintiff for one-half of the value of the sheep as found, and interest on that amount from the date of the conversion, and for the costs of the trial in the court below.

FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH OF SAN JOSÉ v.
BRANHAM, Sheriff, et al. (No. 13,376.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1891.)

ACTIONS BY CORPORATION DE FACTO—REAL PARTY IN INTEREST.

1. The trustees of a corporation de facto can sue in its corporate name until its existence is questioned by a direct proceeding on information of the attorney general.

2. A corporation, to the trustees of which property is conveyed for its use and benefit, has sufficient interest to protect the same by suit in its own name.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara County; F. E. SPENCER, Judge.

Laine & Hatch, for appellants. J. B. Lamar, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The plaintiff, claiming to be the owner and in the possession of certain church property, consisting of real estate, the church building situate thereon, and personal property used therein and belonging thereto, brought this action to restrain the defendants from, interfering with said property, and to quiet its title thereto against said defendants other than the said Branham, sheriff of Santa Clara county. The defendants deny that the plaintiff is a corporation, and also deny that the plaintiff is seised and possessed of the property. Judgment in the trial court went for the plaintiff, and this is an appeal from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. The motion of respondent to dismiss the appeal is denied.

Appellant relies upon two propositions to sustain his position: First, that the plaintiff has no legal existence as a corporation; second, that it is not seised and possessed of the property involved in this litigation. As far as the present proceeding is concerned, it is immaterial whether the plaintiff is a corporation de jure or not. It is at least a corporation de facto, and as such its trustees can maintain suits in its corporate name until its existence is called in question by a direct proceeding upon information of the attorney general of the state. In People v. La Rue, 67 Cal. 530, 8 Pac. Rep. 84, the court says: "A corporation de facto may legally do and perform every act and thing which the same entity could do or perform were it a de jure corporation. As to all the world except the paramount authority under which it acts, and from which it receives its charter, it occupies the same position as though in all respects valid, and even as against the state, except in direct proceedings to arrest its usurpation of power, it is submitted its acts are to be treated as efficacious." Association v. Chester, 55 Cal. 99; 4 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 197; Tayl. Corp. §§ 145-153. It seems the plaintiff, under sanction of the court, has mortgaged this property for $4,000, which debt is still due and unpaid. Unquestionably the plaintiff could be sued in its corporate name to foreclose this mortgage, and it is equally clear that it can maintain this suit in its corporate name to protect the property secured by the mortgage. As to the second proposition contended for by appellant,—that the plaintiff was not and is not seised and possessed of the property in dispute,—the trial court found that "plaintiff, ever since its incorporation, had been seised and possessed of said property, and that said property is under the management and control of a board of five trustees, and is used for the purposes of said corporation. That the defendants do not constitute the 'First Baptist Church of San José,' but are members thereof." Upon September 1, 1858, Marshall D. Young, by deed of grant, bargain, and sale, conveyed this realty to Bird, Gish, Easley, and Pierce, their heirs and assigns. At this time these last-named parties were the trustees of the First Baptist Church of San José. In January, 1866, the plaintiff was incorporated, elected five trustees, and upon each succeeding January elected their successors. In September, 1869, Bird, Gish, and Easley, not as trustees, but as individuals, quitclaimed all their interest in the property to the trustees of plaintiff, naming them, and their successors in office. Shortly afterwards Pierce quitclaimed in the same manner. By the deed from Young the title to this property vested in these four parties, their heirs and assigns, not as trustees of plaintiff, but personally and individually; and their quitclaim deeds clearly divested them of all title they held. It was not necessary that their deed should be the joint act of all. They were not trustees of the church at this time. Neither was the property deeded to them in the capacity of trustees in the first instance. Counsel for appellants say that "if the deeds conveying this property had run to the trustees of the church without naming them, it is probable that the church, as a corporation, would have been the party to sue." It is highly improbable that the present trustees of the plaintiff were the grantees in the aforesaid quitclaim deeds, and appellant's concession works against him upon this contention. While the dry, naked, legal title to the property may not be in plaintiff, yet its trustees hold it in trust for the uses of plaintiff, and their ownership and possession is the ownership and possession of the plaintiff. We cannot understand how it is material to the interests of defendants in the action whether the plaintiff or its trustees is technically seised of the legal title to this realty. The plaintiff has certainly sufficient interest to bring this action. Let the order be affirmed.

SCHMIDT et al. v. MARKET ST. & W. G. R. Co. (No. 13,337.)

STREET ASSESSMENTS—COLLECTION—NOTICE OF IMPROVEMENT—PLEADING.

1. Under the authority of Civil Code Cal. § 497, a city granted to defendant railroad company authority to lay tracks in its streets by an ordinance which provided that when any street over which its road should pass should be ordered improved by the city, defendant should be held for the payment of its proportion of the cost, to be collected in the manner provided for the collection of other street assessments. Held, that defendant, in accepting the ordinance, agreed to pay its proportion of the cost of improving any street occupied by its tracks, whether the improvement should be ordered under its then existing charter or under legislative authority subsequently granted, and that the same could be collected in any manner subsequently provided by the city.

2. Notice of a proposed street improvement, containing the whole of the resolution for the improvement, and stating its date, and the fact of its passage, is sufficient.

3. Mere defects in the mode of alleging a cause of action will not impair the validity of a judgment rendered after a trial on the merits, unless taken advantage of by special demurrer.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; JOHN REYNOLDS, Judge.

T. H. Laine and Laine & Hatch, for appellant. C. T. Bird, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Section 497 of the Civil Code provides that "authority to lay railroad tracks through the streets and public highways of any incorporated city or town may be obtained for a term of years not exceeding fifty from the trustees, council, or other body to whom is intrusted the government of the city or town, under such restrictions and limitations, and upon such terms and payment of license tax, as the city or town authority may provide." The ordinance of the city of San José, passed March 7, 1876, under which the defendant obtained the right to construct and maintain a street railroad in said city, contained the following condition: "Whenever any part of any street over which this road shall run shall be ordered improved or reimproved, and the work of improving such street shall be let by contract, the part of said street occupied by said track or tracks, and two feet on either side thereof, shall be let together with the rest of the street or streets; and the grantee herein named, or its successors and assigns, shall be held for the payment of the cost of said improvement, which cost shall be assessed in the proper proportion of the width of the track and two feet on either side thereof, to the whole width of the street or streets so improved, and collected in the manner provided for the collection of other street assessments, and shall become a lien upon the road-bed, rolling stock, and franchise of said road." On the 19th of May, 1887, in pursuance of proceedings therefor taken in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 18, 1885, entitled "An act to provide for work upon streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places, and sidewalks, and for the construction of sewers, within municipalities," (St. 1885, p. 147,) the plaintiffs entered into a contract with the commissioner of streets of the city of San José for certain improvements upon a portion of Market street over which the defendant had constructed its road, and, after the completion of the work, received an assessment for the expenses incurred for said work, together with a warrant for its collection. By said assessment the defendant, and the road-bed and space between the rails, and two feet on each outer side of the railroad track upon said portion of Market street, was assessed in the sum of $957.50, as its proportion of the cost of the improvement of said street. This action was brought to recover the amount of the assessment, and is defended upon the ground that by the aforesaid act of March 18, 1885, no liability whatever can be created against the defendant for work done under its provisions. Section 7 of the act of March 18, 1885, provides that "the expenses incurred for any work authorized by section 2 of this act, which shall not include such portion of any street as is required by law to be kept in order or repaired by any person or company having railroad tracks thereon, shall be assessed upon the lots and lands fronting thereon." No mode is provided in the act for collecting from a street-railroad corporation whose road occupies a portion of the street any portion of the expense of improving the street. It may also be observed that the original act under which the city of San José was reincorporated (St. 1874, p. 395) is equally devoid of such provision. The amendatory section referred to by counsel for appellant (St. 1876, p. 627) has reference only to the special condition therein expressed, that the street or any portion thereof is "dangerous, or in a condition to cause great public inconvenience;" and does not apply to the general provision for improvements of streets. It was doubtless in view of this fact that, when the common council of San José, under the authority given it by section 497, Civil Code, granted the defendant its franchise, it attached thereto as one of the "terms," which by said section it was authorized to impose, a condition that the defendant would bind itself to pay the cost of any improvement of that portion of the street occupied by it. The acceptance by the defendant of its franchise under this condition was equivalent to an express agreement for the payment by it of its proportion of the cost of whatever improvement of the street the city should at any time order. This liability was not limited to such improvement as the city should order under its charter as it then existed, nor was the collection of the amount confined to the mode then provided for the collection of other street assessments. The language of the condition is general in its terms, and embraces all work of improving the street, under whatever statute it may be ordered, and every mode which may be provided for the collection of other assessments. The contention by the appellant that, by the terms of the condition contained in the ordinance it can be held liable for the payment of the assessment only to the city of San José, cannot be sustained. By accepting this franchise with the terms and conditions which were made a part thereof the defendant agreed that it would be "held" for the payment of its proportion of the cost of this improvement, and that the amount of this assessment might be collected in the manner provided for the collection of other street assessments, and should become a lien upon the road-bed, rolling stock, and franchise of said road. The only reasonable construction to be given to its agreement is that it would be "held" to the person entitled to make the collection. The manner of collecting other street assessments provided by the act of 1885, under which this improvement was made, is by a suit brought by the contractor in his own name, (St. 1885, § 12, p. 157;) and this mode was pursued in the present case.

The objections made by the appellant to the sufficiency of the proceedings taken by the city officers for the improvement of the street cannot be sustained. The notice of street work which was published by the superintendent contained the whole of the resolution for the improvement, and stated the date and fact of its passage. Inasmuch as there were no "further particulars" in the resolution, it would have been idle to make a formal reference thereto in the notice, and an omission to make such reference cannot be considered a defect. The other objections refer to the absence of certain averments from the complaint, and should have been presented by special demurrer. Mere defects in the mode of alleging a cause of action will not impair the validity of a judgment rendered after a trial upon its merits. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE V. BARRY. (No. 20,757.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1891.)

ROBBERY—ASSAULT—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

On a trial for assault with intent to commit robbery, the prosecuting witness testified that he was assaulted on the street by defendant and two others, who, after taking from him a dog which he held by a chain, attempted to take money from his pocket; that an officer came and took hold of defendant, who at the time had his arm around witness' neck, the other assailants having fled. Defendant testified that he saw witness assaulted, and in trying to help him became entangled in the dog-chain. Held, that a verdict of guilty was right, and that an instruction to find guilty of simple assault was properly refused, as inapplicable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. McM. SHAFER, Judge.

J. D. Sullivan, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

FITZGERALD, C. The defendant was accused, by information, of an assault with intent to commit robbery, and two previous convictions of petit larceny. Upon arraignment he pleaded not guilty to the charge, and admitted the prior convictions. He was then tried and found guilty as charged, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state-prison for the period of six years. The evidence upon which he was convicted is substantially as follows: On the night of March 2, 1890, between the hours of 7 and 8 o'clock, as the prosecuting witness, George Engert, was walking along Harrison street, in the city of San Francisco, he was violently seized by the defendant and two others, by whom he was severely beaten and choked. One of the parties making the assault forcibly took from his possession a dog which he held by a chain, while the other two, one of whom was the defendant, attempted, by means of force and violence, and against his will, to take from his possession the sum of two dollars in money, which he at the time had in one of the pockets of his pants; that during the struggle the police officer whose attention was attracted to the place by Engert's cries for help came upon the scene, and took hold of the defendant, who at the time had his right arm around the neck of Engert; the others, on the approach of the officer, made good their escape by flight. The defendant, who was a witness in his own behalf, testified as follows: "I was coming down Harrison street on the night in question. I did not rob this man or attempt to rob him. I saw two men have hold of him and his cries made me go to him. He appeared to be fighting the other men. I tried to help him, and as I got close the dog-chain got around my legs, and I was trying to disengage myself when the policeman came up." The only error complained of, which we deem it necessary to notice, relates to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury, upon the request of the defendant, "that under the charge they might find him guilty of simple assault." We are of the opinion that this request was properly refused, for the reason that the evidence upon which he was convicted tended to show that he was guilty of the crime charged, or of no offense at all. The instruction asked was not applicable to the facts of the case, and, as the verdict is manifestly right on the evidence, we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

APPEAL—SPECIFICATIONS OF ERROR—CONTRACTS—PAROL EVIDENCE—SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 659, subd. 3, providing that, where the motion for a new trial is on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict or other decision, the statement shall specify the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient, specifications of error, in a suit in equity, in that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the judgment, which are not directed at any one of the numerous findings of fact on the various issues involved, but at all of them, at a verdict of the jury on a particular issue, adopted by the court, and the court's finding thereon, and at the judgment, are insufficient.

2. In a suit on a certain contract it is competent for plaintiff to show that he signed a written contract, introduced in evidence by defendant, through the misrepresentation of defendant, and supposing he was signing one which had been before drawn up in lead-pencil, the contract sued on being the latter, and its execution being denied by defendant in his answer.

3. George Lezinsky, for appellants. Langhorne & Miller, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action is to foreclose a mechanic's lien, and the complaint sets forth two counts,—the first for the recovery of $163.72 unpaid under a contract for $525, and the second for recovery on a quantum meruit of a balance of $213.83 unpaid of the sum of $567.55. Attorney's fees for $100, and costs are also claimed. The defendant Ross, in his answer, among other things, admitted the contract for $525, and claimed to have paid all he owed thereunder, and alleged another contract to have been made between the parties for $325, which included all of the work done and performed as to the second cause of action stated; and further alleged that the whole sum due the plaintiff by defendant upon any ground was the sum of $109.50, of which tender of payment had been made to, and refused by, the plaintiff. The question as to what amount was due for all the work done was by consent of both parties, upon a suggestion of the court, submitted to a jury, who upon that special issue found for the plaintiff in the sum of $289.15. By inadvertence the clerk entered up a judgment upon this verdict, when the other issues as to the existence of a mechanic's lien, amount of attorney's fees due, counter-claim set up by defendant, etc., remained undetermined by the court. Upon this being brought to its attention within a reasonable time the judgment was set aside, and evidence had as to the other matters involved. Thereupon the court adopted the advisory verdict of the jury, upon the specific matter therein involved, and made findings as to the other issues, upon which a decree and judgment was duly given, made, and entered, enforcing the lien, etc. From that and an order denying a new trial this appeal is taken.

The first point made for a reversal of the judgment and order is that the evidence is insufficient "to sustain the judgment." The reason given in the appellants' points and authorities being (at page 4) that each cause of action was based upon work performed in constructing a different story of the building; that the evidence did not show the extent of extra work done upon each story; and, as the defendant claims no extra work under the contract was to be allowed as to the work performed on one of the stories, the judgment cannot stand. The particulars in which the evidence was stated in the first specification of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain "the verdict, findings, and judgment," does not contain anything which points to the question raised, and hence it was not fairly called to the attention of the trial court, and was therefore not to be considered. It nowhere appears therein that the evidence was alleged to be insufficient to show that any specific part of the work was unperformed, or that the value of any specific part thereof remained unproved. It is thus stated: "The evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, findings, or judgment for the reason that there is no testimony proving what was the value of said work, or that the same was ever performed as alleged in the amended complaint." This could only have reference to the whole work claimed to have been performed under both counts of the complaint,—that performed by virtue of the contract; that under a quantum meruit; and that claimed for extra work under both contracts. The only other respect in which the evidence is specified to be insufficient is thus stated: "The evidence shows that the entire amount due to the plaintiff was not more than the sum of $850, and that all of such sum had been paid." This certainly does not intelligibly assert that the evidence was insufficient to show upon which story of the building the extra work was proved to have been done. The party moving for a new trial for insufficiency of evidence must specify in the statement the particulars wherein the evidence is alleged to be insufficient, in order that the trial court and counsel may have their attention directed to the particulars relied on by the moving party, to the end that the evidence bearing on the specifications of error might be inserted in the statement and considered by the court. Edelbuttel v. Durrell, 55 Cal. 279; Code Civil Proc. § 659, subd. 3. Besides, the specifications as to the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the decision are not directed at any particular one of the numerous findings of fact upon the various issues involved here, but at all of them, at the verdict which was adopted by the court, and a finding made thereon, (the case being one in equity,) and at the judgment. This renders the specifications, as set out in the statement and relied on to show error, insufficient, under the rule declared by the appellate court of this state. Coveny v. Hale, 49 Cal. 555; Hayne, New Trial & App. § 150.

It is further contended that the court below erred in allowing the plaintiff to show that a certain written contract, introduced by defendant, was signed by the plaintiff through the misrepresentation of the defendant, and that the plaintiff had never intended to sign that contract, but supposed he was signing one which had before that been drawn up in lead pencil. The action was brought on a contract such as the lead-pencil draft contained; and the defendant, in the answer, denied the performance of the contract as sued on. When he introduced the written contract to show the real nature of the transaction, as he claimed, it was competent for the plaintiff, in support of the issue made, to show that in point of fact he had made no such contract as defendant had brought forward in evidence. One cannot be made to stand on a contract he never intended to make. If the defendant had sued the plaintiff, and sought to charge him on such a contract, it would certainly be competent, in defense, to show that the instrument was fraudulent. The evidence admitted was in effect to accomplish just such a purpose. The verdict rendered by the jury was, upon a special issue advisory to the court, submitted by consent of all the parties, and it was not error on the part of the court to instruct the jury as it did.

The setting aside of the judgment upon the verdict in an equity case, which judgment had been inadvertently entered by the clerk without judicial sanction, and when other issues of fact remained yet to be determined by the court, and the trial of those issues upon the evidence introduced, the adoption of the advisory verdict and finding thereon, and the other issues, was proper; and, as no error appears in the record, we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

GILL v. DRIVER et al. (No. 13,204.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1891.)

APPEAL—FINDINGS OF FACT.

When ultimate facts are found which support the judgment appealed from, they cannot be overcome by the finding of probative facts tending to establish that the ultimate facts were found against the evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGARVEY, Judge.

T. L. Carothers, for appellant. J. A. Cooper, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action to recover the possession of certain personal property or its value, alleged to be $1,000, and damages for its detention. The complaint is in the usual form in such cases. The defendants, by their answer, deny all the averments of the complaint, and allege that at the time of the commencement of the action, and at all times since, they were and have been the owners and entitled to the possession of the property described in the complaint; that the value of the property was $1,000; and, while the defendants were the owners and entitled to the possession thereof, the plaintiff, under and by virtue of the proceedings in this case, unlawfully, and without their consent, took the property from their possession, and has ever since detained the same, to their damage in the sum of $10 per day. The case was tried by the court, and judgment given for the defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals, without any statement or bill of exceptions. The court found certain probative facts, and then found as follows: "(6) That plaintiff was not at the time of the commencement of this action the owner, nor entitled to the possession of the property described in the complaint, but that defendants were the owners thereof, and entitled to the possession of the same. (7) That defendants never took the said property from the possession of plaintiff at any time, but that plaintiff did at the time of the commencement of this action take the said property from the possession of the defendants without their consent, under a writ of replevin, and plaintiff ever since has withheld, and now withholds, the possession of said property from defendants. (8) That the value of the use of said property during the time plaintiff has so withheld it from defendants is the sum of $25, and defendants have been damaged by reason of the taking in the sum of $25, besides the value of the said property. (9) That the value of the property described in the complaint is the sum of $1,000. (10) That defendants never unlawfully took or withheld said property from plaintiff, or damaged him in any manner." The conclusions of law were that the defendants were entitled to judgment for a return of the property, and, if a return could not be had, for the value thereof, and $25 damages; and judgment was so entered. Only two points are made for a reversal of the judgment. They are—First, that the probative facts were wholly without the issues raised by the pleadings, and hence could not support the judgment; and, second, that if within the issues, they were insufficient to support the judgment. Conceding, without deciding, that these points are well taken, still they do not aid the appellant. Ultimate facts were found which do support the judgment; and they are not questioned, nor could they be, without bringing up the evidence in a statement or bill of exceptions. The rule has long been settled that, "when the ultimate fact is found, no finding of probative facts which may tend to establish that the ultimate fact was found against the evidence, can overcome the finding of the ultimate fact." Smith v. Acker, 52 Cal. 217; Pio Pico v. Cuyas, 47 Cal. 174. We think the judgment should be affirmed, and so advise.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

GOLDEN STATE & MINERS' IRON-WORKS v. ANGELL et al. (No. 13,208.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1891.)

CONTRACTS—EVIDENCE—CONSIDERATION—FRAUDULENT TRANSFERS—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

1. One A., who was superintendent and a stockholder of plaintiff, a manufacturing corporation, and who had in mind certain improvements in dredging-machines, agreed on behalf of plaintiff with W. to make the latter a machine, and to give him and plaintiff each a half interest in patents if they could be obtained on the improvements, in consideration that W. should pay for making the machine, and to this agreement plaintiff assented. Plaintiff and W. each paid half the expense of procuring the patents, which were issued to A., who never claimed any interest in them, though he did not assign them to plaintiff. Held, that there was sufficient evidence of a contract between A. and plaintiff, by which the latter was to own half the patents.

2. There was sufficient consideration for said contract in the fact that A. was a stockholder in plaintiff corporation, and that plaintiff paid half the costs of procuring the patents.

3. In an action by plaintiff against a receiver appointed at the instance of a creditor of A., and given possession of the patents to establish its title to a half interest therein, the creditor cannot object that there was no consideration for the contract between A. and plaintiff to give the latter one-half the patents when procured.

4. Nor can the creditor object that no formal action was taken on the contract by plaintiff's board of directors.

5. Nor can he object that the contract, being made before the patents were procured, was about property that was uncertain, and not in esse, and was unfair and unjust.

6. Nor can the creditor in such action object that the contract was in fraud of A.'s creditors, when such fraudulent intent is not alleged in his answer.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

S. W. & E. B. Holladay, for appellants. Gray & Haven, (David Bixler, of counsel,) for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. In July, 1880, the defendant A. F. Collins obtained a money judgment against the defendant Horace B. Angell and one Cyrus Palmer, and in September of that year an execution which had issued on the judgment was returned wholly unsatisfied. In May, 1884, the said Collins and the defendant Elizabeth A. Risdon, to whom an interest in the judgment had been assigned, instituted proceedings supplementary to execution against said Angell, which resulted in an order of the superior court made May 23, 1884, commanding him to assign to one Forbes, a receiver appointed for that purpose, all the right, title, and interest which he, the said Angell, had in four letters patent for improvements in dredging-machines, to be sold in satisfaction of said judgment. A further order was made permitting all persons or corporations claiming an interest in said letters patent to commence and prosecute any action against said receiver to determine and enforce such interest. Whereupon the plaintiff herein, a corporation, commenced this present action, averring in its complaint that it is the real owner of one undivided half of said letters patent, and praying that it be decreed to be such owner; that said defendants Collins and Risdon be enjoined from proceeding further against the same; that said receiver be ordered to make an assignment of the same to plaintiff; and for other relief, etc. The court rendered judgment for plaintiff substantially as prayed for; and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial the defendants Collins and Risdon appeal.

The main history of the case, as shown by the findings and evidence, is briefly this: In May, 1880, the plaintiff was, and for many years before then had been, engaged in manufacturing various kinds of machines; and the defendant Angell was then its superintendent, and was also a director and owner of stock in the corporation. Williams & Bixler were then owners of large bodies of swamp land which they were endeavoring to reclaim and protect by levees; and, a large break having occurred about that time on the line of their works, one of their employes was told by said Angell that he thought his company (plaintiff here) could construct a dredging-machine, with certain improvements, by which levees could be constructed more cheaply than by any other method. Afterwards interviews were had upon the subject between Angell and Gen. Williams, of the firm of Williams & Bixler. At Williams' request, Angell sketched out on paper his proposed improvements, and set the draughtsman of the plaintiff to work on a drawing. When the drawing was finished Williams was somewhat pleased with it, but when an estimate of the cost was made he thought it would cost too much for an experiment. Williams & Bixler were to advance the money to pay for the construction of the machine. Angell then stated to him that he thought "there were some valuable patentable improvements there that might be worth something, and, in case there should be, that in consideration he would put the money in to build the machine and try it; that he would be entitled to one-half, and the Golden State & Miners' Iron-Works the other half, of such improvements, whatever there was that could be secured by patent." On his return to the iron-works of plaintiff he told Palmer, the president of the company, the statement he had made to Williams, and Palmer said it was "perfectly satisfactory." This report was made by Angell, as superintendent, to Palmer, as president, of plaintiff. After considering the matter a day or two, Williams & Bixler gave Angell an order employing plaintiff to go on and complete the machine according to the drawings. The machine was built by plaintiff, for which Williams & Bixler paid plaintiff $17,000. It was put into operation by Williams & Bixler at their expense, and proved a success, and was called the "Hercules Dredger." Afterwards "Gen. Williams and Mr. Palmer, the president of the plaintiff, decided it was time to secure by patent these improvements;" and Angell gave to W. Knox, the secretary of plaintiff, a rough idea of what he (Angell) thought was patentable, and requested Knox to examine the patent-office reports, and learn if they had been covered by previous patents; it not being certain at the time which, or how many, of the improvements were new. After thorough investigation, it was learned that some of the improvements were new; and rough specifications were given of them to Dewey & Co., patent solicitors, who prepared the papers necessary for applications for patents. Angell signed the applications as required by law; but the entire expense of procuring the patents was paid one-half by plaintiff, and one-half by Williams & Bixler; and, with the full knowledge and consent of Angell, they were to have the patents. Angell did not pay anything whatever towards procuring them, and the money was not paid for Angell, but by and for plaintiff and Williams & Bixler. Angell claimed no interest in the patents whatever, and when they were received he turned them over to Palmer, president of the plaintiff. In this way three patents were procured, viz.: No. 246,362, issued August 30, 1881; No. 268,977, issued December 12, 1882; and No. 278,482, May 29, 1883. Afterwards, under similar arrangements, plaintiff was employed to make certain alterations and improvements on another dredger called the "Atlas;" and another patent, No. 293,932, issued February 19, 1884, was procured. All these patents were issued to Angell, except No. 268,977, which was issued one-half to Angell and one-half to Williams & Bixler. Angell in his testimony says: "I have never in any way claimed or asserted any interest in these patents, or the improvements described therein. * * * I took the situation in this way: Here was a certain job of work to be done, for which the foundry and machine works, when represented, would probably be able to procure the job and make some money, and I was there in their employ, and I considered it a duty to do all I could towards fulfilling the wants of these parties, customers of that concern, and I started in to get up something to accomplish that particular object." The court finds that no assignment of the patents was made by Angell to plaintiff, but that he held the same in trust for plaintiff. On November 13, 1884, said Angell made application to the superior court to be discharged from his debts as an insolvent debtor; and on March 13, 1885, a decree so discharging him was entered. He was actually insolvent at the time the foregoing transactions took place, but he testified that he did not then know of his insolvency, and considered his financial condition good.

We have alluded to some extent to the evidence in the case, because the main point made by appellants, and reiterated at nearly every stage of their argument, is that there is no proof of any contract between Angell and plaintiff by which the latter was to own one-half of the patents. But we think that there was ample proof of such contract. Angell expressly stated to the president of plaintiff that the latter was to have one-half of the patents, and his conduct afterwards was a continuous and complete ratification of that statement. He allowed plaintiff to expend its own money for its own benefit in obtaining the patents, and expressly disclaimed any interest therein for himself. Certainly there was no want of assent on his part.

It is contended that there was no consideration for the contract; but Angell was interested, not only as superintendent, but also as a stockholder in plaintiff to procure the contract with Williams & Bixler; and the "prejudice suffered" by plaintiff in paying for the patents was a sufficient consideration. Civil Code, § 1605. Moreover, it is difficult to see how appellants are interested in that question. And the same may be said of the point that there was no formal action taken on the matter by the board of directors of plaintiff; neither the corporation nor any of its stockholders are making any objection. Something is said in the briefs about defrauding creditors; but, in the first place, there is no evidence of any intent to do so, and, in the second place, there is no averment in the answer that the transfer of the improvements and the right to patents therefor to plaintiff and Williams & Bixler were made with intent to defraud creditors. As to the other points made, as that the contract was about property that was uncertain and not in esse, that it was unfair and unjust, etc., while we think that they are not well taken on their merits, it is sufficient to say that they refer to matters in which third parties, whether creditors or not, are not concerned. If plaintiff, through carelessness, had not neglected to have Angell make a formal assignment of the patents as they were received, which Angell was always willing to do, all trouble in the premises would have been avoided. The inchoate right which Angell had to apply for patents for certain improvements to dredging-machines which he thought he had discovered, "schemes which he had in his head," was nothing that could have been reached by a creditor. Curt. Pat. §§ 174, 175. It was merely a privilege dependent for its exercise upon his own volition. We do not know of any process by which he could have been compelled by a creditor to procure a patent. This right he transferred to plaintiff and Williams & Bixler under the circumstances above stated. He chose to perform his contract, and to allow them to procure the patents in his name by the expenditure of their own money; and we think that the court below was right in holding that one-half of the patents thus procured was in justice and equity the property of plaintiff. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

NEWMAN v. DUANE. (No. 13,282.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1891.)

TRIAL BY JURY—ACTION TO RECOVER REAL PROPERTY.

In an action for the possession of land defendant is entitled to a trial by jury, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 592, giving the right to a jury trial "in actions for the recovery of specific real or personal property," and plaintiff cannot deprive him of this right by framing his complaint so as to make the action an equity case, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 738, providing that an action may be brought by any person against another who claims an interest or estate in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 738, provides that an action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim.

Moses G. Cobb, for appellant. Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiff, in his complaint, merely alleges that he is owner in fee "and in possession" of certain described land; and that defendant, without any right whatever, claims an interest or estate in said land, adverse to plaintiff. The complaint, as to the real issues between the parties, is quite child-like and bland, and does not contain any intimation that defendant was in the actual possession of the land, and that what plaintiff mainly wanted was to put defendant out. The prayer does not suggest that plaintiff would like to have a writ of restitution. But the answer denies all the allegations of the complaint, and sets up that defendant has been in possession of the land for more than fifteen years; and the court finds that he had been thus in possession for at least four years before the commencement of the action. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, which, among other things, decrees that "plaintiff do have a writ of possession of said premises as against the defendant and all persons claiming under him." From the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

Before the commencement of the trial defendant duly demanded a trial by jury; "but the court refused to grant him the same, on the ground that the case was an equity case, in which he, said defendant, was not entitled to a jury trial as a matter of right." Defendant duly excepted and the first point made by appellant is that the court erred in refusing his demand for a jury. We think that the appellant was clearly entitled to a jury; not only upon the principles discussed and determined in Donahue v. Meister, (Cal.) 25 Pac. Rep. 1096, but in accordance with the specific language of section 592 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which expressly gives the right to a jury trial "in actions for the recovery of specific real or personal property." In the case at bar, where the defendant was in possession, claiming adversely to plaintiff, the obviously proper action to have been brought was what we call an "action of ejectment,"—that is, an action "for the recovery of specific real property,"—in which case the defendant would have been clearly entitled to a jury. Plaintiff has endeavored to accomplish the same result—that is, the restitution of possession—in the form of a statutory action under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Assuming that said section contemplates a case where the plaintiff is out of possession and the defendant in possession, still it is evident that the plaintiff herein, by simply framing his complaint in a particular way, could not deprive the defendant of a jury trial of the issues raised by his answer. For the error committed in refusing the appellant a jury the judgment must be reversed, and it is unnecessary to notice the other points made by the appellant. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; DE HAVEN, J.

HEALD v. HENDY. (No. 13,094.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1891.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—ACTION ON ACCOUNT—INTEREST.

1. In an action to recover for provisions furnished to a third person on defendant's account it appeared that defendant owned a mine, and that the provisions were furnished to a boarding-house keeper, where the miners boarded, under an agreement between plaintiff and defendant's superintendents at the mine that defendant would pay for them. The superintendents had purchased provisions from other persons for the use of the boarding-house, and defendant had paid for them to plaintiff's knowledge. Held, that the superintendents had authority to make the agreement for defendant as his ostensible agents, under Civil Code Cal. § 2300, providing that "an agency is ostensible when the principal, intentionally or by want of ordinary care, causes a third person to believe another to be his agent who is not really employed by him."

2. When it is necessary to the operation of a mine that provisions be furnished to the keeper of a boarding-house at which the miners live, the superintendent of the mine has authority to order the provisions to be furnished, and to bind the operator of the mine to pay for them, but not to bind him to pay for articles not necessary for the use of the boarding-house.

3. Civil Code Cal. § 3287, providing that "every person who is entitled to recover damages certain or capable of being made certain by calculation, and the right to recover which is vested in him on a particular day, is entitled also to recover interest thereon, from that day, except during such time as the debtor is prevented by law or by the act of the creditor from paying the debt," does not apply to an action for the price of goods delivered on account.

4. Civil Code Cal. § 1917, authorizing the recovery of interest on "moneys lent or due on any settlement of accounts," does not authorize the recovery of interest on an account for goods sold and delivered, until the account has been settled, and the balance due ascertained.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Civil Code Cal. § 3287, provides that every person who is entitled to recover damages certain or capable of being made certain by calculation, and the right to recover which is vested in him on a particular day, is entitled also to recover interest thereon from that day, except during such time as the debtor is prevented by law or by the act of the creditor from paying the debt.

Wm. H. H. Hart, (Aylett R. Cotton, of counsel,) for appellant. G. G. Blanchard, Philip Teare, A. C. Adams, Irwin & Irwin, and A. C. Adams, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to recover $2,370.48 on account of goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant at his special instance and request, and also for money paid and expended for the use of defendant, in the sum of $827.47 on a balance of account. Plaintiff asks judgment for the amounts and interest upon the items of the account from the time they became due. Defendant admits a certain amount of the indebtedness and denies the balance. At the trial judgment went against him, and he appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff is the owner of a store at Nashville, Eldorado county. Defendant resides at the city of San Francisco, and owns a mine near plaintiff's store. The goods, wares, and merchandise upon account of which this action was brought were furnished by plaintiff to one Stein-König, who kept a boarding-house at this mine for the purpose of boarding the men therein employed. The evidence was quite contradictory in many respects, and in those particulars must be held to support the judgment. Stein-König, it appears, had neither capital nor credit; and, in order that he might continue in business, so that the miners would have a place to board, Templeton and George W. Hendy, the respective superintendents of the mine, told the plaintiff to furnish him all goods necessary for the use of the boarding-house, and the defendant would pay for the same. As near as can be ascertained from the brief of the respondent's counsel, they rely upon an ostensible agency in these superintendents, and also upon a special authorization direct from the defendant to the superintendents to incur this indebtedness. The evidence of Stein-König and Templeton tends quite strongly to indicate a special authority from defendant, and the evidence also seems to be amply sufficient to support a finding of ostensible agency. "An agency is ostensible when the principal intentionally or by want of ordinary care causes a third person to believe another to be his agent who is not really employed by him." Section 2300 Civil Code. The evidence shows beyond any doubt that the superintendents of the mine were purchasing meat, flour, milk, etc., from various parties for the use of the boarding-house, which articles were paid for by the defendant, and with the knowledge of plaintiff. From these facts it is safe to say that the defendant intentionally or by want of ordinary care caused the plaintiff to believe that these mining superintendents were his agents in the purchase of these articles from plaintiff. The record discloses the fact that it was absolutely necessary that provisions should be furnished this boarding-house, in order that the mine might continue in operation; and it would seem that, aside from any express authority from the defendant to purchase these articles, and regardless of the question of ostensible agency, the respective superintendents of the mine, by virtue of their positions alone, had the power to bind the defendant for the payment of these goods.

Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 180; Stuart v. Adams, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 970. Viewing the case from any of the foregoing standpoints, we are unable to affirm the judgment to the extent of $81.74, that being the value of articles delivered clearly not for the necessary use of the boarding-house. The plaintiff is not entitled to interest under the first count of his complaint. Section 3287 of the Civil Code has no application to this character of actions. Section 1917 of the Civil Code limits the recovery of interest to "moneys lent or due on any settlement of accounts, from the day on which the balance is ascertained." These accounts were never settled and a balance ascertained. The Statutes of 1869-70, p. 699, was similar to section 1917 of the Civil Code; and in a case analogous to this it was said: "The court below erred in rendering a judgment for interest on the account sued upon." Bank v. Northam, 51 Cal. 387. See, also, Brady v. Wilcoxson, 44 Cal. 245.

Let the judgment be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify the judgment by striking therefrom the sum of $81.74, and also the amount of interest computed upon the sum found due under the first count of the plaintiff's complaint.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; HARRISON, J.

PER CURIAM. It is ordered that the opinion filed herein on the 27th day of June, 1891, be amended (and the same is hereby amended) by striking therefrom the last paragraph thereof, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Let the cause be remanded, with direction to the trial court to modify the judgment by striking therefrom the sum of $81.74, and also the amount of interest computed upon the sum found due under the first count of the plaintiff's complaint; the judgment, thus modified, to stand affirmed as of its date."

1. The probate court can make an administrator responsible for rents and profits of his decedent's land, where he occupies and uses it as his own.

2. Where an administrator has taken possession of property as part of the estate, the time before the settlement of his account is not to be considered in determining whether the heirs have been guilty of laches in not asserting their claim thereto.

FOOTE, C. This is an appeal from an order settling and allowing the final account of an administrator. The contestants and appellants are the children and heirs at law of the decedent. The principal matter at issue is the responsibility of the administrator for rents, issues, and profits derived from the possession and occupation of a certain tract of land, a possessory claim left by his decedent. The contestants claim that the administrator should be charged "with this land, and with the reasonable value of the rents, issues, and profits thereof; and during the periods when he has farmed it himself, and made a profit in excess of the reasonable value of the rents, issues, and profits, then with the profit made by him out of the land." In opposition to this, the administrator claimed, and endeavored to show, that the decedent had no title to the land; that it was a mere possessory or "squatter's claim;" that he only took possession to take off the growing crop of the year 1866, that in which his decedent died; that he surrendered the land under title paramount to other parties, and that he afterwards bought it from the true owners, and never held possession, except adversely to his decedent's estate, save during the year 1866; that he became the owner by paramount adverse legal title, and has always held it as such since 1873, and never held possession as administrator since 1867.

As to the point made that the probate court cannot make an administrator responsible for rents and profits of decedent's land, it is settled that it can do so, where he occupies and uses it as his own. Walls v. Walker, 37 Cal. 431.

So far as the finding of laches on the part of the contestants is concerned, we do not see how it is supported by the evidence. The administrator, as trustee, presents his final account, the estate being open and unsettled, for allowance; and as to all property and matters over which he has control, and about which he acts in that capacity, he asks that they may be settled in this proceeding. To say then that as to these matters which pertain to his final account as trustee, and for which he seeks judicial sanction, the contestants shall not be heard, because the administrator has chosen to neglect the final settlement of the estate, hardly comports with the doctrine of courts of equity in such cases. It might be, as to the span of horses, claimed to be exempt, that, under a certain state of facts, the administrator would not be responsible for them to the contestants in this action. But the state of facts, viz., that there was an order of the court setting them aside as exempt, and thus taking them out of the estate, does not appear satisfactorily to have existed. Hence, as the administrator took them as estate property, the contestants are not prevented by laches from having him to account for them. With reference to the other principal matter,—that is, the alleged responsibility of the administrator for the rents, issues, and profits of his decedent's land,—it may be said that, if the evidence and findings showed that no damage resulted to the estate from his surrender of the land, or that his surrender was to a paramount adverse title asserted by another, then he would not be responsible for rents, issues, or profits. But neither the evidence nor the findings sufficiently show such a state of facts. It becomes unnecessary to make special mention of any of the other points made, but, for the reasons stated, we are of opinion that the judgment and order should be reversed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed.

NUTTALL v. LOVEJOY et al. (No. 13,666.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1891.)

SWAMP LANDS—APPLICATION TO PURCHASE—INCONSISTENT FINDINGS—NEW TRIAL.

1. No right to swamp and overflowed land, granted by the United States to the several states by Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850, could attach by reason of an application to purchase, made before the land was segregated and set apart to the state.

2. In an action to establish title to swamp and overflowed land, in which the adaptability of the land to cultivation was a material issue, the court found that the land was subject to periodical overflow, and not suitable for cultivation, but further found that it was in cultivation, and other facts inconsistent with the finding that it was unfit for cultivation. Held that, as the suitability of the land for cultivation was not determined, and was a material issue, a decision based on the finding of the ultimate fact that it was unfit for cultivation was a decision against the law, and a new trial was properly granted.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge. N. O. Bradley, G. E. Lawrence, and W. A. Gray, for appellants. Lamberson & Taylor, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. A contest arose in the office of the surveyor general as to which one of the parties hereto had the better right to purchase the land in controversy, and on March 28, 1883, an order was made referring the contest to the superior court of the county of Tulare for a final determination of the conflicting claims. That court found that the land in controversy was on September 28, 1850, and ever since has been, swamp and overflowed land, and as such became the property of the state by virtue of the act of congress passed September 28, 1850; that the land was segregated and set apart to the state of California on October 14, 1884, and on December 1st following a certified copy of the township plat, duly approved, was filed with the register of the state land-office; that on December 31, 1883, the defendant Lovejoy filed an affidavit and application in due form for the purchase of the land in the office of the surveyor general, which application was approved by said surveyor general on October 15, 1885; that on December 9, 1885, the register of the state land-office issued and delivered to defendant Lovejoy a certificate of purchase in due form, and said certificate has never been annulled or canceled; that the defendant Hall filed his application in due form to purchase the land September 9, 1887; that the plaintiff, Nuttall, filed his affidavit and application in due form to purchase the land on January 12, 1888. The defendant Stevenson made no appearance at the trial, and judgment went against him by default. The court rendered judgment in favor of the defendant Hall; and the plaintiff, Nuttall, and the defendant Lovejoy both moved the court for a new trial. The plaintiff's motion was granted, and the motion of the defendant Lovejoy was denied. The defendant Lovejoy appealed from the judgment and from the order denying her motion for a new trial, and the defendant Hall appealed from the order granting plaintiff a new trial, but did not appeal from the judgment.

The defendant Lovejoy's application to purchase having been filed before segregation by the United States to the state, no right attached by reason of such application, nor by reason of the subsequent approval and certificate of purchase issued to her. Buchanan v. Nagle, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 512. The court, therefore, properly decided against her claim, and, as no errors of law occurred at the trial, her motion for a new trial was properly denied. Her appeal from the judgment is also without merit. She alleged in her answer that the lands were unfit for cultivation. The defendant Hall alleged the same thing. She is the only party who has appealed from the judgment. If the findings show that the land is unfit for cultivation, she cannot complain; it is a finding in her favor. If they show that the lands are unfit for cultivation, it is a finding outside of the issues between her and the defendant Hall, who has not appealed from the judgment. Estate of Doyle, 73 Cal. 564, 15 Pac. Rep. 125; Bulwer Con. Min. Co. v. Standard Con. Min. Co., 83 Cal. 589, 23 Pac. Rep. 1102. In any event, a finding as to the character of the land could in no way affect the right of the defendant Lovejoy, because, as stated above, no right could attach by reason of an application filed before the lands were segregated.

We think the court did not err in granting the plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The plaintiff alleged that he was an actual settler on the land, and that said land was suitable for cultivation. The findings of the court on the issue as to the character of the land are uncertain and contradictory. The court found that at all time stated the land had been, "and yet is, subject to periodical overflow, and is not suitable for cultivation;" but afterwards found that the land was formerly a portion of the bed of Tulare lake, and "was first uncovered by the receding waters of said lake in the summer of 1883, and the waters of said lake rose again and covered said land in the spring of 1884; that ever since the fall of 1884 said waters have been gradually receding, and in the fall of 1887 said land was again wholly uncovered, and since said time such waters have so receded that at the time of this trial they were at least four miles from any portion of said lands; * * * that the said land is level, and of good quality, of sandy loam, and can be readily plowed, seeded, and cultivated by the ordinary processes of tillage; that the plaintiff Nuttall, plowed a few acres of said land in March, 1888, and sowed the same with barley and alfalfa; that the land was so dry at that time that for lack of moisture but a small portion of the seed then sowed by him germinated, and that portion which did so germinate soon died for lack of moisture, there having been no rain, after said seeds were sown, sufficient to wet up the ground where they were sown; that more than one-half of said seed remained in the ground where sown until the rains came in the month of November, 1888, when such seeds germinated, and the alfalfa and barley plants coming therefrom are now growing on said land; that the country surrounding said lake was formerly used as a vast pasture for the raising of stock, but of recent years it has been entered upon by persons who have broken it up and plowed and farmed the land, and constructed numerous irrigating ditches for the purpose of taking water from the several streams hereinbefore named, and conducting it upon their said lands for the purposes of irrigation, and by such means a great quantity of the waters of said streams is being each year taken therefrom for said purpose and conducted upon said lands; that in the year 1862, said year being an exceptionally wet season, the waters of said lake suddenly raised to a great height; and again in the year 1867, said year being an exceptionally wet season, the waters of said lake again suddenly raised to a great height, and, should a season again occur such as either the season of 1862 or the season of 1867, the land mentioned in finding 1 would be entirely covered by the waters of said lake; and the numerous ditches leading out of said rivers and creeks, and the large body of land used for agricultural purposes, and irrigated by waters drawn from said streams, would not prevent the sudden rise of said lake and the overflow of said land by the waters thereof." While the finding of the court that the land is unsuitable for cultivation is the finding of an ultimate fact, it is inconsistent with the other facts found and quoted above; and for this reason the court below properly set aside the findings and granted a new trial.

It is claimed that the plaintiff was not entitled to a new trial on the ground that the decision is "against law," and in support of his contention appellant Hall cites cases holding that a new trial cannot be granted upon the ground that the conclusions of law are not supported by the findings of fact. This may be conceded. The question here is not whether the court below erred in its conclusions of law, but whether the findings fail to dispose of some material issue. As between the plaintiff and the defendant Hall, the question as to the character of the land—whether it was suitable or unsuitable for cultivation—was a material issue. That issue has not been disposed of, because the findings are so inconsistent and contradictory that it is impossible to tell therefrom whether the land is or is not suitable for cultivation. Where the findings do not determine all the issues raised by the pleadings with respect to which evidence was introduced, the decision is against law, and a new trial may be granted on that ground. Knight v.

BARNHART v. FULKERTH et al. (No. 13,-682.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1891.)

ESTOPPEL—PLEADING—REPLEVIN.

In an action of replevin against a sheriff, the defendant justified under an execution against a third person, and pleaded that before levying on the goods in plaintiff's possession plaintiff stated to him, in answer to his inquiries, that the goods belonged to the execution debtor, and that plaintiff held possession as pledgee. The answer further stated "that the levy was made in sole reliance upon the statement of plaintiff." Held, that the answer sufficiently pleaded an estoppel, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1962, subd. 3, which provides that, "whenever a party has deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot be permitted to falsify it."

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; WILLIAM O. MINOR, Judge.

Wright & Hazen, for appellant. W. E. Turner, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, C. This is an action brought by plaintiff against the defendants to recover the possession of 4,255 bags of wheat, alleged to have been wrongfully and unlawfully taken by the defendants from the possession of plaintiff, or for the sum of $8,260, the alleged value thereof, in case delivery cannot be had, and for the further sum of $2,000 as damages for the detention thereof. The answer specifically denies the material allegations of the complaint, and justifies under writs of attachment and execution. Plaintiff demurred generally to the answer, and separately, upon the same ground, to that part of it setting up matter by way of an affirmative defense. The demurrer was overruled, and the case tried by the court, without a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $2,540, and costs. This appeal is taken by plaintiff, on the judgment roll alone, from that part of the judgment which denies to him a portion of the relief claimed and demanded by him in this action. The case has been here before on appeal, and is reported in 73 Cal. 526, 15 Pac. Rep. 89. All the questions necessary to the decision of the case were then decided, and are now the law of the case, with the single exception of the matter by way of estoppel in pais, pleaded for the first time in the answer as amended, after the case was reversed on the former appeal, but which was sought to be proved and was relied upon as a defense at the previous trial. As to whether the matter set up by way of estoppel was necessary to be pleaded, we are not called upon, in view of the amended answer, to decide. But this court on the former appeal so considered and disposed of the questions of estoppel raised by the evidence in the case, and relied on as matters of defense, against the objections made and urged by plaintiff, upon the ground that such defense was not available because it was not set up in the answer. The facts necessary for a proper understanding of the case, as now presented for decision, are substantially as follows: In November, 1878, H. O. Matthews and his wife commenced an action in the district court of Stanislaus county, against one J. T. Davis, to recover on his promissory note made in their favor for $3,500. After the filing of the complaint a writ of attachment was issued at their instance against the property of Davis, and placed in the hands of the defendant Fulkert, the sheriff of the county, who executed the same by levying upon and taking into his possession, as the property of Davis, the wheat in controversy. This wheat was, at the time of the levy, in the possession of the plaintiff, Barnhart, as pledgee, to whom it had been previously delivered, by transfer and indorsement of the warehouse receipt by Davis, as collateral security for the payment of the sum of $2,500 and interest, theretofore loaned by him to Davis. Immediately upon the service by the sheriff of a copy of the attachment and the notice in writing, usual in such cases, upon the plaintiff, Barnhart, he, Barnhart, in answer thereto and in response to inquiries made at the time by the sheriff and the attorney of Matthews and wife, claimed and represented to them that he held possession of the wheat as pledgee of Davis; that Davis was the owner thereof; and that all he wanted was his money. The object of this inquiry, as the plaintiff knew, and in response to which he made the foregoing statement, was for the purpose of ascertaining whether Davis was the owner of the wheat in question, and whether it was subject to be levied upon as such. The sheriff then immediately tendered to plaintiff, in manner and form as required by law, the sum of $2,600, which sum was in excess of the amount due. This, after admitting its sufficiency, Barnhart refused to accept. The sheriff then deposited the money with the county treasurer to the order of plaintiff, and notified him to that effect, but plaintiff gave him notice that he would not accept it. The sheriff and the attorney of Matthews and wife having no knowledge differing from the representations and information given by the plaintiff in relation to the ownership of the wheat in question, and believing and relying solely thereon, as plaintiff knew they would, the sheriff then, in obedience to the instructions of the attorney of Matthews and wife, given after the money tendered was deposited with the county treasurer to plaintiff's order, and immediately preceding the levy, executed the writ of attachment by levying upon and taking into his possession, as the property of Davis, the wheat in controversy, which he afterwards placed in the possession of his co-defendant, Perley, for the safe-keeping and protection thereof. After this action was commenced, and during the detention of the property in question by the sheriff under the writ of attachment, Matthews and wife recovered judgment against Davis for the amount claimed, with interest and costs, and thereupon execution was duly issued and levied by the defendant Fulkerth, as sheriff, upon this wheat, as the property of Davis, and he sold 250 tons of it, leaving 25 tons which he released from execution, notifying plaintiff at the time thereof. After the sale, defendant Fulkerth again tendered to plaintiff the full amount due from Davis, which he refused to accept. The defendant Fulkerth then withdrew the deposit from the county treasurer, and placed it in a solvent bank, but in his own name, where he has ever since kept it, with the full knowledge of the plaintiff, and being at all times ready and willing to pay it over, with interest up to the date of the tender. It further appears that the plaintiff applied for and received from Davis other security which was amply sufficient to pay Davis' indebtedness to him, and that the wheat which is the subject of this action was not the property of Davis at the time he delivered the possession of it to plaintiff.

These are substantially the facts as shown by the findings, and, as none of the evidence taken at the trial was brought up by the record, they must be presumed to be supported by the evidence. The questions in relation to the ownership of the grain and the sufficiency of the tender were settled adversely to plaintiff by the decision of this court on the former appeal, so that they are not now proper subjects for discussion. This case is therefore narrowed down to the question whether the plaintiff is estopped from denying the truth of the statements intentionally and deliberately made by him to the defendant Fulkerth and the attorney of the attaching creditors, which he led them to believe were true, and upon which belief they acted solely in making the levy referred to. It is contended by appellant that the demurrer should have been sustained on the ground that the matter of estoppel relied on as a defense is not sufficiently pleaded in the answer; and, further, that neither the pleadings nor findings are sufficient to support the judgment based upon an estoppel. Section 1962, subd. 3, Code Civil Proc., provides: "Whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it." Conceding, but not deciding, that this estoppel is not embraced within that class of estoppels in pais necessary to be pleaded, we are of opinion that the answer is in all respects sufficient, and that the matter pleaded by way of estoppel meets fully the requirements of the above section of the Code of Civil Procedure. We think the demurrer was properly overruled. Mr. Justice THORNTON, who delivered the former opinion in this case, uses the following language with reference to the question of estoppel involved here: "We do not think this estoppel made out, for the reason that it does not appear that the levy was made in sole reliance upon the statements made by Barnhart." The answer avers, among other things, by way of estoppel, and the court so finds, "that the levy was made in sole reliance upon the statement of the plaintiff, Barnhart." As the estoppel herein was sufficiently pleaded, and the findings follow and support the allegations of the pleadings, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff is estopped from denying the truth of the statements out of which this action arose, and which were made by him at the time and under the circumstances referred to; also from setting up title to the property in question in any one but Davis; and, further, that the judgment based thereon, and upon which this appeal is taken, should be affirmed, and we so advise.

WE CONCUR: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

A motion for a new trial in a criminal case is largely addressed to the discretion of the trial court; and a motion granted upon the ground that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence will not be reversed, except where there is no evidence which conflicts with that upon which the verdict rests.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. MCKINLEY, Judge.

W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., and Frank P. Kelly, Dist. Atty., for the People. C. C. Stephens and J. A. Donnell, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A motion for a new trial in a criminal cause is very largely addressed to the discretion of the court before which the trial was had; and, when one of the grounds upon which it is asked is that the verdict is contrary to the evidence given in the cause, the action of that court in granting the motion will not be reversed by this court, unless the record clearly shows that there was no evidence which conflicted with that upon which the verdict rested. In the present case the action of the court in granting the motion is fully sustained by the matters contained in the bill of exceptions, both upon the foregoing ground, and also upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence contained in the affidavits offered upon the motion on the part of the defendant. The order is affirmed.

YOUNG v. AGUIRRE. (No. 14,036.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 10, 1891.)

APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict the judgment will not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

Action by W. H. Young against M. G. Aguirre to recover possession of personal property. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and new trial denied. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John Haynes and Jesse F. Waterman, for appellant. H. H. Appel, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The action is for the recovery of the possession of personal property alleged to have been wrongfully taken from the plaintiff by the defendant. The defendant, being sheriff, justifies the taking of the property by virtue of a writ of attachment against one Cooke, alleging that the property belonged to Cooke, and was subject to the attachment. Trial by jury, verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The plaintiff claims the property by purchase from Cooke, made 40 days prior to the attachment. The appellant makes two points: (1) That the evidence does not justify the verdict of the jury, in that it fails to show that the alleged transfer of the property from Cooke to plaintiff was accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession; and (2) that the verdict is against law, for the reason that the jury must have disregarded an instruction of the court as follows: "If you find that there was no actual, open, unequivocal change of possession, carrying with it the usual marks and indications of ownership, manifested by such outward signs as would render it evident to the world that the possession of Cooke had wholly ceased, and that the claims of the vendee were absolute, then you shall find for the defendant." The two points are substantially the same, and present only the single question: Does the evidence justify a finding that the transfer was accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession? This question should be answered affirmatively, and appellant's claim to the contrary is not sufficiently plausible to justify a statement of the evidence here. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

NOTMAN v. GREEN. (No. 14,164.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 5, 1891.)

ACTION ON NOTE—PLEADING.

In an action on a note, a complaint which says nothing on the subject of failure to pay, except that "no part of the principal sum mentioned in said note still remains due and unpaid," is insufficient to sustain a judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

A. B. Hotchkiss, for appellant. E. E. Powers, (Max Lowenthal, of counsel,) for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action upon a promissory note, and to foreclose a mortgage upon real estate given to secure the same. Defendant filed a general demurrer, which was overruled, whereupon he failed to answer, and judgment was finally rendered against him, and the realty sold under execution. He appeals from the judgment, and insists that the complaint is fatally defective, in this: that there is no allegation of non-payment of the note. The only allegation in the complaint referring to this matter is as follows: "That all the interest on the said principal sum mentioned in said promissory note, and in the said mortgage, has been paid up to February 26, 1888, and no part of the principal sum mentioned in said promissory note and mortgage, together with the interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from the 26th day of February, 1888, compounded quarterly, still remains due and unpaid from said defendant to said plaintiff." We may safely assume that this allegation of the pleader does not express his intention and desires at the time. He insists that the defect of the allegation consists in a clerical error in the accidental insertion of the words "no part of." It is not our province to speculate how the allegation happened to be framed as it is. It is sufficient to say it is not an allegation of non-payment of the note, and therefore the complaint is fatally defective. Scroufe v. Clay, 71 Cal. 123, 11 Pac. Rep. 882; Richards v. Insurance Co., 80 Cal. 506, 22 Pac. Rep. 939. Appellant sits quietly by; allows his demurrer to be overruled for lack of presentation of the defects of the complaint to the court; permits the court to hear evidence and enter its judgment; allows respondent to sell the premises, which are inadequate to pay the judgment, at his own cost and expense; and then appeals from a judgment based upon a complaint clearly insufficient, and which would have been ordered amended by the court upon the slightest notice of the defects. It would afford us pleasure if we were acquainted with some principle of law that would justify us in affirming this judgment, but we know of none. Let the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

LIBEL—EVIDENCE—DAMAGES—NEW TRIAL.

1. In an action for libel the evidence showed that plaintiff was a butcher; that defendants, who constituted the "Butchers' Protective Union," printed and circulated dodgers which read: "Don't sow the seeds of disease, and spread pestilence and death, by buying Chinese pork and lard; [plaintiff] sells Chinese pork and lard." There was also evidence that plaintiff had bought some pork from the Chinese, and that the Chinese often sold diseased pork, but the defendants' own witness testified that the pork sold by plaintiff was wholesome. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to judgment, since, in order to justify, the defendants must prove that the Chinese pork sold by plaintiff was unsound.

2. In such action, a verdict for $300 damages is not excessive.

3. It was claimed by the defendants that one object of the "Butchers' Protective Union" was to prevent the sale of unsound pork by Chinese. Held, that plaintiff might show why he refused to join the union.

4. It is proper to refuse to allow one of the defendants to testify that he had no malice against plaintiff when he published the libel, since the publication of matter false and libelous is, as matter of law, malicious.

5. To grant a new trial on account of newly-discovered evidence, where no diligence is shown, and the alleged new evidence is merely cumulative, and the fact of its being newly-discovered is denied, is an abuse of judicial discretion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

J. H. Miller, for appellant. Lloyd & Wood and J. D. Sullivan, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from an order granting defendants a new trial. Plaintiff was a retail butcher, doing business at the corner of Grove and Laguna streets, San Francisco. The defendants constitute the "Butchers' Protective Union." In July, 1886, they printed and circulated a great number of circulars or dodgers, which read as follows: "Protect yourself and family. Don't sow the seeds of disease, and spread pestilence and death, by buying Chinese pork and lard. Geo. B. Mowry, of the new Hayes Valley Market, corner Grove and Laguna streets, sells Chinese pork and lard. This is a fact, and can be vouched for by the committee of the Butchers' Protective Union. Buy your meats only where you see the union sign." It was alleged in the complaint that by this circular defendants intended to and did charge that plaintiff was engaged in selling his customers Chinese pork and lard, which contained the seeds of disease, and spread pestilence and death. The defendants admitted the publication, but denied that it was malicious, and averred that it was true. On the trial they offered evidence tending to prove that plaintiff purchased some pork from Chinese, which he sold to his customers, and also that the Chinese often sold diseased pork; but none which proved, or tended to prove, that the pork plaintiff sold was diseased, or would spread the seeds of disease and death. On the contrary, defendants' own witness testified that the particular pork sold by the plaintiff was sound, wholesome food. The learned judge held, and we think correctly, that the justification required defendants to prove not only that the pork sold by plaintiff was obtained from the Chinese, and was therefore what was known as "Chinese pork," but also that it was unsound. They offered no evidence which tended to establish that fact. The publication was therefore false and malicious. From the nature of the charge, it was calculated to injure the plaintiff. The grounds upon which the new trial was granted do not appear. We have therefore carefully reviewed the grounds upon which the motion was based, as shown in the statement, and have come to the conclusion that there is nothing in any of them which would justify the order for a new trial.

The verdict was for $300. There is clearly nothing in the amount of this verdict which can shock the moral sense of any one on the ground that it is excessive.

Nor was there anything improper in allowing plaintiff to explain why he refused to join the Butchers' Protective Union, even admitting that it was immaterial to the issue. It was claimed that one object of the union was to prevent the sale of unsound pork by Chinese, and a prejudice would probably have existed against plaintiff at the start, unless he could explain that he had other reasons than a desire to deal in such commodities. The defendants could not have been injured by it. Nor do we think there was error in refusing to allow Raabe, one of the defendants, when testifying in his own behalf, to answer the question: "Did you have any malice against the plaintiff at the time of the publication of the alleged libel?" The publication of matter false and libelous is, as matter of law, malicious. If the publication be admitted, as in this case, there is no way to rebut the implication of malice, except by proof of the truth of the charge. The defendant may, however, show, if he can, in mitigation, that he was not actuated by ill-will or a feeling of personal spite, and his own testimony directly to the point is competent evidence, tending to establish that fact. But no amount of testimony of this character can disprove that malice which constitutes a necessary ingredient of the cause of action. It is true the question is capable of being understood as referring only to ill will, which is sometimes called actual malice; but on its face it was an attempt to disprove malice, and thereby show that plaintiff had no cause of action, and had it been allowed defendants would perhaps have claimed, in submitting the case to the jury, that this necessary ingredient of plaintiff's cause of action did not exist. It was not an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court to sustain the objection to the question in this form, thereby compelling defendants, if they desired to pursue the matter further, to propound such questions as could not have been misunderstood.

The affidavits which, it is claimed, show newly-discovered evidence, do not justify the order granting a new trial. (1) No diligence is shown. It is true this is a matter specially within the discretion of the trial court, but not to the extent of requiring no showing as to diligence, and here there was practically none. (2) The counter-affidavit discloses facts which show conclusively that defendants were fully aware of the facts of the newly-discovered evidence long before the trial; their own affidavits do not negative this. (3) The newly-discovered evidence is entirely cumulative. In fact the gist of it all was admitted by plaintiff in his own testimony. It only goes further in showing in detail disgusting practices of the Chinese, calculated simply to intensify class prejudices already existing, and to extend the odium to plaintiff. (4) The proposed new evidence does not meet the exigencies of the case. In fact, unless it goes further, and shows that the Chinese sold no sound pork, it would be irrelevant and immaterial. The other alleged errors there is plainly nothing in, and there was no conflict of evidence upon any material point. We think the order granting a new trial an abuse of discretion, and advise its reversal.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order granting a new trial is reversed.

APPEAL—WHEN LIES—ORDER.

No appeal lies from an order refusing to revoke a former order, which was itself appealable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Lyman I. Mowry, (A. C. Niles, of counsel,) for appellants. A. Ruef, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an appeal from an order refusing to revoke an order granting letters of guardianship of a minor. The order made by the probate court appointing the guardian, was one which it was within the jurisdiction of that tribunal to make, and it was itself appealable. Section 963, Code Civil Proc., subd. 3. Hence the appellate court will not entertain jurisdiction of the appeal now here. Goyhinech v. Goyhinech, 80 Cal. 409, 22 Pac. Rep. 175; Larkin v. Larkin, 76 Cal. 323, 18 Pac. Rep. 396; Railroad Co. v. McGrath, 74 Cal. 49, 15 Pac. Rep. 360; Tripp v. Railroad Co., 69 Cal. 631, 11 Pac. Rep. 219. The matter does not come within the rule as to void judgments, laid down in People v. Greene, 74 Cal. 400, 16 Pac. Rep. 197. We therefore advise that the appeal be dismissed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FITZGERALD, C.

MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE.

In an action on a mutual benefit certificate by which the society agrees that in case of the member's death it will pay his wife "the amount realized from one assessment upon all the members, not exceeding the sum of $5,000," the plaintiff cannot recover where there is no proof that any assessment was made or demanded, or what was the number of members, or what one assessment would realize.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from judgment and order denying defendant a new trial. This action is upon a life insurance policy issued by the defendant, which is a mutual insurance society upon the assessment plan. In this case the policy or certificate declares that the society accepts J. R. Deardorff "as a full-rate member of said association, subject to all the requirements and entitled to all the benefits, thereof. The principal sum, not exceeding five thousand dollars, realized upon an assessment in accordance with the by-laws, to be paid Mary E. Deardorff, (wife,) if surviving, * * * within sixty days after satisfactory proof that said member at any time," etc., "said association shall, upon the surrender of this certificate, pay the amount realized from one said assessment upon all the members, at the time of the accident, of said association, to the member above named, not, however, exceeding the sum of five thousand dollars," etc. The complaint contains no allegation of an assessment, or of a demand that an assessment be made, and a refusal by the corporation, nor any averment as to the number of members, or what an assessment would amount to under the by-laws referred to, nor are there any data given in any form by which the court can arrive at such conclusion, nor does it appear that an assessment has been collected, or that the corporation has any money. There is, in fact, a total omission of any allegation upon the subject. The complaint is not, however, defective in this respect, for it avers an absolute insurance in the sum of $5,000. The true nature of the policy is set up in the answer, in which the certificate or policy of insurance is set out at large; and its genuineness is admitted. Nor was there any attempt at the trial to prove an assessment or a demand that one be made, or a refusal, or the number of members, or to what one assessment would amount. It is manifest that the judgment for the plaintiff must be reversed. The general rules of pleading apply to cases of this character; and the plaintiff, as in other cases, must show by proper averment his true cause of action, and the relief to which he is entitled. Many other points are raised by the appellant, but there is no appearance here on the part of respondent, and the questions may not arise upon another trial. We advise that the judgment and order be reversed, with leave to plaintiff to amend her complaint, if she shall be so advised.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, with leave to plaintiff to amend her complaint, if she shall be so advised.

NILES v. EDWARDS. (No. 13,050.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1891.)

CONVERSION BY PLEDGEE—STOCK.

Plaintiff, being the owner of a stock certificate indorsed in blank, lent it to A. for the purpose of being pledged as security for the purchase of other stock. A. pledged it for that purpose with defendant, to whom he was already indebted; and defendant, after buying the other stock for A., and selling it again at a profit, sold plaintiff's stock to satisfy A.'s previous debt, after being notified that plaintiff owned the stock. Held, that defendant was guilty of converting the stock.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

O'Brien, Morrison & Daingerfield, for appellant. Hall & Rodgers, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll. Judgment, on the findings, was for defendant. The plaintiff, who takes this appeal, claims that the findings do not support the judgment, but, on the contrary, show that plaintiff was entitled to recover. It appears from them that defendant was a stockbroker and a member of the stock and exchange board. Plaintiff was the owner of 100 shares of stock in the Ophir Mining Company. This certificate, like many others, as the practice was, had been issued to a trustee, who had indorsed it in blank, in which form it passed from hand to hand without further assignment. Plaintiff delivered this certificate to one Armstrong, to enable him to pledge it as security for the purchase of 50 shares of stock in the Gould & Curry Mining Company. For that purpose Armstrong deposited the certificate with defendant, who accordingly purchased the Gould & Curry stock, and afterwards sold it on Armstrong's account at a profit. Armstrong was indebted to defendant at the time this stock was deposited with him, on a previous account. Defendant had no notice at that time of plaintiff's ownership, but was notified of such fact about two months afterwards. It is not specifically found that the stock was pledged for the pre-existing debt, but only that Armstrong was indebted to defendant, and deposited the certificate, and thereupon he purchased the Gould & Curry stock. The Gould & Curry stock was sold March 1, 1886, and November 17, 1886, plaintiff demanded from defendant the stock, and offered to pay any proper charges against it, which demand defendant refused to comply with, and also notified plaintiff that a tender was unnecessary, as he would not deliver the stock. The findings are somewhat defective here, but we take it for granted that, in offering to pay all proper charges, plaintiff did not propose to pay the indebtedness of Armstrong, but simply assessments and outlays made by defendant upon the stock. The sale of the Gould & Curry stock more than repaid the new loan. Defendant held the stock until July, 1887, when he sold it, applying the proceeds to the indebtedness of Armstrong to himself. The findings show the market value of the stock and the amount of damages to which plaintiff is entitled, if it be held that there was a conversion by the defendant; and upon that subject we entertain no doubt. The plaintiff is clearly entitled to judgment. The apparent ownership of Armstrong is not shown to have resulted in injury to the defendant. On the contrary, he is better off by the transaction than he would have been by the amount of the profit realized on the Gould & Curry stock. There is no claim that he was induced to forego any remedy he may have had against Armstrong by reason of the pledge, or that he was any worse off in any way with reference to such indebtedness. After the moneys were repaid which were advanced on the stock, we think defendant did not hold the pledge in good faith and for value, in the sense of section 2991, Civil Code. There is a finding that defendant did not at any time convert the stock. This is evidently a conclusion of the court from the special facts found. If there had been no other finding, this would probably be regarded as the ultimate fact, but in the connection in which it is here found it is simply a conclusion of law, and must be so held. We think the judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to enter judgment for plaintiff on the findings.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the court below is directed to enter judgment for the plaintiff on the findings.

TYLER V. MAYRE et al. (No. 13,043.)¹

TRUST—ATTORNEYS—LIMITATIONS—WITNESSES.

1. The owner of a note, who had brought suit on it against the maker, assigned the note, together with all the avails of the suit, to a trustee for the purpose of securing certain persons who had become sureties for him upon a bond, "first deducting and paying out of any money that may be realized all charges for costs and attorney's fees." Held, that such assignment created a trust in favor of the assignor's attorney for his fees and disbursements for costs in the suit on the note.

2. Upon the death of such trustee the trust devolves upon his administrator, whose liability to the attorney may be enforced by suit.

3. The attorney's right of action to enforce such trust is not within the purview of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1493, which limits the time for presenting against the estates of decedents claims arising upon contract.

4. In an action against the administrator of a trustee and the administrator of the trustor to enforce the execution of the trust by the former, Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1880, which makes parties in actions upon claims against decedents incompetent as witnesses as against the representatives of the decedent, does not render the plaintiff an incompetent witness to prove the contract between himself and the trustor, by virtue of which he became the cestui que trust.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; NOBLE HAMILTON, Judge.

Whitemore & Sears, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Aylett R. Cotton, J. B. Reinsteina, and A. J. Le Breton, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. On November 24, 1873, one Jane E. Chase, being the owner and holder of a promissory note made by Briggs, Evoy, and Cobb, employed plaintiff, as her attorney at law, to bring suit on said note, which he did, and on the 3d of December, 1873, recovered final judgment thereon against the estate of Evoy (then deceased) for $6,175. On May 21, 1878, Jane E. Chase executed to the defendant William Irvine the following instrument: "Know all men by these presents, that Jane E. Chase, of Martinez, Contra Costa county, California, party of the first part, for the consideration and purpose hereinafter set forth, hath sold, assigned, transferred, and set over, and doth hereby sell, assign, transfer, and set over, unto William Irvine, of the city and county of San Francisco and state aforesaid, party of the second part, all and singular the following claims, indebtedness, and obligations, to-wit: The certain promissory note, in writing, made and executed to me by M. G. Cobbs, G. G. Briggs, and John Evoy, for the principal sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, gold coin, with interest at the rate of one and one-half per cent. per month, payable in thirty days from the date thereof, and dated August 21, 1871, now in suit in the third district court in and for the county of Alameda, wherein the said party of the first part is plaintiff, and Mary J. Evoy, administratrix of the estate of John Evoy, deceased, and others are defendants, together with all the avails of said action that may be paid, collected, or realized on or on account of the said note, and in the said action, and also the following insurance claim of the party of the first part, viz: Claim against the Hartford Fire Insurance Co. for twenty-five hundred dollars, claim against the Lamar Insurance Co. for nineteen hundred and fifty dollars, and claim against the Rhode Island Association of nineteen hundred and fifty dollars, all which insurance claims are now in suit in the district court of the 10th judicial district in and for the city and county of San Francisco; together with all and singular the avails and moneys that may be paid, collected, recovered, or received for or on account of said several claims: provided, always, that this assignment, sale, and transfer of said several claims and demands is made by said party of the first part to said party of the second part in trust, and to and for the following uses, intents, and purposes, to-wit: To secure Geo. W. Tyler and H. K. W. Clark, their, and each of their, heirs, executors, and administrators for their respective obligations and liabilities incurred by them, and either of them, as the bondsmen of the party of the first part as administratrix of the estate of M. S. Chase, deceased, made and delivered on her appointment as such administratrix, and also to secure any other substitutes of said bondsmen, or either of them, to be hereinafter substituted as her bondsmen in the matter of her administration of said estate, first deducting and paying out of any moneys that may be realized out of said claims all charges for costs and attorney's fees and charges, to provide for the payment of which this assignment and transfer is also made; hereby constituting and appointing the said party of the second part my true and lawful attorney, in my place and stead, to demand, collect, receive, and recover the said several demands, indebtedness, and claims, with full power and authority to compound for and settle and give acquittances for the same, as fully, in all respects, as I could do in my own proper person, but for this assignment and power." On August 28, 1881, Jane E. Chase died, and in July, 1882, defendant Clara J. Slater was appointed administratrix of her estate; the said Clara and the defendant Rhodes being her only heirs at law. On November 12, 1882, William Irvine died, and on December 4, 1882, the defendant Mayre was appointed administrator of his estate.

The purpose of this action is to recover from the estate of Irvine, through the administrator thereof, a portion of the money realized, or to be realized, from the judgment against Evoy, sufficient to pay plaintiff's fee (alleged to be $1,500) as attorney for Chase in the action in which that judgment was recovered; and also $70, alleged to have been expended by plaintiff as costs in the prosecution of that action; the plaintiff contending that the assignment of the note by Chase to Irvine was in trust to pay from the money realized from the note, among other things, first, the attorney's fees and charges due plaintiff for his services in said action on the note, which action was still pending (on appeal) at the time of the assignment of the note. Before the commencement of this action, by agreement of the parties interested, $1,000 of the money realized from the judgment on the note were deposited in the Bank of Martinez (the corporation defendant) to abide the judgment in this action. The prayer of the complaint is (1) that the court appoint some competent person to carry out said trust; (2) that it be adjudged "that there is due plaintiff from * * * the estate of Jane E. Chase, deceased, the sum of $1,570, payable out of the amount due on said judgment; (3) that the Bank of Martinez pay to said trustee the said sum of $1,000; and (4) that said trustee proceed to collect from the administratrix of John Evoy the amount due on said judgment, and pay the plaintiff out of the money so collected the sum of $1,570;" and for such other relief, etc. The separate answer of Mayre, administrator of Irvine, admits all the allegations of the complaint, and alleges that he has no interest in the subject-matter of this suit, because, he says, the estate of Evoy, with the consent of the administratrix of the estate of Chase, has paid to the estate of Irvine, "all the money due to said Irvine's estate," and therefore he "consents to any judgment herein that to the court may seem meet. Thesame is not to be taken against thesaid Mayre for any relief of costs." The separate answer of Shaw, administrator of the estate of Evoy, denies all the allegations of the complaint, and avers that, in obedience to an order of court made in the matter of the estate of Evoy, he paid upon the claim of the estate of Jane E. Chase the sum of $6,765. The joint answer of Slater, administratrix of Chase, and the Bank of Martinez denies that the assignment of Chase to Irvine was made in trust to secure payment of plaintiff's fees as attorney for Chase or for plaintiff's benefit, except as indemnity to him for having become a surety on the bond of Chase as administratrix of the estate of M. S. Chase, deceased; denies that the services of plaintiff were reasonably worth $1,500, or any sum whatever; denies the necessity for the appointment of any trustee to succeed Irvine; avers, in proper form, that the claim of plaintiff set up in his complaint, and upon which the action is based, is barred by section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and also by section 1500 of the same Code. The court found that the plaintiff performed the services charged for in his complaint under a special agreement with Jane E. Chase to the effect that she was to pay him therefor only $300, which was to be paid only "out of any moneys that might be collected upon final judgment recovered by plaintiff in that suit," viz., the suit in which the services were rendered; but also found that plaintiff's causes of action against the estate of Jane E. Chase were barred by section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As matter of law, the court construed the written assignment of the note by Chase to Irvine as not being in trust for plaintiff's benefit, and as not giving him any lien upon or interest in that note or the money to be collected in the suit thereon, as security for his fees or expenditures in the prosecution of such suit, or otherwise. As a necessary result of these findings, the court gave judgment for the defendants; from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

1. As contended by appellant, I think the court misconstrued the assignment from Chase to Irvine. That the assignment was in trust for certain purposes, and accepted as such by Irvine, there should be no doubt, (Civil Code, §§ 2221 and 2222,) though Irvine, the trustee, was also one of the beneficiaries, (Perry, Trusts, §§ 59, 297.) That one of the purposes of the trust was to pay the plaintiff and other attorneys of Chase their proper fees and charges for services and expenditures in the actions in which they were employed is expressed with sufficient certainty in the instrument itself. Before applying the money to be realized from the note and other claims assigned to any other purpose of the trust, the trustee is directed to deduct and pay "out of any moneys that may be realized out of said claims all charges for costs and attorney's fees and charges, to provide for the payment of which this assignment and transfer is also made." It appears that suits upon all the demands assigned were pending at the time of the assignment, and that plaintiff was the attorney for the assignor in the suit upon the note of Evoy, and rendered the services alleged by him, and was entitled to proper fees therefor, though it is found that a special agreement between him and Chase limited his fees to $300, to be paid only from the money recovered on the note.

2. The trust in this case devolved upon the administrator of Irvine, (Perry, Trusts, §§ 143, 144,) and the facts stated in the complaint constitute an equitable cause of action directly against Irvine's administrator. "The mutual consent of a trustor and trustee creates a trust of which the beneficiary may take advantage at any time prior to its rescission." Civil Code, § 2251; Bettis v. Townsend, 61 Cal. 333. And, even though the relation between Chase and Irvine should be held not to be that of trustor and trustee, the agreement between Chase and Irvine, upon a sufficient executed consideration, that the latter should pay plaintiff for his services to Chase, may be enforced by plaintiff directly against Irvine in an action at law. Civil Code, § 1559; McLaren v. Hutchinson, 22 Cal. 188; Pom. Rem. § 139; Whart. Cont. § 785 et seq., and notes. To plaintiff's alleged cause of action against Irvine's administrator, section 1493¹ of the Code of Civil Procedure has no proper application; nor was it or any other statute of limitation pleaded by the administrator of Irvine, whose answer admits all the allegations of the complaint, and consents to any judgment deemed proper by the court, except a judgment against him for costs; and therefore plaintiff's cause of action against the administrator of Irvine is not affected by the finding that his cause of action against the administratrix of Chase was barred by section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No question is raised as to the propriety of having joined the administratrix of Chase as a party defendant. Perhaps she was properly joined for the reason that she may be entitled to a resulting interest in the trust fund after all the purposes of the trust shall be satisfied; and, in view of one branch of the prayer of the complaint, it may have been prudent and proper for her to plead section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure as a bar to any relief sought against the estate of Chase. But the relief to which plaintiff is entitled against any one of the defendants is not limited by his prayer for relief against other defendants. He is entitled to any relief justified by the facts alleged in his complaint, if such facts are proved or admitted.

3. J. B. Reinstein was called as a witness by the defendants to prove the contents of a lost paper writing relating to the compensation plaintiff was to receive for his services in the case of Chase v. Evoy and others, and testified as follows: "That paper I saw was an agreement between Jane E. Chase and Geo. W. Tyler, signed by both, in which the sum of $250 or $300 was mentioned, to be paid to Tyler out of the proceeds of any judgment he might secure in that case for his services in that suit, and in connection with the promissory note on which that suit was founded. I cannot remember the whole or exact contents of the paper, but that much I do remember." "The plaintiff, in rebuttal, offered to prove, by his own oath, that the paper spoken of by witness Reinstein was an agreement between him and Jane E. Chase, providing for the payment for his services in preparing and presenting the claim against the estate of John Evoy, and in bringing said suit, and in procuring a judgment in the district court; and, when the note and suit was assigned by Jane E. Chase to Wm. Irvine in trust, plaintiff went to Jane E. Chase's room, at her request, and there met Mr. Wm. Irvine, and the whole matter was talked over between the three; that plaintiff was told of the assignment to Irvine in trust, and that he was to look to him thereafter for his pay for his services and expenses in said suit, which he agreed to do; that the first contract was talked about, and it was conceded by J. E. Chase, William Irvine, and himself that the agreement provided only for the preparation and presentation of the claim against the estate of John Evoy, deceased, and the bringing of suit and the trial of the case in the district court; that it was then and there agreed between plaintiff, Jane E. Chase, and William Irvine that plaintiff should continue to prosecute the case as attorney for plaintiff, and, if he finally succeeded in getting a judgment, he should be paid out of the proceeds of said judgment, when collected, a reasonable fee." This proffered testimony was objected to "as incompetent, under section 1880, Code Civil Proc.,² because it is not competent for plaintiff to testify, as against the administratrix, to any matters of fact occurring before the death of Jane E. Chase." The court sustained the objection, and excluded the testimony. Conceding that this testimony would have been incompetent to prove a cause of action against the administratrix of Chase, I think it was admissible in this action to establish and enforce a trust against the administrator of Irvine, even though it incidentally involved proof of a contract between plaintiff and Chase, made during the life of the latter. Myers v. Reinstein, 67 Cal. 89, 7 Pac. Rep. 192; Knight v. Russ, 77 Cal. 410, 19 Pac. Rep. 698; Perry, Trusts, § 86.

4. As already remarked, the trust devolved upon the administrator of Irvine; but, even if the trusteeship had been vacant, there would have been no necessity for the appointment of a successor to Irvine, as it appears that all parties controlling and interested in the trust fund are before the court. Perry, Trusts, § 873. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FITZGERALD, C.

COST BILL—VERIFICATION—ORDER TO STRIKE OUT —WHETHER APPEALABLE.1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1033, requiring a cost bill to be "verified by the oath of the party, or his attorney or agent, or by the clerk of his attorney," is sufficiently complied with when the affidavit is made by one who is familiar with the facts, and assisted at the trial, although not an attorney of record.

2. An order striking out a cost bill subsequent to the rendition and entry of the judgment is appealable, and can be reviewed without an appeal from the judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. TOWNER, Judge.

Brousseau, Hatch & Thomas, for appellant. Victor Montgomery, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an appeal from an order striking out the defendant's memorandum of costs on the ground that it was not "verified by the oath of the party, or his attorney or agent, or by the clerk of his attorney," as required by the provisions of section 1033, Code Civil Proc. The judgment was entered in the court below on July 24, 1890, and the order striking out the cost bill was made on August 21, 1890. The order is therefore appealable, and can be reviewed without an appeal from the judgment. Empire Gold Min. Co. v. Bonanza Gold Min. Co., 67 Cal. 406, 7 Pac. Rep. 810. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied. We think the court erred in its ruling. The memorandum was verified by Mr. West, a member of the bar of Orange county. Mr. West was not an attorney of record, but he assisted in the trial of the cause, and participated in the examination of witnesses and in the argument to the jury. Being the local attorney, he doubtless knew more about the costs and disbursements than the attorneys of record, who resided in the city of Los Angeles. The statute does not say that the attorney verifying the memorandum must be the attorney of record, and there is no reason for such a requirement. The object of the statute is to allow either the party or some representative who may be more familiar with the facts to verify the items of the bill. Formerly the statute required that the memorandum should be verified by the oath of the party. The court held that it could be done by his attorney, the legislature having intended no doubt to permit any one having knowledge of the facts to verify the account. Burnham v. Hays, 3 Cal. 119. That is certainly what was intended by the legislature in the enactment of the statute now in force. The order is reversed, with directions to hear the motion to tax costs on any other grounds named therein, but to overrule the objection we have considered.

BRISON v. BRISON. (No. 14,031.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. July 22, 1891.)

CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS—FRAUD—UNDUE INFLUENCE—FINDINGS—NEW TRIAL—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. On the trial of an action by a husband to compel his wife to convey certain property to him he testified that, several years before, being about to be absent for several years, and wishing to provide for her in case of his death, he had conveyed to her, instead of making a will, certain lands, induced by his confidence in her;

that she promised to reconvey same to him in the event of his return; and that he intended that she should receive a beneficial interest therein in case he should die before returning. The lawyer who drew the deed swore that he stated to her the reasons why her husband was about to make the deed, and that she promised to reconvey to him on his return. Held sufficient to support a finding that plaintiff was induced to make such deed by his confidence in his wife, and that he made it with the distinct understanding that in the event of his return she would reconvey the property to him, and that she was to receive a beneficial interest therein only in case he died before returning.

2. Under Civil Code Cal. § 1575, which defines undue influence as the use, by one in whom a confidence is reposed by another, of such confidence to obtain an unfair advantage over him, the subsequent refusal of the wife to reconvey said property was a betrayal of her husband's confidence, and constituted a constructive fraud.

3. The finding of the trial court is presumed to be correct on appeal, and the burden of proof is upon the appellant to show error therein; and, if the language of a finding is susceptible of two constructions, the appellate court will give to it that construction which is supported by the evidence, rather than one not so supported.

4. Where the complaint alleged both actual and constructive fraud, and the court makes a finding of constructive fraud, failure to make any finding as to actual fraud is immaterial, since such finding, if made in favor of either party, could in no way affect the verdict.

5. Under Code Civil Proc. §§ 656, 657, defining a new trial as "a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after a trial and decision," and authorizing a new trial in certain cases in order to vacate "the former verdict or other decision," the supreme court, upon an appeal from an order denying a new trial, can consider only the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and not the sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; PHILIP W. KEYSER, Judge.

Action to compel the conveyance of certain lands by one Brison against his wife. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

A. L. Hart, for appellant. A. P. Catlin and Add. C. Hinkson, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Upon the former appeal in this case (75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. Rep. 689) it was held that the facts alleged in the complaint entitled the plaintiff to the relief sought, as well upon the ground of constructive fraud on the part of the defendant, arising out of the violation of the confidential relations between her and the plaintiff, as upon the ground of the actual fraud alleged, and that the demurrer to the complaint should have been overruled. After the cause had been remanded to the court below, the defendant answered the complaint, denying all the allegations of actual fraud, and alleging that the conveyance to her by the plaintiff was made with the intent to vest her with the absolute title to the property. Upon the trial of the cause judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and, the defendant's motion for a new trial having been denied, an appeal has been taken from that order, but no appeal has been taken from the judgment.

1. Upon an appeal from an order denying a new trial this court cannot consider the sufficiency of either the complaint or of the findings to support the judgment. "A new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after a trial and decision," (Code Civil Proc. § 656,) and is authorized for the purpose of vacating the former verdict or other decision, (section 657.) The "decision" which may be thus vacated is that which was given upon the original trial of the question of fact, (section 632,) and upon which the judgment is to be entered. The provision that the judgment is to be entered "upon" the decision (section 633) implies that it is subsequent to and dependent on the decision. The judgment itself can be reviewed only by a direct appeal, (Id. § 936,) taken after its entry, (section 939.) The proceedings for a new trial are, however, entirely independent of the entry of the judgment, and may be instituted either before or after its entry, and even while an appeal from the judgment is pending; and the motion may be granted even after the judgment has been affirmed on appeal. If granted, the decision is vacated, and necessarily the judgment dependent thereon falls with it. Spanagel v. Dellinger, 34 Cal. 476. "Under our system, from the entry of the verdict or filing of the findings of the court, the motion for new trial is a kind of episode, or, in a certain sense, collateral proceeding; a proceeding not in the direct line of the judgment, for the judgment may be at once entered, and even executed, while a motion for a new trial is pending in an independent line of proceeding, which ends in an order reviewable on an independent appeal. The motion may be heard and decided, and an appeal taken on its own independent record, while the proceedings on and subsequent to the judgment may be still regularly going on, and even an independent appeal taken in that line." Spanagel v. Dellinger, 38 Cal. 284. "The question whether the judgment is authorized by the pleadings or findings cannot be agitated on the motion for a new trial, for it is not involved in a re-examination of the issues of fact. The Code has provided other and sufficient modes for the determination of both branches of that question, and it is very clear that the question whether the issues of fact were correctly found does not depend in any manner on the question whether a pleading states sufficient facts to entitle a party to the relief granted by the judgment, or whether the issues as found sustain the judgment." Martin v. Matfield, 49 Cal. 45; In re Doyle's Estate, 73 Cal. 571, 15 Pac. Rep. 125. It follows that, as upon this appeal we can only review the action of the court below, we cannot consider whether the findings are sufficient to sustain the judgment, and that our examination of the evidence is limited to a consideration of its sufficiency to sustain the findings of fact.

2. When upon the trial of a cause the court renders its decision without making findings upon all the material issues presented by the pleadings, it is held that such decision can be reviewed upon a motion for a new trial. Knight v. Roche, 56 Cal. 15. In such a case there has been a mistrial, and the decision, having been rendered before the case has been fully tried, is considered to have been a decision "against law." It will be observed, however, that this rule is applicable only in a case where the issues upon which there is no finding are "material;" that is, where a finding upon such issues would have the effect to countervail or destroy the effect of the other findings. If a finding upon such issues would not have this effect, the issues cannot be regarded as material, and the failure to make a finding thereon would not be prejudicial. McCourtney v. Fortune, 57 Cal. 619. If the findings which are made are of such a character as to dispose of issues which are sufficient to uphold the judgment, it is not a mistrial or against law to fail or omit to make findings upon other issues, which, if made, would not invalidate the judgment. If the issue presented by the answer is such that a finding upon it in favor of the defendant would not defeat the plaintiff's right of action, a failure to make such finding is immaterial. Fontaine v. Railroad Co., 54 Cal. 654. If the complaint, as in the present instance, sets forth two or more grounds for relief, either of which is sufficient to support a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, a finding upon one of such issues is sufficient, and a failure to find upon the other does not constitute a mistrial, or render the decision "against law." In view of these principles, the failure of the court to make a finding upon the issue of actual fraud is not a ground for vacating its decision unless a finding upon that issue in favor of the defendant would have the effect to modify or overcome its other findings. Inasmuch as it was held upon the former appeal in this case that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief sought by him upon the ground of constructive fraud arising out of the breach by the defendant of the confidential relations existing between them, even if no actual fraud had been alleged, the failure to make a finding upon the issue of actual fraud is immaterial. If such finding had been made in favor of the defendant, it would not have impaired the effect of the finding upon the issue of constructive fraud, and, if made against her, it would have only given additional support to the judgment.

3. The plaintiff alleged in the complaint "that he had at all times confidence in his said wife, the defendant, and her devotion and fidelity to him, until he returned home" in September, 1886; and that he "was induced to and did make" the deed to her, "having confidence in his said wife, the defendant, and in her said representation and promise, [to reconvey to him upon request,] and relying upon the same." The only denial of these allegations by the defendant is the denial that the plaintiff was induced to make the said deed to her "by reason of any confidence in any representation or promise of this defendant, or relying upon the same." The relation of husband and wife between the parties is admitted, and also that the plaintiff had at all times confidence in his wife, and in her devotion and fidelity to him, and that he made the deed to her relying upon that confidence. Upon these allegations this court said, (75 Cal. 529, 17 Pac. Rep. 691:) "The relation of the parties to each other, therefore, was confidential in fact as well as in the law. The plaintiff was induced to make the deed by the confidence which he had in his wife, and the belief thereby engendered that she would perform her promise. But for that he would not have made it. The betrayal of such confidence is constructively fraudulent, and gives rise to a constructive trust. This is independent of any element of actual fraud." At the trial the plaintiff testified that in May, 1881, he was about to go to Arizona, to be absent from California for several years, and, being solicitous that in case of his death his wife might enjoy this property, went to consult an attorney in reference to the matter, and in consequence of a suggestion by the attorney he determined to make the deed in question, instead of a will. "I started away from the State House Hotel on K street for the purpose of seeing a lawyer. While I was getting my boots blacked on J street, Mr. Addison C. Hinkson came along. I hailed him, and told him that I was going to Arizona, and the chances were that I might get killed, and I wanted to leave my family safe, and desired him to make my will. He studied a little while, and said, 'You had better, under those circumstances, make a deed, if you have implicit confidence that your wife will deed it back to you.' I said: 'My God, if I could not have confidence in my wife, who in the world would I have confidence in?' I said: 'Certainly, I have the utmost confidence in her. When can you attend to the matter?' He said, 'Right off.' I said, 'I will go and get my wife, and come over.' I had never spoken to her up to this time, or to any human being, about making a will, or about making a deed. I went over and got her, and on the way down told her the whole circumstances. She said to me that I had better not do it, and I said that I would. Mr. Hinkson stated the whole matter to her, and she said that she did not want me to do it, but said that she would deed it back to me. Mr. Hinkson sat down and wrote the deed, and I gave him a description of the premises. I then signed the deed, and she went back to the State House, and I went to the recorder's office and filed the deed. When I was on the way down with the defendant to Mr. Hinkson's office she said she did not want me to deed it to her, and she promised to deed it back to me. She made the same promises in the office of Mr. Hinkson, in his presence. Mr. Hinkson stated the matter exactly, and advised the making of a deed instead of a will. It was through Mr. Hinkson that I made the deed instead of the will. I had intended to make a will." On cross-examination the plaintiff testified: "The idea of making a will just struck my mind, and I started over to see a lawyer, and called Hinkson to me. I told him I was coming to see him about making a will, as I thought I might be killed. He said: 'If you have implicit confidence in your wife, deed it to her;' and I said: 'I have implicit confidence in her.' When I saw Mr. Hinkson I told him the reason I wanted him to make a will, so that in case of my death the public administrator would not get hold of my property, and squander it; and he then said: 'If you would make a deed they could not get hold of it, and things would go right along, and nobody would touch the property. But,' he said, 'they might get hold of the will.' I intended to pass the estate to her, so that in case of my death there would be no administration, and it would be her property, and nobody could take it from her. I intended the property to be hers in case of my death. I did that on Mr. Hinkson's advice, and then, after I met him, I went over and told my wife what I intended to do. I had made up my mind to do so before I saw her. I did not wait to get any promise from her. If she had told me she would not give me back the deed when I came back I would not have given it to her at all. I would not have deeded it to her but for her promise. I had made up my mind that if she would agree to give it back to me I would give it to her. I had confidence in her word, and I thought she would do it. She did agree to do it. She told me she would on the way, and told me in Hinkson's office. When we got to the office Mr. Hinkson went over the same thing, and she repeated it to me in the office. He told her what he had said to me, and she said then that she would. He told her that I had told him that I was going to make a will, and he had advised me it was better to make a deed, if she would deed it back again, and he stated the reasons. She spoke, and said certainly she would; but she did not want me to deed it to her at all, and said I had better not do it."

Mr. Hinkson, in his testimony, stated: "I said to Mrs. Brison that her husband had said to me that he desired to make a will, and will his property; that he was going to Arizona, and, that being a rough country down there, he did not know what might happen to him, and wanted to arrange it so that his wife could have his property in the event of his death; and I asked him the question, why might he not make her a deed to the property, and he asked me if I could do that, and I said: 'Yes, you can do that if you have implicit confidence in your wife that she will deed the property back to you when you return, and so desire it.' I told her that Mr. Brison had answered me that he had unlimited confidence in her, and was satisfied she would deed it back to him if he returned, and so desired it reconveyed. Mrs. Brison answered me that Mr. Brison knew very well that she would deed it back to him if he asked her to do so. There was some other conversation in which Mr. Brison joined, and Mrs. Brison made the statement: 'Of course, if he wanted her to deed it back to him she would deed it on his return.' Whereupon I drew a deed, and Mr. Brison signed it, and I took the acknowledgment and returned it to Mrs. Brison, and I think she gave it to Mr. Brison to be placed on record."

Upon the evidence on this subject, the court, after finding the intention of the plaintiff to go to Arizona, further found: "Upon coming to said determination, plaintiff at first, in view of the personal risk and dangers of said proposed undertaking, intended and proposed to make a will, and thereby to bequeath and devise all his estate, real and personal, to the defendant; and, for the purpose of having such will prepared, plaintiff consulted an attorney at law, and informed him of his said intention and desire, and thereupon said attorney advised him that the expense of probating such will, as well as the trouble of administering upon his estate, to his wife, the defendant, could be saved by making a deed absolute in form to her, if he had confidence in her, and believed that she would reconvey the property to him on his return from Arizona, if he should return home alive. Thereupon the plaintiff proposed to his said wife, the defendant, to make a deed absolute in form to her for said lands upon condition that she would reconvey the same to him if he should return home, and request the same; that thereupon, in the presence of said attorney, the said defendant represented to and promised the plaintiff that if he would make and deliver to her a deed absolute in form for said land she would, upon his return, if he returned from Arizona, or upon his request, convey the land back to him; and the said plaintiff then and there, having confidence in his said wife, the defendant, and in her said representation and promises, and relying upon the same, and to save the expense of probating such proposed will and of administration upon his estate in the event of his death while absent, was induced to and did make a deed absolute in form of said land to the defendant, instead of making said will, upon the conditions, and with this distinct understanding between them, that if he should return from Arizona, the defendant would convey back to him the said land."

It is alleged on behalf of the appellant that this finding is not justified by the evidence, inasmuch as it is in effect a finding that the conveyance was made in pursuance of an agreement therefor, resulting from negotiations between the parties wherein the plaintiff was induced to execute the deed by reason of some act of persuasion on the part of the defendant, whereas the evidence established that the conveyance was a voluntary act on the part of the husband, coupled with a mere promise on the part of the wife that she would reconvey to him on his return from Arizona. It may be conceded, as is claimed by the appellant, that the evidence of a verbal agreement between husband and wife that will create a constructive trust should be clear, satisfactory, and conclusive; but it must also be conceded that whether the evidence in any case is of this character must be determined by the trial court, and that this court must accept the determination of the trial court thereon as conclusive. In determining whether a finding is justified by the evidence it is necessary to take into consideration all of the evidence, rather than certain disconnected portions thereof. The finding of the trial court when brought here on appeal is to be deemed correct, rather than erroneous; and it is incumbent on the appellant to point out the error and show the particulars wherein it is not supported by the evidence; otherwise it will be upheld by this court. If the language of a finding is susceptible of different constructions, one of which is supported by the evidence, and the other not, this court will give to the language that construction which finds such support, rather than a construction which would have the effect to defeat the finding.

It clearly appears from the evidence herein that it was not the purpose of the plaintiff, by the conveyance which he then executed, to make the defendant the absolute owner of the property conveyed to her, but that his sole purpose was to place it temporarily in her name, to be held in trust for him until his return from Arizona; and that only in case of his death before such return was she to have the beneficial enjoyment of it. His statement: "I intended to pass the estate to her, so that in case of my death there would be no administration, and it would be her property, and nobody could take it from her,"—must be read in connection with his statement immediately following: "I intended the property to be hers in case of my death;" and the additional fact must also be considered that the original purpose in his mind was to make a will in her favor, and that this purpose was changed upon the suggestion by his attorney that the object he had in view in carrying out this purpose would be as well effected by making a deed to her, if he had implicit confidence that she would deed it back to him. The confidence which he had in his wife was the inducement which led him to place the property in her name. The clause in the finding that the plaintiff was "induced" to make the deed to his wife does not necessarily imply any act of inducement on her part. The court does not find that she did or said anything with the purpose of inducing him to make the conveyance,—its finding being that the plaintiff "was induced" to make the conveyance by reason of the confidence which he had in her, and in her representation and promises; and that his purpose in making it was to enable her, in case of his death, to come into the immediate enjoyment of the property. The fact that as soon as he made this purpose known to her she advised against it, and said that she did not wish him to do it, but that she would deed it back to him, and that later in the day, when Mr. Hinkson recounted to her the interview between himself and her husband, she answered him that "Mr. Brison knew perfectly well that she would deed it back to him if he asked her to do so," was calculated to deepen the confidence which their relations justified him in reposing in her. This promise on her part to reconvey is not to be considered as the consideration upon which the plaintiff agreed to make the conveyance, but rather as an assurance on her part that the marital confidence which he reposed in her was not misplaced; and the "condition" named in the finding, upon which the conveyance was made, is to be regarded rather as the expectation springing from such confidence, than a limitation upon the estate which the defendant was to receive by the conveyance.

While these acts, if the plaintiff had been dealing with a stranger, might not create an enforceable trust, yet with his wife they did, and her subsequent refusal to reconvey was not merely the breach of an agreement, but was the betrayal of a confidence, and the violation of a trust, constituting a constructive fraud, which a court of equity will remedy. The influence which the law presumes to have been exercised by one spouse over the other is not an influence caused by any act of persuasion or importunity but is that influence which is superinduced by the relation between them, and generated in the mind of the one by the confiding trust which he has in the devotion and fidelity of the other. Such influence the law presumes to have been undue, whenever this confidence is subsequently violated or abused. Civil Code, § 1575, subd. 1. Reading the evidence in the light of the relations existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, and of the confidence which the plaintiff at all times had in his wife, and in her devotion and fidelity to him, until her refusal to reconvey the property to him, we think that the finding of the court is fully justified, and its order denying a new trial is affirmed.

JONES v. EDDY et al. (No. 14,020.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1891.)

PLEADING—CONJUNCTIVE DENIAL.

An allegation that defendants "assumed and agreed" to pay a debt, amounts merely to an assertion that they "agreed" to pay it, and hence a denial that they "assumed and agreed" is sufficient, though stated in the conjunctive.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. WADE, Judge.

Action by G. G. Jones against Jemima Eddy, R. Verch, and A. J. Sanborn, to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants Verch and Sanborn appeal. Reversed.

The complaint alleged that "on the 29th day of October, 1887, defendants R. Verch and A. J. Sanborn jointly purchased the interest of said Jemima Eddy in said premises, and as a part of the consideration therefor assumed and agreed to pay said notes and mortgage according to the terms thereof, which assumption and agreement was made with said Jemima Eddy as a part of such transaction." The answer of defendants Verch and Sanborn denies "that as a part of the consideration of the purchase of said premises they assumed and agreed to pay the notes and mortgage described in said complaint; they deny that any assumption of said mortgage was made with said Jemima Eddy, as a part of said transaction; they deny that they assumed and agreed to pay said notes and mortgage as a part of said transaction, or as a part of the consideration of her deed in conveying the said property to these defendants." The court found from the pleadings upon this issue: "And said court further finds from the pleadings herein that at said time last mentioned said defendants R. Verch and A. J. Sanborn assumed and agreed to pay said notes and mortgage according to the terms thereof, which assumption and agreement was made with said Jemima Eddy; and said assumption and agreement was to the benefit of George Scoville and Olive Scoville, and on said 27th day of October, 1887."

Thomas J. Carran, for appellants. Allen & Miller, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was to foreclose a mortgage upon certain real property. The case comes here on appeal from the judgment rendered as prayed for, for the sale of the mortgaged premises, and, in case of a deficiency arising from said sale, for the deficiency balance as against the defendants. Mrs. Eddy, one of the defendants, does not appeal. The mortgage was made to secure certain promissory notes executed and delivered in favor of George and Olive Scoville, who have assigned the same to the plaintiff, Jones. Verch and Sanborn, who are the appellants here, were the purchasers from Mrs. Eddy of her interest in the mortgaged premises. Among other things, the court, in its fourth finding of fact, found from the pleadings that when Verch and Sanborn bought her interest they "assumed and agreed to pay said notes and mortgage according to the terms thereof, which assumption and agreement was made with said Jemima Eddy, and said assumption and agreement was to the benefit of George Scoville and Olive Scoville; and on said 27th day of October, 1887, said interest of Jemima Eddy in said premises was by her deed bearing date on that day, and since recorded in Book 321 of Deeds, page 287, of said Los Angeles county records, conveyed by said Jemima Eddy, together with P. G. Eddy, her husband, to defendants R. Verch and A. J. Sanborn, jointly, who are now in possession of said premises, except lot 12, hereinafter mentioned, since released from the operation of said mortgage." The appellants claim that they ought not to be held liable for a deficiency over and above what the mortgaged premises may bring at foreclosure sale. There would be no difficulty in affirming the judgment here, if finding 4 was justified by the pleadings. Pellier v. Gillespie, 67 Cal. 583, 8 Pac. Rep. 185. The appellants say that such finding, most of which we have heretofore quoted herein, is not sustained by the actual condition of the pleadings. They claim that the denial in the amended answer and cross-complaint, at paragraph 2, folio 73, of the transcript, is sufficient as against that of the complaint in paragraph 3, folios 11 and 12; and that, such being the case, finding 4 is not justified. If the averments in the answer were in the conjunctive, evasive, and raised no issue, they would come under the rule laid down in Doll v. Good, 38 Cal. 290, and the trial court would have decided correctly in finding the allegation of the complaint to be true. But that tribunal has come to this conclusion by holding that, where it is said in the complaint the defendants "assumed and agreed" to pay the mortgage debt, they undertook to do two separate and distinct things essential to make them responsible to pay the mortgage debt, if the property resting under the mortgage lien was insufficient for that purpose. We cannot see that there is any difference whatever in this instance in saying that they "undertook and agreed" to pay the debt from saying that they "assumed and agreed" to pay it. There is only one proposition contained in the words "assumed and agreed," as here employed. The assumption to pay the debt is, as used here, the same thing as agreeing or undertaking to pay it; and the use of both words "assume and agree" is, as employed, no more the statement of two distinct propositions than if it had been stated that they "agreed and agreed" to pay the debt. For these reasons we think the finding is wrong, and that the judgment is erroneous, so far as the defendant's liability for a deficiency is concerned, and we advise that it be reversed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C. C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed.

EASTMAN v. COOK et al. (No. 14,238.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 17, 1891.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—REFUSING NEW TRIAL.

Where the evidence is sufficient to justify the findings and decision of the court below, and there are no errors of law apparent on the record entitling plaintiffs to a new trial, the judgment and order overruling a motion for a new trial will be affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. BUCKLES, Judge.

F. E. Johnson and John M. Gregory, for appellants. G. Frank Smith and Geo. A. Lamont, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. On the 19th day of January, 1876, Cyrus A. Eastman, then being the owner of a tract of land in Solano county, conveyed the same to defendant George Cook. The purchase price was the sum of $3,200, of which $200 was paid at the date of the conveyance, and for the residue Cook gave his promissory note, payable five years after date, and to secure the payment thereof executed a mortgage on the premises. On May 27, 1876, Cook conveyed the premises to one John White. That deed was recorded on June 7, 1876. On November 10, 1877, John White conveyed the premises to defendant Fanny White, his then wife, and the deed was recorded on the 29th of December, 1877. On the 19th day of December, 1883, defendant Fanny White conveyed the premises to defendant Charlotte Harriet Cook, wife of defendant George Cook. That deed was never recorded. On the 22d day of September, 1887, defendant Fanny White executed another deed of the same premises to defendant Charlotte Harriet Cook, which was recorded February 1, 1888. On the 14th of January, 1885, Cook made another note to said Cyrus A. Eastman, for $3,000, payable five years after date; and to secure the payment thereof executed a mortgage on said premises, which was recorded on January 30, 1885. At the same time the former mortgage of January 19, 1876, on the premises was released and discharged. This action is brought for the foreclosure of the mortgage of January 14, 1885; and to have it adjudged that the conveyances from George Cook to John White, and from John White to Fanny White, and from Fanny White to Charlotte Harriet Cook, were made at the request of George Cook, and in trust for him. The court found that they were, and made and entered a decree of foreclosure and sale, as prayed in plaintiff's complaint. The defendants George Cook and Charlotte Harriet Cook moved for a new trial upon "(1) insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings and decision of the court, and the findings are and the decision is against law; (2) errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the said defendants making this application." The motion was made on a statement of the case. The motion was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying said motion. The question of the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings and decision of the court can be determined only after a careful perusal and consideration of all the evidence in the case. For that reason we must decline to discuss the evidence in detail. After a careful consideration of all the evidence, we are satisfied that it is sufficient to justify the findings and decision. There are no errors of law apparent on the record which entitle appellants to a new trial. Judgment and order affirmed.

PEYRE v. MUTUAL RELIEF SOC. OF FRENCH ZOUAVES. (No. 13,065.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 17, 1891.)

BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES—EXPULSION OF MEMBERS—JURISDICTION—DAMAGES FOR EXPULSION.

1. Where a member of a private corporation, formed by the voluntary association of its members, not for pecuniary profit, but to aid and sustain sick members, the by-laws of which provide for expulsion of members for misconduct, submits his case, when charged with misconduct, to the jurisdiction of the judiciary committee of the corporation, and, on being adjudged guilty, appeals to the whole body of its members, under the by-laws, he acknowledges the jurisdiction of the society.

2. In such case, if any irregularities occur in the procedure, they must be corrected by the society to which the member has submitted his case.

3. A member of a private corporation formed by the voluntary association of its members, not for pecuniary profit, but for benevolent purposes, cannot recover damages from the corporation, upon being improperly and unlawfully expelled from membership.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Louis F. Dunand and Lindley & Eickhoff, for appellant. A. Comte, Jr., and Van Ness & Roche, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiff sued the defendant, a corporation of which he was a member, for damages. The complaint was demurred to as showing no cause of action. The demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiff refusing to amend, final judgment went in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal. The corporation appears, from the complaint, to be a benevolent association, "for a purpose where pecuniary profit is not their object." It has no capital stock, nor any property except $5,000 in cash, a fund made up of sums received from time to time of its members, from fees, fines, and assessments, which fund is under the control of the association, "to be used by it for benevolent purposes, to-wit, in and about pecuniarily aiding and sustaining those of its members who become sick or distressed." It is not alleged that the plaintiff is either sick or distressed. One of the articles of the constitution or instrument of association of the corporation is: "Art. 53. A member who violates one of his or any of his obligations towards the society; who is found guilty of intemperance whilst he receives benefits; who lends himself to habits tending to call forth either upon himself or the society contempt or reproach,—shall be for the said facts and reasons responsible to the society, and upon proof shall, according to the decision of the society, be condemned to pay a fine, suspended, expelled, or released of his trust, if holding a position of trust," etc. By virtue of this article the plaintiff was suspended from membership in this benevolent association for the period of five years, and on this account he seeks to recover, in this action, damages against the corporation, in the sum of $10,000, alleged to have resulted from the sentence of suspension rendered against him. The offense charged against him by one of the members of the association, although called "forgery" in a communication to the society signed by the member making the charge, appears to have been that of false impersonation, in a matter between the association and the French authorities, where the plaintiff, in assuming to conduct its business as a member of the society, had falsely represented himself to the French minister of foreign affairs as the "captain in command of the company of French Zouaves." This charge, it seems, the society determined to be true, and that it was such misconduct as warranted the association in holding it a breach by the plaintiff of his obligation against the society, and punished him by suspension. The defendant being a private corporation, formed by the voluntary association of its members, not for pecuniary profit, but for benevolent purposes, had the right to provide in its by-laws for the suspension of a member for misconduct. Civil Code, § 599, subd. 4.

The plaintiff not only submitted himself and his case to the jurisdiction of the judiciary committee of the society, which was appointed under the "rules of conduct" of the corporation, but when the association, as a body, had acted on the report of that committee, and had by a vote of 36 ayes to 20 noes adjudged him guilty as charged, he, in accordance with those "rules of conduct," took an appeal under the fifty-seventh article of the constitution of the society, that the cause might be reheard by the whole body of the members of the corporation. This appeal came on to be heard before the members of the corporation, and was rejected, and notice thereof was given to the plaintiff. It is plain that the jurisdiction was complete on the part of the members of the corporation to hear and determine the matter in hand. The procedure seems to have been substantially that prescribed by the constitution and "rules of conduct," and, if any irregularity took place, it was for the tribunal to which the plaintiff submitted himself to correct it. But if we were to admit that on the statements in the complaint the defendant was improperly and unlawfully suspended, and that he ought to be reinstated as a member of the association, and that this can be done by a writ of mandate upon a proper showing, still there is no ground for an action of damages shown in the complaint. The plaintiff claims that his admission into the society was by virtue of a contract, which contention is without any force. He was admitted into the association because the members thereof chose to have him become a member, and when they, in accordance with their constitution and "rules of conduct," determined that he had violated his obligation to the society in the commission of the misconduct charged against him, they virtually declared that they wished their association with him to end for five years, and carried their will into effect. This is no ground for damages, even if the facts upon which this determination was predicated do not justify it; for, if the plaintiff's view were to prevail, then the 20 members of the corporation who were the friends of the plaintiff, and voted against his suspension, would become as responsible for any alleged damage as those who had voted to suspend him. We know of no case where any such manifest injustice has been declared to be lawful, and we are satisfied that none can be found. We are of opinion that the demurrer was properly sustained, and that the judgment should be affirmed, and so advise.

MECHANICS' LIENS—ESTOPPEL.

Where the contract for erection of a building between the owner and contractor is void for failure to record the same, or other defects, the bond thereto attached, conditioned that the contractor will not permit any valid claim or lien to be placed on the building, is void also; and the fact that a material-man was surety thereon does not estop him from setting up a lien on the building.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

J. W. Mitchell and Graff, Gibbon & Creighton, for appellant. Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien against defendant, Neal, owner of the building, and one Goetzman, the contractor. Defendant, Neal, appeals from the judgment and order denying her motion for a new trial. The contract between the defendant, Neal, and Goetzman, the contractor, under which Goetzman began the erection of the building, was declared void by the court, owing to the failure of recordation and other defects. Attached to this contract was a bond in the sum of $2,500, signed by the contractor, Goetzman, as principal, and the Shaller-Ganahl Lumber Company and Thomas Stovell, the plaintiff, as sureties, binding themselves in the aforesaid sum to defendant, Neal, and we quote therefrom: "The condition of the above obligation is such that should he, the said H. J. Goetzman, the above-named principal, duly and properly, well and truly, and faithfully comply with and perform all stipulations, acts, and agreements entered into and to be performed by the said H. J. Goetzman, as appears in the foregoing contract, and should he not in any wise permit any valid claim, debt, or lien to be placed upon the building in the erection thereof, or the incurring of any liability on the part of the said Mrs. Juana A. Neal, by reason of the erection, other than the amount to be paid by her to the said H. J. Goetzman for said building, as in said contract described and specified, then the above obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue." Defendant set out this bond in the answer, and relied upon it to constitute an estoppel against plaintiff. The trial court found as a conclusion of law that the said bond was dependent upon the aforesaid contract, and, the contract being void, the bond was void, and therefore constituted no defense to this action. This conclusion of the court is manifestly correct. The contract being void, no cause of action could be based upon it by either party. The bond was attached to the contract, and its conditions based upon it, and when the contract fell, the bond was left without support, and necessarily fell with it. According to the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses, materials to the amount of $43.50 were neither furnished to be used nor used in the construction of defendant's building. Let the cause be remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify its judgment by striking from the amount thereof the sum of $43.50, and in all other respects let the judgment and order be affirmed.

DISMISSAL OF ACTION—VACATION OF JUDGMENT—NOTICE—WAIVER.

1. In an action for possession of personal property, which is thereupon taken possession of by plaintiff after giving an undertaking for its redelivery, an answer asking for the return and redelivery of the property to defendants, or in case a redelivery cannot be had, then for the value of the property, and for damages and costs, asks affirmative relief, so that, after such answer is filed, plaintiff cannot dismiss the action.

2. Though the answer in such case is not filed within the time prescribed by law, the filing is not a nullity, and plaintiff's remedy is a motion to strike it from the files.

3. The date of the dismissal of an action is when the judgment of dismissal is entered, and not when the entry is made in the register of actions by the clerk that the action is dismissed by order of plaintiff.

4. Where the attorneys for both parties are present at the hearing of a motion to vacate a judgment, it cannot be objected that no notice of the motion was given.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. A. L. Hart, for respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from an order setting aside a judgment of dismissal of the above-entitled action on motion of defendants. The record before us discloses the following facts: The action, which is for the recovery of the possession of personal property, was commenced on the 22d day of August, 1889, at which time the plaintiff gave an undertaking for the delivery to him of the property described in the complaint, and thereupon said property was upon proper process taken by the sheriff from the defendants by said plaintiff. On the 4th day of September, 1889, and after the defendants had given an undertaking for the redelivery of said property to them, the plaintiff, without redelivering said property to them, caused to be made by the clerk of the court in which said action was pending the following entry in the register of actions: "Dismissed by order of plaintiff's attorneys this 4th day of September, 1889. Attest: WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk." On the 10th day of September, 1889, defendants filed an answer to said complaint, and at the same time: notice of motion to have said order of dismissal set aside, and to reinstate said cause upon the records of the court, and for permission to file an answer. On the 21st day of September, 1889, said motion was heard by the court, and an order, of which the following is a copy, made: "Motion to set aside dismissal. T. L. Acock, Plaintiff, vs. Nellie T. Halsey et al., Defendants. Matter coming on for hearing, Johnson & Johnson appearing for plaintiff, and A. L. Hart, for defendants. Matter argued and submitted, and motion denied." Thereafter, on the 25th day of April, 1890, against the objection of plaintiff, said cause was at the instance of defendants set for trial on the 12th of June 1890. Thereupon, on said 25th of April, plaintiff, without leave of the court, or notice to opposing counsel, procured to be entered by the clerk of said court a judgment of dismissal. On the 12th day of June, 1890, the day on which said action had been set for trial, said judgment was first brought to the attention of defendants' counsel and the court; whereupon, both parties being present by counsel, defendants' counsel, without notice, moved the court to set aside and vacate said judgment as being void, and as having been entered by the clerk, without authority of law, after the filing of defendants' answer; and on the 29th day of August, 1890, the court made an order vacating and setting aside said judgment, to which said order plaintiff then and there excepted, and from which this appeal is taken. If the judgment of dismissal was void, the court, on having its attention called to it, could summarily or otherwise vacate it. "An action may be dismissed, or a judgment of nonsuit entered, * * * by the plaintiff himself at any time before trial, upon payments of costs; provided, a counter-claim has not been made, or affirmative relief sought by the cross-complaint of defendant." It appears by the record that before and at the time of the entry of the judgment of dismissal in this case there was an answer of the defendants on file, in which the defendants, among other things, prayed "for the return and redelivery of said property to defendants, if a delivery thereof be had; or, in case a delivery thereof cannot be had, then for the value of said property in the sum of $500; for damages in the sum of $150; for defendants' costs in this action." We think the defendants by their answer clearly seek affirmative relief. But the answer, although filed before the entry of the judgment of dismissal, was not filed until after the entry in the register of actions that the action was "dismissed by order of plaintiff's attorneys." When was the action dismissed? This question is answered in Page v. Superior Court, 76 Cal. 372, 18 Pac. Rep. 385, in which it is held that an action which is directed to be dismissed by the plaintiff in the register of actions is not dismissed until the judgment is entered. Therefore the action in this case was not dismissed until after the answer of defendants, in which they sought affirmative relief, was filed. But the answer was not filed until after the expiration of the time within which the Code provides that an answer may be filed. But it could not be disregarded, or treated as a nullity, so long as it remained on file. The plaintiff's remedy was a motion to strike it from the files. "It was, perhaps, not strictly regular to file the answer after the time for answering had expired, without leave of the court; but, as the default of the defendant had not been entered, we think the filing was not a nullity." Bowers v. Dickerson, 18 Cal. 420. Appellant's counsel contends that no notice in writing of the motion to vacate said judgment was given. It does not appear that any such notice was given; but it appears that appellant's counsel were present at the hearing of the motion, and contested the same, which was a waiver of written notice. The object of giving the notice was fully accomplished without giving it. McLeran v. Shartzer, 5 Cal. 70; Reynolds v. Harris, 14 Cal. 677. Order affirmed.

DIVERSION OF WATER-COURSE—INJUNCTION—PRACTICE—FINDINGS OF FACT.

1. It is not necessary that the findings of the court on material issues raised by the pleadings shall follow the pleadings, but if the findings, taken together, are such that the court can say that the ultimate facts necessarily result therefrom, they are sufficient.

2. Though the complaint, in an action to restrain the diversion of a stream from the course in which plaintiff claims he is entitled to have it flow, as prior riparian owner and prior appropriator, alleges that damages to the land will result from the diversion, the court need not find on the issue of damages, since plaintiff is entitled to an injunction, whether such damages result or not.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. F. HARRIS, Judge.

Spencer & Raker and C. A. Raker, for appellants. H. L. Spargur, F. W. Ewing, and Jenks & Chaffin, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an action to restrain, by injunction, the diversion from the plaintiff's lands by the defendants of the waters of a certain natural stream, the flow of which over and across her lands as a riparian proprietor, as also the beneficial use thereof for irrigation purposes as a prior appropriator, are claimed by the plaintiff through superior right. The defendants separately demurred to the complaint. Their demurrers were overruled. They then answered at great length. A trial being had, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, from which this appeal is taken on the judgment roll. There are two main grounds upon which the defendants rely for a reversal of the judgment, as appears by their reply brief: (1) That the court has failed to find upon all the material issues raised by the pleadings; (2) that the findings, as made, do not support the judgment.

Under the first head, they assert that the amended complaint alleges, among other things: "And that plaintiff's rights as such riparian owner were acquired long prior, and are superior, to any right or claim of right of the defendants, or either of them, to the waters of said stream; that if said defendants continue, as by them and each of them threatened and intended, to obstruct and divert the waters of Powley creek, and to deprive plaintiff of the use thereof, the damage to plaintiff will be great, continuing, and irreparable, and pecuniary compensation therefor will not afford adequate relief for plaintiff's loss, damage, and injury, and that, if said defendants do so continue in such diversion of said waters from said ditch as by said defendants threatened and intended, the same will result in the destruction of the fertility and value of said lands, and in great, continuing, and irreparable damage to plaintiff, and pecuniary compensation therefor will not afford adequate relief for plaintiff's loss, damage, and injury." They say that as these allegations were specially denied in the answer, and were "the gist of the plaintiff's cause of action for injunction," it "being in equity for an injunction only," there should have been findings upon the issues as raised, and that there were no such findings. It has been said by the appellate court: "It is not necessary that the facts found should follow the pleadings which they support. If the truth or falsity of each material allegation not admitted can be demonstrated from the findings, the requirements of the Code are met." Clary v. Hazlitt, 67 Cal. 289, 7 Pac. Rep. 701. "The findings of a court cannot be altogether detached from each other, and considered piecemeal. If a particular finding be doubtful or obscure, reference may be had to the context for the purpose of ascertaining the true meaning." Millard v. Hathaway, 27 Cal. 140, 141; Kimball v. Lohmas, 31 Cal. 156; Polack v. McGrath, 38 Cal. 669; Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 604, 14 Pac. Rep. 379. "Where probative facts are found, and the court can declare that the ultimate facts necessarily result from the facts which are found, the finding is sufficient." Water Co. v. Richardson, supra. It is found "that the plaintiff and her grantors have continuously used the water of said stream for irrigation and for domestic purposes and the watering of stock ever since said year 1864, except when prevented by defendants as hereinafter found; that in the spring of the year 1867 plaintiff's grantor entered upon said stream at the point described in the complaint, and diverted from said stream a quantity of the waters thereof equal to 78 inches, measured under a four-inch pressure, and conducted the same by means of a ditch by him constructed to connect said stream with a natural ravine or sag, to and upon that portion of plaintiff's lands described as the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 13, and N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 24; and thereafter, until he transferred said land to plaintiff, in 1884, he continued to so divert and use said quantity of water by said means; and the plaintiff, except when prevented by the defendants, as hereinafter found, has continued to so divert and use the same." And it appears from other findings that one of the defendants through whose land the stream flows, as an upper riparian proprietor, never possessed or occupied her land until 1873, and that the other defendant is not a riparian proprietor of the stream at all, and did not own or occupy his land until 1877, and that neither of these defendants ever continuously or uninterruptedly, for any period of time last past, used any portion of the waters of this natural stream upon their lands, and that they never constructed any ditch to divert water connecting with the natural channel of the stream, but did construct a ditch through which they diverted water from the natural ravine appropriated long before that time by plaintiff's grantor, and that this diversion and attempted appropriation was not commenced until April 25, 1888. It would certainly appear from these facts found that necessarily the riparian rights of the plaintiff were acquired long prior to those of the defendants, as well as her rights as an appropriator, and were both superior to any of the defendants; therefore a sufficient finding to meet the allegations of the complaint on that head was made.

There are no damages given by the judgment for an injunction. As to the matter of finding upon the question of the nature and amount of the damages and injury, as set up in the complaint, it may be said that if the facts found show that, if not prevented, the continuous trespass of the defendants might by time ripen into a right adverse to the plaintiff, this is sufficient to entitle her, as a lower riparian proprietor, to an injunction. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 278, 10 Pac. Rep. 674; Moore v. Water-Works, 68 Cal. 151, 8 Pac. Rep. 816. When the diversion, as in this case, is by one against the superior right of another, and to the extent of depriving her of all the water to which she is thus entitled, it is not necessary to prove damages to entitle her to an injunction. Conklin v. Improvement Co., 87 Cal. 296, 25 Pac. Rep. 399. If not necessary to prove damages, it is unnecessary to find them. The continuous wrongful diversion of the water, which, if not stopped, might ripen into a right, was the thing from which injury not capable of being accurately ascertained might in the future result, and it was this which was sought to be and was enjoined, as it appeared from the findings to be threatened and likely to result. The plaintiff had the right to the use and enjoyment of her property, and that is sufficient to have this right protected against invasion by another. Moore v. Water-Works, 68 Cal. 150, 8 Pac. Rep. 816. We think the findings show this right, and the invasion of it, and that is sufficient to support the judgment to prevent such continued invasion. The right of one of the defendants to eight inches of the water is amply found and protected. We perceive no merit in any of the other points made, after careful examination, and do not think they require special mention. As no prejudicial error appears, we advise that the judgment be affirmed.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—AMENDMENT BY PREVAILING PARTY.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 652, providing that, "if the judge in any case refuse to allow an exception in accordance with the facts, the party desiring the bill settled may apply by petition to the supreme court to prove the same," the supreme court has no authority to review the disallowance of amendments proposed by the prevailing party to a bill of exceptions taken by the losing party.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; W. O. MINOR, Judge.

Application to the supreme court by Samuel Gates for leave to prove amendments to a bill of exceptions taken by the plaintiff in the case of Brusie against Gates, in which the plaintiff, Brusie, was nonsuited. Application denied.

W. E. Turner, for petitioner. Stonesifer & Minor and Langhorne & Miller, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. In the action of Brusie vs. Gates et al. a trial was had in the county of Stanislaus, wherein, at the close of the plaintiff's case a judgment of nonsuit was rendered. Thereafter the plaintiff prepared the draft of a bill of exceptions, to which the defendant proposed certain amendments. Upon the presentation of the proposed bill and amendments to the judge for settlement certain amendments were disallowed, and the bill was settled and allowed February 16, 1891. The defendant has presented to this court his petition, setting forth the foregoing facts, together with the amendments that had been prepared by him and disallowed, and the reason why in his judgment they should have been allowed, and praying "that he be allowed to prove the truth of the matters set forth in his application, and the materiality of the said amendments." The amendments which the defendant sought to have incorporated into the bill consist chiefly of exceptions taken on his behalf to the rulings of the court, either in excluding evidence offered by himself, or in admitting evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff, and which in his petition heavers "should be allowed and made part of said bill to explain the exceptions taken by plaintiff, and incorporated therein." Section 652, Code Civil Proc., provides that, "if the judge in any case refuse to allow an exception in accordance with the facts, the party desiring the bill settled may apply by petition to the supreme court to prove the same." "The party desiring the bill settled" is the one who has taken the exception and presented the bill to the judge for settlement. In the case of a bill of "exceptions taken at a trial" he is the one who, after the decision in the cause, prepares the draft of a bill, and serves it upon the adverse party, as is provided by section 650, Id. After the decision has been rendered in a cause, there would seem to be no occasion for any but the losing party to desire a bill of exceptions settled. The provision that "such draft must contain all the exceptions taken upon which the party relies," implies that it is only that party who relies upon some "objection upon a matter of law to a decision made by the court" (section 646) as a ground for reversing such decision that would "desire" the bill settled. There is nothing in the statute, however, which prevents the prevailing party from having the exceptions taken by him at the trial settled in a bill; but in such case he becomes an actor, and must prepare a draft of his bill, and serve it upon the adverse party. Inasmuch, however, as in any review of the decision of the court any evidence which had been excluded could not be considered, or any evidence which had been admitted disregarded, it follows that any exception taken by the prevailing party, either to the exclusion of evidence offered by himself or to the admission of evidence against his objection, would be "useless and redundant matter," and should not be allowed by the judge as an "amendment" to a bill proposed by the losing party. The amendments which may be proposed to the draft of a bill relate to the "evidence or other matter," which section 648 authorizes to be stated in the bill for the purpose of explaining the "objection" taken, and do not include exceptions taken by the party proposing the amendments, or any evidence or other matter necessary to explain the same. Whether the matter which is proposed by way of amendments to a bill of exceptions shall be allowed is to be determined by the judge who tried or heard the case, and his action thereon must be regarded as final. The statute has provided no mode for reviewing his action in this respect, even if it were practicable or desirable that any review should be had. His familiarity with the trial, and knowledge of what then took place, better qualify him than any other tribunal for determining how much of the evidence or other matter is necessary to explain the objection. This court cannot, in advance of a hearing upon the appeal, determine whether any particular piece of evidence or other matter proposed as an amendment is necessary to explain the objection. A proper determination of that question would require an investigation of the whole case, including the pleadings and other evidence that had been admitted, as well as the state of the trial at the time when the objection was made. In Hyde v. Boyle, 86 Cal. 352, 24 Pac. Rep. 1059, we said: "The duty and power of settling statements and bills of exception rest generally and properly in the judge of the trial court. This court can interfere with such statement or bill only in the cases provided by statute, and the only case thus provided is found in said section 652;" and again, upon a kindred motion in the same case, (26 Pac. Rep. 1092:) "The settlement of a bill of exceptions is one of the duties imposed upon a judge by virtue of his office, and is to be performed by him under the sanction of his judicial oath. It is not to be presumed that he will, in any instance, so far violate his official obligation as either willfully or knowingly to insert in the bill any matter that is not properly there, or exclude therefrom any matter that should be inserted. This court is not the tribunal to determine whether he has in any instance violated his duty in this respect, or from which a litigant is to seek redress for any such violation." Section 652 limits the authority of this court to interfere in the settlement of a bill to the single instance in which the judge "refuses to allow an exception;" and we have no inclination, even if we had the power, to extend this authority beyond the limits prescribed by the statute. The petition is denied.

DYER v. PLACER COUNTY. (No. 14,283.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 18, 1891.)

PUBLIC OFFENSE—EVADING PAYMENT OF RAILROAD FARE—NEW TRIAL—IRREGULARITY OF NOTICE.

1. Act Cal. April 1, 1878, § 9, provides that "every person who shall fraudulently evade, or attempt to evade, the payment of his fare for traveling on any railroad shall be fined," etc. Held a violation of said act constitutes a public offense, within the meaning of Pen. Code, § 15, which provides that a "public offense is an act committed in violation of a law commanding or forbidding it, and to which is annexed * * * a fine."

2. Where a notice of motion for a new trial states that it will be made upon "a statement of the case," and the motion is heard without objection upon what was termed a "bill of exceptions," it is an irregularity which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties.

Department 2. Appeal from the superior court, Placer county; B. F. MYERS, Judge.

Action by Dyer against Placer county to recover for the care of prisoners. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

L. L. Chamberlain and Ben P. Tabor, for appellant. A. P. Tuttle and A. K. Robinson, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The plaintiff in his complaint alleges that he is a constable in and for the fourth township of the county of Placer, and that as such constable he performed and rendered official services for the defendant by serving and executing warrants and other legal writs and processes, transporting prisoners to and from the courts and county jail in said county, feeding prisoners while awaiting trial, conveying sick and indigent persons to the county hospital, aggregating in value the sum of $518.93; that on the 8th day of October, 1890, he presented his claim therefor in an itemized bill, duly verified, to the board of supervisors of said county, for allowance, and said board failed and refused to allow the said claim, or any part thereof, except the sum of $370.93. By the itemized account it appears that the items disallowed by the board were for services rendered in arresting, transporting, and feeding prisoners charged with fraudulently evading the payment of railroad fares. The authority for prosecuting persons charged with such delinquencies is found in section 9 of an act entitled "An act to create the office of commissioner of transportation," etc., approved April 1, 1878. Section 9 of the act reads as follows: "Every person who shall fraudulently evade, or attempt to evade, the payment of his fare for traveling on any railroad, shall be fined not less than five nor more than twenty dollars." That section is not repealed by the act entitled "An act to organize and define the powers of the board of railroad commissioners," approved April 15, 1880.

The bill of exceptions, among other things, contains the following: "It was consented to by the court, and agreed by the parties, that the sole question for the court to decide was whether under section 9 of said act, viz., 'Every person who shall fraudulently evade, or attempt to evade, payment of his fare for traveling on any railroad, shall be fined not less than five nor more than twenty dollars,' a violation thereof was or was not a public offense, and whether plaintiff, as such constable, should or should not execute warrants of arrest placed in his hands charging violations of said section 9 of said act." The court below held that a violation of said section 9 did not constitute a public offense, and rendered its judgment for the amount allowed by said board of supervisors, and no more. From that judgment this appeal is taken. We think a violation of said section 9 constitutes a public offense, within the definition of section 15 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows: "A crime or public offense is an act committed or omitted in violation of law forbidding or commanding it, and to which is annexed, upon conviction, either of the following punishments: * * * third, fine." To hold that a law which makes it a finable offense to fraudulently evade the payment of railroad fare does not make such evasion a public offense, would we think, be going but skin deep into its meaning. Qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice.

In his notice of motion for a new trial appellant stated that it would be "made upon a statement of the case." The motion was heard without objection, and denied upon what is denominated a "bill of exceptions." We think this did not in any way affect the substantial rights of the parties, and that it is an irregularity which must be disregarded. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

WATER-RIGHTS—APPROPRIATION—RIPARIAN OWNERS—PLEADING—FINDINGS.

1. In an action to establish a water-right, a finding that plaintiff's grantor appropriated 20 inches of water in 1874, and in 1878 conveyed to plaintiff, and that for six years next succeeding such appropriation the use of said water by plaintiff and her grantor was with the full knowledge of defendants' grantors, continuous, open, and notorious under a claim of right, shows that plaintiff had acquired a prescriptive right to the use of 20 inches of water, and it is immaterial how long defendants and their grantors had owned their riparian lands in fee.

2. Where plaintiff has acquired a right to take water from a creek at a point above defendants' land, and defendants have wrongfully obstructed the flow into her ditch, and threaten to continue to do so, it is proper to grant a perpetual injunction without proof of damages, notwithstanding that defendants are riparian owners on the creek.

3. A denial that defendants threaten or will continue to do the acts complained of, "except as of right they are lawfully entitled thereto," is not a denial in toto of an allegation that defendants threaten and intend, and, unless prevented by injunction, will continue, to divert and obstruct the water of a stream.

4. A complaint in an action to establish a water-right, which alleged that plaintiff and her grantors had owned, possessed, and occupied the lands described for 15 years, and that she was then the owner, is sufficient to show title to the land.

5. Where it did not appear that taxes had been levied and assessed against the ditch and water-right it was not error to fail to make a finding upon that question.

6. It is not error to join the husband as co-plaintiff in a suit to establish a water-right belonging to the wife.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. F. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by Henry L. Spargur and wife against K. G. Heard, Jr., and others to establish and obtain a perpetual injunction. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Spencer & Raker, Frank M. Sawyer, and Clarence A. Raker, for appellants. H. L. Spargur, D. W. Jenks, and J. H. Stewart, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to obtain a perpetual injunction restraining the diversion of water, and for damages. The court below granted the injunction, but without damages. The appeal is from the judgment, and rests on the judgment roll.

1. It is claimed by appellants that their demurrer should have been sustained, but we think it was properly overruled. The complaint stated a cause of action, and it was not ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain. The plaintiffs were husband and wife, but a husband may be joined as plaintiff with his wife in an action which concerns her separate property. Calderwood v. Peyser, 31 Cal. 333; Corcoran v. Doll, 32 Cal. 83. Plaintiffs alleged that Mrs. Spargur and her grantors had owned, possessed, and occupied the lands described for the periods named, and that she was then the owner thereof; and they deraigned her title to the ditch and water-right from the first appropriator. This was sufficient.

2. It is contended that the court did not find upon all the material issues raised by the pleadings. Under this head it is urged that there was no finding upon the issue tendered by plaintiffs' averment "that the defendants threaten and intend, and, unless prevented by the injunction of this court, they will continue, to divert and obstruct the waters of said stream, and prevent the same from reaching the lands of said plaintiff, and wholly deprive her of the use of said water. That the damage to said plaintiff for each day she is deprived of the use of said water is $5," etc. It is said that this averment was denied in toto; but the only denial as to the first part of it was that defendants threaten or intend or will continue to do the acts complained of, "except as of right they are lawfully entitled thereto." This was clearly not a denial in toto, and yet the court found "that defendants, and each of them, threaten and intend, and, unless restrained, will continue, to divert the waters from said plaintiff's ditch, and thereby prevent any portion of the waters of said stream from flowing through said ditch to plaintiffs' said lands." The court was not required to go further and find as to the alleged resulting damages, for the reason that it was not necessary to allege or prove such damages. Moore v. Water-Works, 68 Cal. 146, 8 Pac. Rep. 816. The finding was therefore fully sufficient. It is also urged that there was no finding as to the bar of the statute of limitations pleaded by defendants. But the court did find "that plaintiffs' cause of action is not barred by section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor by section 313 of said Code, nor by section 319 of said Code, nor any of them." The sections named are the only ones pleaded, and the claim that the finding should be disregarded, because it is placed among the conclusions of law, is without merit. Burton v. Burton, 79 Cal. 490.¹ It is further urged that there was no sufficient finding as to the affirmative defense set up by the defendants, to the effect that they and their grantors had been the owners in fee-simple absolute of the land claimed by them since about the year 1869, and that Rutherford creek—the stream from which plaintiffs claim the right to take the water—naturally flows across their land, and that their right to the full flow and use of the waters of the creek upon their said land is older and superior to any right of the plaintiffs thereto, or to any portion thereof. It is said the court found only that defendants' lands were agricultural in character, and that the said stream in its natural channel flowed across the same, and naturally irrigated portions thereof, but did not find how long they and their grantors had been the owners in fee-simple of the said land. But the court also found that in the fall of 1873 and the spring of 1874, one Wood constructed a ditch leading from Rutherford creek to certain lands situated near the creek, and which he then occupied and claimed, and thereby appropriated and diverted to his lands 20 inches of the water of the creek, measured under a 4-inch pressure, and thereafter continuously used the same for irrigating his lands during the irrigating season of each year, and for domestic purposes and the watering of stock during the whole of each year, until September, 1878, when he conveyed his lands, with the ditch and water-right, and privileges appurtenant thereto, to the plaintiff Mrs. Spargur; that she thereupon took possession of the land, ditch, and water-right, and has ever since continuously claimed and used the water so appropriated for the same purposes as her grantor had used it, except when prevented from doing so by defendants and their grantors; and "that for six years next succeeding said appropriation such use of said water by plaintiff and her grantor was, with the full knowledge of defendants' grantors, continuous, uninterrupted, peaceable, open, and notorious, under a claim of right adverse and in hostility to all, and particularly to defendants and their grantors." These findings clearly show that Mrs. Spargur had acquired a prescriptive right to divert and use the 20 inches of water which she claimed, (Water Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219, 24 Pac. Rep. 645;) and, this being so, it was immaterial how long defendants and their grantors had owned their land in fee, and no finding as to that matter was required. It is further urged that there was no finding that plaintiff and her grantor had paid all taxes levied and assessed against the said ditch and water-right; but it does not appear that any such taxes had been levied or assessed, and therefore no finding upon this question was necessary. (Heilbron v. Ditch Co., 75 Cal. 117, 17 Pac. Rep. 65; Coonrad v. Hill, 79 Cal. 587, 21 Pac. Rep. 1099.)

3. It is contended that the findings were not sufficient to justify the issuance of a perpetual injunction against defendants, for the reason that they were riparian owners on the creek, and the court only found that plaintiff had been damaged in the nominal sum of one dollar. The answer is that it appears that the defendants' lands were situated on the creek below the head of plaintiff's ditch; that plaintiff had acquired a right to appropriate from the creek the amount of water claimed by her, and that the defendants had wrongfully obstructed the flow of the water into her ditch, and threatened to continue to do so. Under such circumstances plaintiff was entitled to an injunction, without proof of damages. Moore v. Water-Works, 68 Cal. 146, 8 Pac. Rep. 816; Conkling v. Improvement Co., 87 Cal. 296, 25 Pac. Rep. 399.

Some other points are made for a reversal of the judgment, but they do not require special notice. In our opinion the proper judgment was entered, and we advise that it be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIFF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. BOARD OF STATE HARBOR COMMISSIONERS v. FAIRFIELD et al. (No. 13,466.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 13, 1891.)

EVIDENCE—OFFICIAL BOOKS—SHOWING GENERAL INACCURACY.

Where, in an action upon the official bond of a wharfinger, the books kept by the secretary of the board of state harbor commissioners are introduced to prove that certain sums of money received by him had not been paid to the board, it is error to exclude evidence that the secretary had received large amounts from other persons in payment of harbor dues, which were not accounted for in the books, to impeach the accuracy of the books, although Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1920, makes official books or records "prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by the people on relation of the board of state harbor commissioners against Fairfield, Hendry, and Ray, upon an official bond given by Fairfield as wharfinger, and signed by the others as sureties. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. H. H. Hart and Aylett R. Cotton, for appellants. F. S. Stratton, (T. C. Coogan, of counsel,) for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action upon the official bond of defendant Fairfield, upon which the defendants and appellants Hendry and Ray were sureties. Before the trial Fairfield died, and by the consent of parties the action was as to him dismissed as of a date prior to his death. Judgment was rendered against Hendry and Ray for $1,911.05, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, they appeal.

1. There are some 25 points made by appellants, which we do not deem necessary to notice in detail. It is sufficient to say that the court below did not commit any error except with respect to the matters hereinafter mentioned.

2. The plaintiffs introduced evidence to the point that Fairfield, while holding the office of wharfinger, for which said official bond was given, received certain sums of money in his official capacity at various times within the period stated in the complaint; and, for the purpose of showing that he had not paid said money to the board of state harbor commissioners as his official duty required, they introduced certain books which the secretary of said board is required to keep by section 2522 of the Political Code. These books are made by statutory law "prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated," (Code Civil Proc. §§ 1920, 1926;) and they were introduced by plaintiffs to prove that Fairfield did not pay any of said moneys to the board, because said books did not contain any account of such payment, which they should have contained if such payment had been made. It is quite evident that plaintiffs were called upon to prove something more than the mere fact of the receipt of the moneys by Fairfield; for the presumption would have been that he performed his official duty, and disposed of the money as such duty directed. The defendants, for the purpose of overcoming the prima facie character of evidence afforded by said books, offered to prove that one Gray, who was secretary of the board during the time when Fairfield was wharfinger, had incorrectly, falsely, and fraudulently kept said books. In this connection they offered to prove false entries and fraudulent omissions in the books with respect to business done with the board by persons other than Fairfield. For instance, they offered to show numerous bank-checks for large amounts which had been received by Gray from various persons in payment of harbor dues, and indorsed by him, of which there was no account whatever in the books. This class of evidence was ruled out by the court upon the ground that "it does not connect itself in any way with the deficit charged against the defendant by the evidence introduced on the part of the plaintiff," and because it "did not relate to any items upon which the plaintiffs seek to recover in this action." In this ruling the court committed error for which the judgment must be reversed.

A prima facie case may be rebutted from any stand point within the boundary of legitimate evidence. A merchant's or shop-keeper's books, after some slight preliminary proof of their correctness, are prima facie evidence of the sale and delivery of goods. Under our Codes, these books of the secretary of the harbor commissioners are made prima facie evidence of certain facts, without any preliminary proof. But the same rule applies in both cases, that is to say: The books are to be taken, in the first instance, as competent evidence of the truth of certain statements therein contained, because they are presumed to have been correctly and honestly kept, and to be truthful and creditable, until the contrary be shown. But the contrary may be shown by proof that they have not been fairly and honestly kept, and that their character is such as to render them unreliable and valueless as evidence. And this may be done by proving false and fraudulent charges and entries against persons other than the party to the suit on trial. If such proof were confined to items of the particular account against the defendant in the action it would be of little value; for if the defendant could, by independent evidence, disprove the entries made against him, he would have little cause to assail the general character of the books. A case strictly in point is that of Funk v. Ely, 45 Pa. St. 444. There Ely had introduced his books, and the trial court had ruled out all evidence touching their character, except such as related to the items of Funk's account. The court in considering this ruling said: "The only error we see upon the record is in excluding from the jury all evidence tending to impeach Ely's books, except such as related to the account against Funk. Such a rule of evidence amounts to nothing in its practical application. If a defendant can disprove his particular account, he has no occasion to assail the general character of plaintiff's books. It is only when he has no other means of meeting a false charge that he assails the general character of plaintiff's books. * * * It is the general character which is thus brought into issue, and general character is formed by numerous particulars." Having stated that, if it appears on the face of the book that it should not be admitted in evidence, the court may reject it, the opinion proceeds as follows: "If this does not clearly appear, it is to be submitted to the jury to judge of; and then it is competent for the adverse party to show its general character by pointing to charges and entries affecting other parties, and by calling witnesses to prove such entries false and fraudulent. That this investigation may not run into excessive departure from the issue on trial, the court should limit it to the time, or near the time, covered by the account in suit, or should suffer no more examination of collateral cases than would bear directly on the general character of the book. * * * The jury may form some opinion from such examination how far it is entitled to weight in the scales which they are holding. While they should make all due allowance for mistakes, for ignorance and unskillfulness in book-keeping, and for peculiarities in the plaintiff's business, they should insist on the general honesty and accuracy of the book made in secret by one party against the other, and now offered as a guide to the conscience of the jury." It would be a harsh rule, indeed, that would prevent the defendants in the case at bar—who are mere sureties entitled to stand on their strict rights—from showing that the omissions by which they are sought to be concluded are in a book full of omissions which are false and fraudulent. Of course, when they shall have introduced all their evidence on that point, it will be for the jury, or the court sitting as a jury, to determine how far such evidence has weakened the credibility of the books; but that such evidence is admissible we have no doubt. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. STEWART. (No. 20,783.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 15, 1891.)

RAPE—EVIDENCE.

Where, on a trial for assault with intent to rape, complainant, a girl of 12 years of age, testifies to facts which, if true, prove the crime, and her statements as to most of the accompanying circumstances are corroborated by other witnesses, and defendant admits that he was present, but denies the assault, a conviction will not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. BRIDGFORD, Judge.

Appeal of G. W. Stewart from a conviction of assault with intent to rape. Affirmed.

T. J. Hart, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

BELCHER, C. C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape, and has appealed from the judgment and an order refusing him a new trial. The only points made for a reversal of the judgment are that the court erred in its instructions to the jury, and that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. No particular errors are pointed out, and, after carefully reading the instructions, we have been unable to discover that any error was committed. Taking the instructions as a whole, they seem to state the law applicable to the case fully, fairly, and clearly. The complainant was a girl 12 years of age. She was a witness, and testified to facts which, if true, necessarily lead to the conclusion that the offense charged was committed; and her testimony as to most of the accompanying circumstances was corroborated by other witnesses. The defendant testified in his own behalf, and, while admitting that he was with the complainant at the time and place named by her, denied that any assault was committed. A conviction of such an offense may be had upon the uncontradicted evidence of the prosecutrix, the weight to be accorded the evidence being a question for the jury. People v. Mayes, 66 Cal. 597, 6 Pac. Rep. 691. Under the circumstances shown here, we do not think the judgment can be reversed for insufficiency of evidence, and we therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; VANCE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

FAIRCHILD v. MULLAN et al. (No. 13,210.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 14, 1891.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—BOND FOR DEED—SUBSEQUENT DECLARATION OF TRUST—TENANTS IN COMMON.

Where a vendor gave a bond for a deed and received part of the purchase price, the fact that he afterwards entered into an agreement with the vendee and others, declaring that the vendee held the same in trust for the use of all the parties, did not make the vendee a tenant in common with the vendor, as he only took an equitable estate by the bond, which might be foreclosed on failure to comply with its terms.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by Harriet M. Fairchild, executrix of A. A. Ritchie, deceased, against John Mullan, Henry F. Williams, P. M. Randall, and Joseph M. Nougues, to quiet title. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants Mullan and Randall appeal. Affirmed.

Joseph M. Nougues and Mich. Mullany, for appellants. J. F. Wendell, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. The defendants Mullan and Randall take this appeal from the judgment and an order refusing them a new trial. The action is brought by the executrix of A. A. Ritchie, deceased, to quiet title to a tract of land in Lake county, and to have it adjudged that the defendants have no right to purchase under a contract made with Ritchie, October 19, 1877. Defendants Nougues and Williams filed a disclaimer. The judgment quiets the title absolutely against all of the defendants except Mullan, and permits him to complete the purchase within 90 days, by paying certain moneys, and, failing so to do, cuts off all claim on his part. On the 19th day of October, 1877, Ritchie executed to Mullan a bond, by which he agreed to convey to Mullan the land on or before May 5, 1882, for $40,000. It recites the payment of $10,000, but it appears that only $3,000 was actually paid at the time. The next day, October 20, 1877, Mullan, Nougues, Randall, and Williams entered into a written agreement, which begins as follows: "Whereas, on the 19th day of October, 1877, A. A. Ritchie, of Lake county, California, did in a bond obligate himself to deed and convey to John Mullan, of San Francisco, Cal., his certain property situate in the county of Lake and state of California, and which property is specifically set forth and particularly described in said bond, and to which reference is herein made, and said bond is hereby made a part of this instrument: Therefore, the object of this agreement is to witness and to declare that said property is by said John Mullan held in trust and for the parties hereinafter named, and in the manner and for the purposes hereinafter stated, and not otherwise, to-wit: One-fifth part thereof for A. A. Ritchie, of Lake county, California, and one-fifth part thereof for Henry F. Williams, one-fifth part thereof for Joseph M. Nougues, one-fifth part thereof for P. M. Randall, and one-fifth part thereof for John Mullan, all of San Francisco, California, so that each of said five named parties shall be mutually interested in each and all and every part and parcel of the afore named and described property; it being mutually understood and agreed, however, between the parties thereto, that the interest of each of said parties in and to the aforesaid property shall be and is in direct proportion to the amount of money paid and to be paid by each of the aforesaid parties to A. A. Ritchie on account of the purchase money in making and securing the purchase of said property, and not otherwise." The writing proceeds to specify what sums shall be paid by each, and when. A. A. Ritchie was to pay $8,000, May 5, 1888. Ritchie was to retain possession, and for one year the use was to pay the interest and taxes on the sum which remained due after the payments specifically provided to be paid before the final payment, to-wit, $22,000, which was to be paid October 19, 1882. It further specifies as follows: "It is further mutually understood and agreed that it is the intention of the parties hereto in due time to organize a corporation under the laws of the state of California for the purpose of introducing water into the city of San Francisco from the Putah Creek water-shed, and from other sources of water supply in the state of California; that it is the ultimate intention and purposes of said parties to use the property so purchased and as described in said bond as one of the reservoir sites in the development of said water project; and that it is for such ultimate use and purpose that said property has been negotiated and purchased and paid for, and in the manner and for the benefit of the parties hereto, and wherefore this agreement has been made and entered into by these parties at the city of San Francisco, this 20th day of October, 1877." It was provided that Mullan should pay for Randall, but, if Randall failed to repay by May 5, 1882, his interest should pass to Mullan for the benefit of himself and the other parties, if they proportionately reimbursed Mullan the amounts paid for Randall. It does not appear that Randall ever paid anything, or that Mullan was reimbursed for moneys paid on his account. Nougues and Williams assigned their interest to Mullan, August 15, 1878. At the time of Ritchie's death, November 3, 1879, he had been paid, at the date of the contract, October 19, 1877, $3,000; December 1, 1877, $2,000; April 11, 1878, $2,500; and Ritchie had a note from Mullan for $2,500,—thus making up the $10,000 payment which is acknowledged in the bond. Mullan had expended, on account of the proposed water company, $3,188.53. After Ritchie's death Mullan presented a claim against his estate for one-fifth of this sum. Five hundred and ninety-one dollars was allowed by the executrix, and credited on the note, November 1, 1881. Mullan advanced to her $1,000, which she needed to pay interest upon a mortgage given by Ritchie upon the land. At this time Mullan contracted with the executrix to purchase Ritchie's interest in the property for $8,000, to pay the balance due on his note and the bond by November 1, 1883. He made no further payments, and this suit was commenced February 3, 1884.

Appellant contends that by the terms of the agreement made on the 20th day of October, 1877, he became an owner as tenant in common with Ritchie in proportion to the amount paid by him upon the purchase of the property. Whether this is a correct construction of that agreement is really the only question in the case. By the terms of the bond to Mullan, Ritchie held the legal title as security for the purchase money still unpaid. By the contract of the next day he became jointly interested with the defendants in their enterprise, and that instrument was evidently intended to define the interest of each in the joint undertaking and the joint property. There is nothing indicating an intent on the part of Ritchie to affect his security for his debt, or to change the terms of the purchase. The natural and obvious construction would be that the contract was intended to define the interest of the parties inter sese as purchasers, and, indeed, the instrument expressly so declares. "Therefore, the object of this agreement is to witness and declare that said property is by the said John Mullan held in trust for the parties hereinafter named, and in the manner and for the purpose hereinafter stated, and not otherwise;" and then follows the language under consideration. It is quite obvious that the property to be held as specified was the estate in John Mullan, or to be acquired by him under the bond, which is made part of the agreement. Mullan having failed to complete his purchase, the proceeding to foreclose his rights under the contract is strictly in accordance with the practice in equity, and has been expressly sanctioned in this court. Keller v. Lewis, 53 Cal. 118. By the terms of the contract Randall has ceased to have any interest in it. If he has rendered service to the associates, it would constitute no claim against Ritchie to be set off against this bond. No such services were shown, nor was any claim against the estate on account of such service presented to the executrix. We think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

TOMKIN v. HARRIS, Judge of Superior Court. (No. 14,235.)

MANDAMUS TO JUDGE — PLACING CAUSE ON CALENDAR.

On petition for mandamus to compel a judge to place a cause on the calendar, it appeared that such case had been begun six years before for the dissolution of a partnership and the division of partnership lands. A certain third party claiming an interest in such lands was made a defendant. Both defendants, having filed general denials, died, and their interests in the property passed into other hands, and their administrators closed up their estates without having been substituted as defendants. Six years after its commencement, the case not having been brought to trial, certain amici curiæ moved to dismiss for lack of prosecution, showing that they wished to purchase and procure good titles to the lands clouded by such action. Held, that it was within the discretion of the circuit court to entertain such motion, and while having it under advisement mandamus will not lie, at the instance of a substituted defendant, to compel such court, by placing the cause on the calendar, to decide such motion within any specified time.

Application for mandamus.

J. C. Black and B. L. Ryder, for petitioner. Walker C. Graves, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an original proceeding here in mandamus by which petitioner seeks to have the respondent commanded to place on the calendar a certain action pending in his court entitled "Thaddeus Harper v. Thomas Hildreth et al.," and to set said action for trial on a day certain, or to appoint a referee therein, and to proceed with the trial of said action. An alternative writ was issued; and, upon the filing of respondent's answer, the case was argued and submitted on the petition and answer. There is no doubt that a superior court may be compelled by mandamus to proceed, in regular course, to the trial of a cause, when without any legal reason it flatly refuses to do so. But the writ can be used for this purpose only when the action of the lower court is a plain refusal to perform a clear duty which the law specially enjoins; and the party invoking its aid must show a case where the duty of the court to do the thing asked is pure and simple, and unmixed with discretionary power or the exercise of judgment. Such a case the petitioner in the case at bar has not shown. It appears that the said action of Harper vs. Hildreth et al. was commenced in the court of respondent in June, 1884. The purpose of the action was to dissolve a partnership between Harper and Hildreth, which had been engaged in raising cattle and other live-stock, and in buying, selling, and improving lands, and for an accounting; Harper alleging that Hildreth was largely indebted to him on account of said partnership. It was averred in the complaint that said Harper and Hildreth, as partners, were the owners of more than 13,000 acres of land in Fresno county; and Kate L. McLaughlin, as executrix and devisee of Charles McLaughlin, deceased, was made a party defendant to the action as claiming an interest in said lands. No answer appears to have been filed in the case until May 14, 1885, when Hildreth filed an answer admitting the partnership, but denying any indebtedness to Harper, and alleging that, upon an accounting, Harper would be indebted to him (Hildreth) in the sum of $33,000, for which amount he prayed judgment against the plaintiff, Harper. Nothing further seems to have been done, or asked to be done, in the case before June 29, 1886, when the defendant Hildreth died in Santa Clara county. He left a will, in which his widow, Laura L. Hildreth, was named as executrix; and on January 20, 1887, she was substituted as defendant in the case. It appears that at some time, not stated, a referee was appointed, but he died without making any report. Afterwards, in October, 1887, the said Laura was discharged of her trust of executrix by the superior court of Santa Clara county. Afterwards one Dunphy was appointed administrator, but he was also discharged as administrator by the superior court of Santa Clara county in April, 1890, without ever having been substituted as a party to the action. In the mean time the defendant Kate L. McLaughlin had died, and no one had been substituted in her place as defendant. The action slept along until April, 1890, when Horace Hawes and W. C. Graves, in the character of amici curiæ, upon notice to plaintiff, moved the court to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. In support of their motion they showed by affidavit that both of the defendants were dead; that their estates had been administered upon and the administrations closed; and that no claim for the matters set up in the complaint had been presented to either estate. Plaintiff appeared by counsel, and opposed the motion, and showed by affidavit, among other things, that the said defendant Kate L. McLaughlin, during her lifetime, and after the commencement of the action, entered into a written contract with W. W. Davis and D. P. Edwards, by which she agreed to convey to them all her title to the lands described in the complaint, upon their compliance with certain conditions; that in like manner the original defendant, Thomas Hildreth, had entered into a written agreement to convey all his interest in said lands to said Davis and Edwards; that said Davis had, by a recorded deed, conveyed the undivided half of a part of said lands to J. G. James and J. R. White; and that said Kate L. McLaughlin had afterwards, by a recorded deed, conveyed to said James and White all the interest which, in her own right, or as executrix as aforesaid, she had in any and all of the lands described in the complaint. Thereupon plaintiff's counsel gave notice that on April 22, 1890, he would move the court for an order that said Davis, Edwards, James, White, and others be brought in as parties defendant, and for leave to file an amended and supplemental complaint. By consent of the parties, both of said motions were continued from time to time until the 15th day of August, when they were finally submitted upon briefs, all of which were to be filed within 25 days. Afterwards, on October 15, 1890, and while said motions were still under advisement, the petitioner herein, Alfred R. Tomkins, having procured himself to be appointed administrator of said Thomas Hildreth, deceased, appeared by his attorney, and asked to be substituted as defendant. To this Milton E. Babb, one of the attorneys of record for plaintiff, consented, and on December 17, 1890, an order for such substitution was made. On December 22d the petitioner, by his attorney, J. C. Black, appeared, and asked the court orally to place the cause upon the calendar for trial on a day to be fixed by the court, or to appoint a referee, and to allow the plaintiff and defendant to amend their pleadings as per stipulation on file. This stipulation was signed by said Babb, as attorney for plaintiff, and by said Black and B. G. Ryder, as attorneys for the substituted defendant, Tomkins, and provided that the said parties might amend their pleadings at any time "as they may elect." This motion having been denied, it was renewed in writing on December 23d; and the written motion was consented to in writing by said Babb, as attorney for plaintiff. The motion was denied; the judge saying that whenever any amendment to a pleading should be proposed he would pass upon it, but that he would not make the order for amendments in the general way proposed by Black and consented to by Babb. (We gather from the record that the court suspected collusion between the said two apparently hostile parties.) The court refused to place the case on the calendar at that time, but said that it would "place the case on the calendar if the matters heretofore submitted are determined before that time," and there were issues to be tried. At that time the pleadings in the case had disappeared, and there had been no application to supply them. According to the rules of the court, the civil calendar was called at certain times for the purpose of setting cases for trial, and when the said motion was made cases had already been set up to January 21st. There was another setting of the calendar on January 10th, of which the usual notice in the newspapers was given; but no motion was made at that time to set the said case of Harper v. Hildreth. On January 2, 1891, the court made an order reciting the facts above stated as to the said Davis, Edwards, James, and White, and directing that they be brought in and made parties to the action. Under these circumstances, we do not think that the petitioner presents a clear field for the exercise of the extraordinary remedy of mandamus. Waiving all other considerations, we think that the court had the right to entertain the motion of amici curiæ to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. The object of the motion, as stated by them, was to purchase and procure good titles to lands which were embraced in and clouded by the action. The suit had been pending for six years, and no effort had been made by either of the parties to bring it to a trial. There was not—and for a long time had not been—any person representing either of the defendants; and the interests of the defendants in the lands affected by the suit had been long since transferred and conveyed to others. Whether or not, under these circumstances, the motion of Hawes and Graves—though not parties to the action—should be entertained was a question which we think addressed itself to the judicial discretion of the court. It had the right to entertain the motion if it chose to do so. Parties have no right to perpetually incur the records of a court with suits which they never intend to prosecute. And having entertained the motion, and taken it under advisement, the court cannot be compelled, by mandamus, to decide it within any specified time. For these and other reasons apparent on the face of the record, the peremptory writ must be denied. It is not to be presumed that the respondent will indulge in any unnecessary delay in disposing of the preliminary questions before him. The application of petitioner is denied, and the proceeding dismissed.

APPEAL—MATTERS NOT ON RECORD.

Matters which occurred in the court below, subsequent to the entry of judgment, should appear on the record, and cannot be shown by affidavit in the first instance in the appellate court.

¹Rehearing denied.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

M. J. Platshek and R. Percy Wright, for appellant. Marcus Rosenthal, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. There is nothing in the transcript to show that the appellants ever filed any claim against the insolvent debtors. The judgment recites that all the creditors of the insolvents who had filed claims and the assignee appeared at the hearing of the contest, and mutually agreed upon an adjustment and settlement of all matters of difference between them. If the appellants afterwards, by filing claims, acquired the right to move to set aside the judgment or to appeal therefrom, the record should show the facts. What occurred in the court below subsequent to the entry of the judgment should appear in the record. It cannot be shown by affidavit in the first instance in this court. The appeal is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. BAWDEN. (No. 20,744.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 14, 1891.)

HOMICIDE—INSTRUCTIONS—INSANITY—BURDEN OF PROOF—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

1. On indictment for murder, an instruction to find defendant guilty of murder in the first degree if the jury find that he willfully, deliberately, and with premeditation "murdered" deceased at the time and place named, is not erroneous because it leaves out the element of malice aforethought, if the court in other instructions charged that malice aforethought was necessary to constitute murder in the first degree.

2. On indictment for murder, an instruction that, if the jury find defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, and also find some extenuating circumstance, it is within their discretion to relieve him from the death penalty, and fix his punishment at imprisonment for life; but that, if no extenuating circumstances are shown, they should allow the death penalty to be imposed,—is not erroneous. Pen. Code Cal. § 190, does not give the jury the entire power of fixing the punishment, uninfluenced by the court.

3. On indictment for murder the burden is on defendant to prove insanity by a preponderance of the evidence, and an instruction that the jury must acquit if on the whole evidence they have a reasonable doubt of defendant's sanity is properly refused.

4. After judgment of conviction of murder defendant cannot avail himself of the fact that there was no preliminary examination and commitment by a magistrate before filing the information, either by motion for a new trial or in arrest of judgment.

5. Under Pen. Code Cal. §§ 990, 995, 996, defendant, upon arraignment, may move to set aside the information upon the ground that before the filing thereof he had not been legally committed by a magistrate; and if the motion be not then made, he is precluded from afterwards taking the objection.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Ernest Sevier and J. N. Gillett, for appellant. A. J. Monroe, T. H. Salvage, and W. H. H. Hart, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and was sentenced to suffer the death penalty; and he appeals from the judgment, from an order denying a new trial, from an order denying his motion in arrest of judgment, and also from an order denying his motion "to dismiss the information, and all subsequent proceedings."

1. The first contention of appellant is that the court erred in giving the following instruction: "If you find from the evidence, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that at the time and place mentioned in the information the defendant did then and there willfully, deliberately, and with premeditation murder one Lillie M. Price, then your verdict should be murder in the first degree." The main criticism of this instruction is that it "leaves out the element of malice aforethought." But in this instruction the court was not giving a definition of murder. That it had done very fully in previous instructions, and had told the jury that murder was "the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought," and had given the statutory definitions of malice. In the instruction under review it was, therefore, not necessary to repeat the definition of murder. It is true that a court should be very careful in framing an instruction which concludes with the words, "then your verdict should be murder in the first degree;" but in this instance the court merely said that such result should follow if the defendant murdered the deceased willfully, deliberately, and with premeditation. In this language no error can be detected. The Code provides that such kind of murder is murder of the first degree. In the cases cited by appellant (People v. Gibson, 17 Cal. 288; People v. Woody, 45 Cal. 289; People v. Ah Lee, 60 Cal. 85) the jury had been instructed that from the mere killing of the deceased the law presumed murder in the first degree. In People v. Hunt, 59 Cal. 433, the court had given an instruction to the effect that, if the deceased died from a wound inflicted by defendant with malice aforethought, the jury should convict him of murder. The appellant contended that the instruction should have informed the jury of which degree of murder the defendant should be convicted; and this court, of course, held that no such proposition should have been included in that instruction. None of the other cases cited are in point.

2. Appellant contends for a reversal on account of the instructions given by the court numbered 23, 24, and 25. By these instructions the jury were told, substantially, that, if they found the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, and also found some extenuating fact or circumstance, it was within their discretion to relieve him from the extreme penalty of death by fixing the punishment at imprisonment for life; but that, if the evidence did not show such extenuating circumstance, then they should allow the death penalty to be imposed. If the question here presented were a new one, there would be strong reasons for holding that by section 190 of the Penal Code the legislature intended to give to the jury the entire power of fixing the punishment in such a case, uninfluenced by the court; and that there is no warrant in the Code for any distinction in this regard between one kind of murder in the first degree and another. But these instructions are literal copies of instructions given and approved by this court in People v. Brick, 68 Cal. 190, 8 Pac. Rep. 858. The same rule was also substantially stated in People v. Jones, 63 Cal. 168, and in People v. Murback, 64 Cal. 369, the language of the instructions approved was almost identical with that used by the court in the case at bar, although it may be said that in the Murback Case the opinion of the court was hardly in consonance with the instructions approved. The same rule seems to have been approved in People v. Olsen, 80 Cal. 128, 22 Pac. Rep. 125. Similar instructions have no doubt been given in other cases now on their way here by appeal; for it is to be observed that whenever a doubtful instruction has been approved by this court, it has generally been seized upon and injected into future cases. Great confusion would therefore occur if we should enter into a new examination of this question, and should come to a conclusion opposite to that heretofore reached. Moreover, as was said by the court on another subject in People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 520: "We do not think this question has practically so much importance as is sometimes attributed to it;" for a juror exercising the responsibility of choosing between the imprisonment of a defendant and his death will act upon his own discretion, and not upon that of another. Therefore we decline to reopen the question; and hold that the instructions, under the authorities, were not erroneous. It is to be hoped, however, that trial courts will not make further excursions into this doubtful domain.

3. The court gave some instructions on the subject of insanity, and refused others on the same subject, asked by appellant; and it is contended that the court erred in its rulings on that subject. It is unnecessary to consider these instructions in detail. They present this difference between the views of the court and those of appellant, viz.: The court instructed that the burden was on defendant of establishing insanity by a preponderance of evidence, while the appellant unsuccessfully requested the court to instruct that, if the jury upon the whole evidence had a reasonable doubt of his sanity, they should acquit. The rule as stated by the court has always been held to be the law in this state; and in the recent case of People v. Travers we held that such rule was not disturbed by People v. Bushton, (80 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. Rep. 127, 549,) and subsequent cases. See People v. Travers, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 88, and cases there cited. There was, therefore, no error in the rulings of the court on these instructions.

4. Appellant seeks to avail himself of the alleged fact that there was no preliminary examination and commitment of defendant by a magistrate before the filing of an information, (1) by a motion for a new trial; (2) by a motion in arrest of judgment; and (3) by a motion to set aside the verdict and dismiss the proceedings for want of jurisdiction. As to the first, it is sufficient to say that the matter here presented is not one of the grounds of a motion for a new trial. Pen. Code, § 1181.¹ As to the second, it is also true that it is not a ground for a motion in arrest of judgment under section 1185, Pen. Code. If the point sought to be presented goes to the jurisdiction of the superior court, it could probably be made after verdict by appellant's third motion under section 1012. But it is stated in the bill of exceptions that it is "admitted by counsel for defendant upon and for the purpose of said motion that said Charles H. Bawden, before the filing of the information against him, had a regular and legal preliminary examination before a committing magistrate, and was regularly committed, except as to defendant's mental condition during such examination, as set out and claimed in the affidavits in support of said motion hereinbefore set out, all of which affidavits are denied by the people." The bill contains several affidavits used on the motion, some on behalf of appellant, and some on behalf of the people. Among others is the affidavit of the committing magistrate, from which it appears that the complaint against defendant was made February 10, 1890; that on March 10th defendant was brought before the magistrate, and informed of his right to have counsel; that defendant asked to have a continuance until March 17th, and his request was granted; and that on said March 17th the preliminary examination was had. Some of the affidavits tend to show that at the examination defendant was in a state of great nervous excitement and mental derangement, and oblivious to what occurred; others of the affidavits tend to show that this was not the fact, but that he was merely simulating or "putting on" an appearance of mental derangement. These matters do not raise a question of jurisdiction. The preliminary examination and commitment, and the information based thereon, being regular on their face, gave full jurisdiction to the court to try the case. It was an "information after examination and commitment by a magistrate" within the provision of the state constitution. Ex parte McConnell, 83 Cal. 558, 23 Pac. Rep. 1119. Moreover, a defendant, upon arraignment, may move to set aside the information upon the ground "that before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate;" and if the motion be not then made, the defendant is precluded from afterwards taking the objection. Pen. Code, §§ 990, 995, 996; Ex parte McConnell, supra; Ex parte Moan, 65 Cal. 213, 3 Pac. Rep. 644. See, also, Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 173; People v. Coffman, 59 Mich. 1, 26 N. W. Rep. 237. The foregoing are the main points discussed by appellant, and there are no others necessary to be noticed. We see no error in the record. The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment. I think the instruction referred to in the opinion of Mr. Justice McFARLAND, in which the jury were told what their verdict should be in case they found the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, and without any extenuating circumstances, was correct. Such an instruction does not in any degree interfere with the discretion which is given the jury in this class of cases. This would be my view if the question were a new one; but, as similar instructions have been many times approved by this court after it has given the matter the careful consideration which cases involving the life of a person must always receive, I think the correctness of such a direction to a jury ought not to be considered an open question. The law on this point ought to be deemed settled. As to the other questions discussed in the opinion I fully concur.

MALCOLMSON v. HARRIS, Judge. (No. 14, 320.)

MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—STATEMENT OF EVIDENCE.

When a cause has been tried without the presence of an official reporter, and when no notes of the evidence and proceedings have been filed or reduced to writing, the losing party can move for a new trial on the minutes of the court, relying on the recollection of the judge as to the evidence and proceedings, and can thereafter secure a statement of the case, including the evidence, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 658-661, providing that when a motion for a new trial, on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, is made on the minutes of the court, a statement to be subsequently prepared forms a part of the record.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Edward Lynch, for petitioner. Church & Cory, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the judge of the superior court of Fresno county to settle a statement on motion for a new trial. The case has been submitted upon a general demurrer to the petition, the substance of which is that in an action in which Pauline Fincher was plaintiff and petitioner a defendant, a judgment was entered in said court in favor of the plaintiff; that thereafter, in due time, the petitioner gave notice of his intention to move for a new trial, upon the grounds, among others, that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision, and that it was against law, and stating in said notice that the motion would be based upon the minutes of the court; that afterwards the motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and thereupon a correct statement of the evidence and proceedings at the trial was prepared and served in due time; that the respondent struck out of said statement everything relating to the trial, including the evidence, and refused to settle or act upon the same upon the ground that there were no minutes thereof, that is to say, there were no short-hand notes of the evidence, no reporter having been present at the trial, and no notes of the evidence filed or taken in writing by either the clerk or judge; that petitioner has appealed from said order, and requires a statement of the case to support his appeal.

The question presented for decision is, therefore, whether when a cause has been tried without the presence of an official reporter, and when no notes of the evidence and proceedings at the trial by reporter, judge, or clerk have ever been filed or reduced to writing, the losing party can move for a new trial on the minutes of the court, relying on the recollection of the judge as to such evidence and proceedings, and can thereafter secure a statement of the case, including the evidence, for the purposes of an appeal from the order. By section 658 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided that when an application for a new trial is based upon the ground, among others, of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, or that it is against law, it may be made at the option of the moving party, either upon the minutes of the court or upon a bill of exceptions, or upon a statement of the case. The notice of intention to move for a new trial must be filed within 10 days after verdict or notice of decision, and must designate the grounds of the motion, and whether it will be made upon the minutes of the court, bill of exceptions, or statement. If upon bill of exceptions or statement, the bill or statement must be proposed, amended, settled, engrossed, and filed before the motion is heard, and must contain a specification of the particular deficiencies of the evidence upon which the moving party will rely; but when the motion is to be made on the minutes of the court, the notice itself must specify the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient; otherwise the motion will be denied. Code Civil Proc. § 659. If the motion for a new trial is to be heard on the minutes of the court, it must be made at the earliest practicable period after notice, (Id. § 660,) and on appeal from the order granting or refusing the motion, a statement to be subsequently prepared forms a part of the record, (Id. § 661.) By these various provisions a very simple, plain, and expeditious practice is prescribed, by which the trouble, expense, and delay of settling statements or bills of exceptions may be entirely avoided in all that large class of cases in which the order of the trial judge granting or denying a new trial is accepted as final, as it always must be—so far as the ground we are considering is concerned—when there is a substantial conflict of evidence. And even where the losing party wishes to appeal it will generally be easier and more convenient to make a statement after than before the order; for the argument of the motion will generally eliminate many of the points, as its decision will always do away with the necessity of setting out evidence upon points as to which there is an admitted conflict. The wonder is that a practice so convenient, so saving of time, trouble, and expense, is so little resorted to. Possibly the explanation is to be found in the fact that the terms of the statute leave it doubtful whether, in a case like the present, where there are no written notes of the testimony capable of being placed on file, the moving party can have any advantage of the testimony actually adduced at the trial, and necessarily resting alone in the recollection of the judge. If so, it is fortunate that an occasion has arisen for removing any misconception on that point, for we have no doubt that a party moving on the minutes of the court may rely on all matters that could be legitimately included in a statement prepared in advance of the motion. It is true that the statute enumerates depositions, documentary evidence, and phonographic report of testimony, as matters to which reference may be had on the hearing of the motion, (section 660;) and there is some force in the argument that such an enumeration should be regarded as exclusive, but there is much more force in the consideration that since the judge has the undoubted right to include testimony actually given, though not reported, in a statement prepared in advance of the hearing, there is no reason why his recollection of the evidence should not be equally resorted to in making a statement after the hearing. The statement, at whatever time prepared, ought to be a correct presentation of so much of the testimony as is material,—derived from the reporter's notes, if there are any, and, if not, from the recollection of the judge, assisted by such notes as he may have taken; and the mere fact that there is no short-hand report of the trial ought not to be held to deprive the losing party of the privilege of moving for a new trial in the speediest and most convenient mode prescribed by the statute, unless its terms are such as to admit of no doubt that such was the intention of the legislature. We think the law demands no such construction. The enumeration of section 660 is not necessarily exclusive, and it is contrary to all considerations of justice and convenience to hold that it was intended to be. That a judge may and must consider on a motion for a new trial, made in advance of a statement, all evidence material to the grounds and specifications of the notice, whether reported or not, is something which the legislature may well have deemed too obvious to call for express enactment; and, if such evidence is to be considered, it must go into the statement. It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate be issued, directed to respondent, and commanding him to settle said statement according to the facts, including therein the evidence material to the motion as given at the trial of said action.

SOMMER v. SMITH. (No. 13,970.)*(Supreme Court of California. July 17, 1891.)VARIANCE BETWEEN PLEADING AND PROOF.

In an action by a principal against his agent to recover the difference between what the agent paid for certain stock and what he said he paid, and was repaid to him by the principal, the complaint alleged that the agent purchased the shares of stock, while the proof showed that he purchased certain agreements of a syndicate to furnish the shares of stock. Held, that the variance was immaterial.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from judgment and order denying defendant a new trial. The question on this appeal is as to the materiality of a variance between the allegations of the complaint and the proof. It is averred that defendant, as plaintiff's agent, purchased certain shares of stock in the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company of California. The proof is that as such agent he purchased for plaintiff certain agreements of a syndicate to furnish the shares of stock. This seems a plain case of an immaterial variance, under section 469, Code Civil Proc. In its general scope, the proof corresponds with the allegations of the complaint. It was a purchase of shares of stock, but not the immediate purchase of certificates of stock, as would be inferred from the complaint. The object of the suit was to recover the difference between what the agent reported he had purchased the stock for, and which plaintiff had paid the agent, and the price which, as plaintiff afterwards discovered, the agent had actually paid. An examination of the record shows quite conclusively that the defendant was not misled by the variance. A full defense was made as though the complaint had accurately stated the facts. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FITZGERALD, C.

HICKS v. THOMAS. (No. 13,761.)¹*(Supreme Court of California. July 18, 1891.)RESCISSION OF DEED—FRAUD—EVIDENCE—PLEADING—FINDINGS.

1. A complaint in an action to set aside a conveyance showed plaintiff to be an old, unprotected, feeble-minded woman, and alleged that, after having made a verbal contract with defendant for the sale of her property for its reasonable value, he, with intention to cheat and defraud her, falsely represented and insisted that the price agreed to be paid was much smaller, and that he could prove such assertion, and compel her to perform the contract, as he claimed it, and that, if she did not deed it, he would get it on a tax-deed; that he threatened her with violence if she did not execute a deed of the property to her; that relying on and believing such false representations, and because of the threatened violence, she executed the deed. Held, that the complaint was not founded on fraudulent representations alone, but upon oppression and undue influence, calculated to overcome the judgment and will of such a person, and was sufficient.

2. The action being based on a charge of fraud in procuring the deed, proof of the verbal contract could not be barred on the ground that negotiations precedent to the deed were merged therein.

3. It is not necessary that a complaint, founded on fraudulent representations, should minutely detail the conversations by which the fraudulent representations are proven.

4. An offer to restore the consideration received for a deed which is sought to be set aside, when averred in the language of the statute, is sufficient on general demurrer.

5. The finding of facts inconsistent with and contradictory of the representations made is sufficient, without a specific finding that the representations were false.

6. The representations having been accompanied by threats and duress, it is not necessary to find that plaintiff believed them, though the general finding that the deed was procured by fraud implies this fact.

7. That plaintiff was injured appears from the finding that the price paid was grossly inadequate.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Shasta county; AARON BELL, Judge.

John F. Ellison, for appellant. Clay W. Taylor and J. Chadbourne, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Defendant appeals from judgment and order refusing a new trial. The action is to set aside a conveyance of real estate, and a bill of sale of personal property, on the ground of fraud and duress. The complaint shows that plaintiff is a widow upwards of 68 years old, of feeble understanding and limited business experience, and at the time of the execution of the instruments she was living alone, remote from friends or relatives, in ill health, and in a state of great mental depression and despondency; that at the urgent solicitation of the defendant she verbally contracted to sell to him her property, consisting of a tract of land and the stock on it, for $3,500. After this verbal agreement was made, defendant, intending to cheat and defraud her, falsely represented, insisted, and asseverated that the verbal contract was not that he should pay $3,500 for all the property, but $1,000 for the land only; that he could prove such assertion, and compel her to perform the contract as he claimed it to be; that he had an unredeemed certificate of sale for taxes, and unless she sold to him he would get a tax-deed, which would be as good or better than a deed from her; that he represented that her creditors would attach her personal property, and to save the same she must convey to him for $220; that at that time, or before, he told her he would make her sign the deed, and if she would not he would throw her out and break her God damned neck; that it would not take long to get rid of her; "that relying upon and believing the said false and fraudulent representations of the defendant, and by means thereof, and pursuant to and because of said threatened personal violence to plaintiff from the defendant, and plaintiff's fear thereof, he then and there, without giving the plaintiff any time for reflection and consultation with others, induced, influenced," etc., her to make a deed to him of the land for $1,000, and a bill of sale of the personal property for $220. She alleges an offer to restore to defendant everything she had received from him, and a demand for a reconveyance. The offer was made October 31, 1888. She discovered the fraud January, 1888, and immediately commenced a suit against defendant for the cancellation of the conveyances, which suit, owing to some defects, had been dismissed. The deed and bill of sale were made December 21, 1887. A general demurrer was interposed to the complaint, which was overruled. If the action were based upon the fraudulent representations alone, the complaint would be insufficient, but it is not based upon such representations alone. Circumstances are stated which show great oppression and undue influence, well calculated to overcome the judgment and will of such a person as the plaintiff. An intelligent, strong man would not be likely to be influenced by such representations and threats, and the plaintiff must have known that his assertions as to the verbal contract were untrue, but they were accompanied by threats that he could prove his assertions, and would compel her to adopt his version of the contract, and if she did not he would get the property from her upon a tax-deed. Representations which are very unreasonable, accompanied by threats, may well be held to have influenced a sick, weak-minded, foolish woman, who was without advisers or friends. The material question in such cases is whether by such fraudulent practices she has in fact been wronged, although, as a general rule, where people are so reckless of their own interests, courts may not interfere to relieve them from their folly. The weakness of the plaintiff constitutes a very important element in her case. It is averred that the property was worth $3,500. The price was therefore grossly inadequate.

The defendant at the trial reserved many exceptions to the admission of evidence. A large number of these are to evidence of conversations proving the verbal contract, on the ground that all verbal precedent negotiations were merged in the deed. Of course, the action being based upon a charge of fraud in procuring the deed and bill of sale, no such rule obtains. Another objection taken was that the representations were not specifically averred. We think there is nothing in this objection. The acts of fraud must be specifically set out. But this rule does not require or justify a minute detail of all the conversations by which fraudulent representations are proven. It is enough if averred in substance and legal effect as proven. And then it is proper to prove corroborative statements. The offer to restore is averred in the language of the statute. If that requires a specific tender, the allegation would imply one, and would be sufficient, at least in the absence of a special demurrer, which is sometimes in the nature of a motion to require a pleader to make his averment more definite, as the practice is in some states where code pleading prevails. Is the findings sufficient which fails to find specifically, (1) that the representations were false; (2) that plaintiff believed and relied upon them; and (3) that she has been injured? These objections are taken by appellant, and to them may be added that it is not specifically found that she believed that defendant would execute his threats, and signed and delivered the papers under the influence of such fear. All the above facts, however, although not specifically found, do appear from the findings: (1) That the representations were false is shown by facts found which are inconsistent with and contradictory of the representations made. (2) It was not necessary to find that she believed them, because they were accompanied by threats and duress, but the general finding that the deed and bill of sale were procured by fraud implies this fact. (3) That she was injured appears from the fact which is found that the price paid was grossly inadequate. We must not be understood as holding that, under the circumstances of this case, it was necessary to show damage. There is a general finding that the deed and bill of sale were procured by defendant "by duress, menace, undue influence, and fraud." This is not as specific as it ought to have been, but it is a finding of the ultimate facts upon which the judgment depends, and the defendant has not been injured by the failure to find more specifically. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

Ex parte VANCE. (No. 20,863.)

RELEASE FROM JAIL—SATISFACTION OF SENTENCE.

Where one sentenced to pay a fine and to be imprisoned until such fine is paid in the proportion of a day for every dollar of the fine, is released by the sheriff without authority, the time of his absence cannot be considered as spent in jail in satisfaction of the judgment.

In bank. Application for writ of habeas corpus.

A. H. Carpenter, for petitioner. C. S. Denson and Wilson & Wilson, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The return to the writ of habeas corpus issued herein shows that the petitioner, D. M. Vance, was on October 18, 1889, adjudged by the superior court of Sacramento county to be guilty of contempt, and to pay a fine thereof of $300, and to be imprisoned in the county jail of Sacramento county until such fine was paid, in the proportion of one day for every dollar of the fine. The petitioner was on that day committed to jail under said judgment, and there remained until October 22, 1889, when he was released by the sheriff, and remained at liberty, free and without confinement, until June 10, 1891, at which date he was rearrested under an order of the superior court made June 9, 1891, directing that its former judgment be enforced. The release of petitioner by the sheriff was not by any order of the court, but upon an undertaking given by petitioner on appeal to the supreme court from said judgment of contempt, and it may be assumed that both the sheriff and the petitioner acted upon the belief that the execution of said judgment was stayed by said appeal and undertaking. The petitioner now claims his release upon various grounds which assail the validity of the original judgment for contempt, and also because "the term of such imprisonment has long expired, and there having been no legal or authorized suspension of said judgment." In regard to the first claim of petitioner it will be sufficient to say that the affidavits charging him with contempt were such as to authorize the order which directed him to show cause why he should not be punished for the contempt therein alleged, and the subsequent proceedings ending in the judgment for contempt were regular, and the judgment itself valid. The remaining ground upon which the petitioner claims his release presents the single question whether his release from jail under the circumstances here stated, and thereafter remaining at large with free and perfect liberty, for a length of time sufficient to have satisfied said judgment if he had remained in jail, operate as a complete execution of the judgment; and it would seem from the mere statement of the proposition that the contention of petitioner on this point cannot be sustained. The sentence of the court was that he pay a fine, and that part of the judgment relating to imprisonment was merely incidental to the judgment of fine, and in the nature of an award of execution directing the particular way in which that judgment should be enforced, in the event of the non-payment of the fine imposed, and it seems clear to us that such judgment can only be satisfied by a compliance with its terms. In this case it is admitted that the judgment of fine has not been paid, and that the defendant has not suffered the alternative of actual imprisonment. The judgment therefore remains in full force. The act of the sheriff in releasing the petitioner was unauthorized, and petitioner's departure from the jail to which he had been lawfully committed, without having been discharged by due course of law, was equally so, and was in effect a technical escape, from which he can derive no advantage. The time of petitioner's absence from jail, in violation of law, cannot be considered as having been spent in jail in satisfaction of the judgment which required his actual imprisonment. This question, although presented here for the first time, is not a new one. In Re Edwards, 43 N. J. Law, 555, the petitioner had been committed to state-prison for the term of 10 years at hard labor. He made his escape, and remained at large for 7 years, and he claimed that, notwithstanding such fact, he was entitled to his discharge at the end of the term of 10 years; but the supreme court, in an elaborate opinion, held otherwise. The same question came before the supreme court of Kansas in the well-considered case of Hollon v. Hopkins, 21 Kan.

638, and was disposed of adversely to the contention of the petitioner here. In that case the petitioner had been sentenced to the state-prison for three years "from the 19th day of September, A. D. 1874." On the next day after sentence he made his escape, and was not recaptured until 1878, and he insisted that the judgment had expired by its own limitation, but the court held that the essential part of the judgment was that petitioner be imprisoned for three years, and that the time fixed by the court for its commencement was not such a material part thereof as to permit an evasion of the judgment by the wrongful act of the prisoner. The court there said: "The only way of satisfying a judgment judicially is by fulfilling its requirements. Of course, if Hollon had died, or been pardoned, the sentence would be at an end. But, as those things have not happened, and as the sentence has not been disturbed by any judicial decision or determination, there is no way of satisfying its requirements, or of exhausting its force, except service by Hollon of the time required in the penitentiary." In State v. Cockerham, 2 Ired. 204, the defendant had been sentenced to be imprisoned for two months "on and after the first day of November next," and did not go into prison according to the sentence, and at a subsequent term of the court it was directed that the sentence should be immediately executed, and it was held that the order was proper, and that the essential part of the judgment was not the time when it should be executed, but the extent of the punishment fixed. So, also, in Dolan's Case, 101 Mass. 219, the same conclusion was reached, the court holding that "expiration of time without imprisonment is in no sense an execution of the sentence." Other cases might be cited to the same effect, and, indeed, our attention has not been called to the decision of any appellate court holding to the contrary. We are satisfied with the law as thus declared. Petitioner remanded.

WILSON v. FOURTEENTH-ST. R. CO. (No. 13,270.)¹

PERSONAL INJURIES—ALIGHTING FROM STREET-CAR—INSTRUCTIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where, in an action against a street-car company for personal injuries, the evidence showed that the car steps were defective, and the driver grossly negligent in starting the car before plaintiff had alighted, an instruction that the company, if guilty of gross negligence, was liable, even though plaintiff herself was negligent, could work no injury to defendant, where there was no evidence of plaintiff's negligence.

Wells Whitmore, and M. C. Chapman, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an action for damages caused by the carelessness of the driver of a street-car, drawn by horses, belonging to the defendant corporation; and a defect in the steps of the car, by means of which the plaintiff was thrown from it as she was attempting to alight therefrom, when it had stopped for her to get off. The evidence showed, as we think, beyond any controversy, that the injury, which is very serious, was caused in this manner, viz.: The plaintiff, when the car stopped, placed one foot on the ground, and had the other still resting on the step, when the driver suddenly started the horse-car. The step was jerked from under her foot planted thereon, and she was precipitated violently to the ground, and her hip severely injured. The evidence is ample to show both the carelessness of the corporation in having such a defective step on its car, and the gross negligence of the driver of the car in starting it just as the passenger, the plaintiff, was stepping from it. The only matter about which there is really any serious question in the case is the instruction which reads thus: "If you believe from the evidence that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was guilty of negligence upon her part that contributed to produce the injuries, and you also believe from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of gross negligence, and that such gross negligence caused the injuries complained of, then the court instructs you that the defendant is liable notwithstanding the contributory negligence of the plaintiff." The instruction could work no injury to the defendant, for the reason that there is no evidence tending to show any negligence on the part of the plaintiff. She was proceeding, after due warning to the driver where to stop, and when he had stopped the car, to get off. While so doing, standing upon one foot on a defective step, and attempting to plant the other foot firmly on the ground, having no reason whatever to suppose but that her right to have time to get off would be allowed her, she is suddenly hurled to the earth by the starting of the car, jerking the step from under her foot resting thereon, and seriously injured. A more careless proceeding on the part of the employee of the corporation defendant can hardly be imagined. No prejudicial error is perceived in the record, and we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C. C.

CURTISS v. ÆTNA LIFE INS. CO. (Nos. 12-939, 13,013.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. July 17, 1891.)

INSURABLE INTEREST—ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY AS COLLATERAL—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

1. In an action on a policy for $10,000 taken by a creditor upon the life of his debtor it appeared that shortly before it was issued the debtor had made an unqualified admission of an existing indebtedness of between $5,000 and $6,000 in a written request for further advances. The creditor had promised to make advances up to $10,000, although not bound by written contract to do so. The facts were fully stated in the application, and the insurer continued to receive premiums for several years up to the death of the assured, during which the creditor, on the faith of the policy, made advances, which, with the original debt and interest, exceeded the amount of the policy. Held, that the evidence showed an insurable interest in the creditor sufficient to sustain a verdict for $10,000, although at the date of the policy his interest did not amount to that sum.

2. In an action for the insurance by one to whom the creditor had assigned the policy as collateral security for his own debt, it is immaterial, as between the assignee and the insurer, that, after loss, the creditor, prior to his death, had paid the debt, since that question can only arise between the assignee and the heirs or personal representatives of the creditor.

3. Where the complaint alleges that the insured became indebted to the beneficiary more than four years prior to the date of the policy, a defense that the beneficiary had no insurable interest because the debt was barred by the statute of limitations must be raised by plea, and not by demurrer, since the averment of indebtedness is not inconsistent with the fact of an original promise in writing to pay at a date within four years.

4. An averment that the beneficiary agreed to make further advances to the insured, for which the policy was to stand as security, will be presumed, on general demurrer, to imply that the agreement was written, and hence not void under the statute of frauds.

5. Where a creditor takes a policy on his debtor's life for a sum exceeding the debt, a binding agreement to make further advances on demand to the full amount of the policy gives him an additional insurable interest.

6. A proviso in a policy payable to one of his assigns, providing that a claim "by an assignee shall be subject to proof of interest" does not apply to one who holds it as collateral security for a debt, since the assignee is a mere trustee for the debtor, and must account for any surplus proceeds after paying the debt, and it is not necessary for such assignee to allege that he had an insurable interest in the life of insured.

7. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 339, providing that actions on written contracts executed out of the state are barred in two years, does not apply to an action on an insurance policy which provides that it shall not be operative until countersigned by the general agent of the insurer in California, and which was countersigned in the latter state after being signed in Connecticut by the insurer.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Gilbert L. Curtiss against Ætna Life Insurance Company on a policy of insurance on the life of one Tucker. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fox & Kellogg, for appellant. Chas. F. Hanlon, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. These are separate appeals in the same case; the first from the judgment, and the second from an order denying a new trial. The action is by the assignee of a policy of life insurance effected by his assignor upon the life of a third person, and the principal grounds upon which it is defended are want of interest in the insured at the date of the policy, and in plaintiff at the date of the assignment. The points involved in these and other grounds of defense are raised by demurrer to the complaint, motion for nonsuit, and by numerous exceptions to the admission and exclusion of evidence and to the allowance and refusal of instructions to the jury. It is scarcely practicable to notice each separate exception contained in the record and referred to in the briefs, but we shall endeavor not to overlook anything essential to a proper consideration of the merits of the appeals.

First, then, as to the points raised by the demurrer. It appears from the complaint as amended that the policy was issued April 5, 1871, to Esther C. Curtiss, for the sum of $10,000 on the life of one Tucker; and with respect to her interest in Tucker's life it is alleged "that at the time said application was made the said Esther Cordelia Curtiss had an insurable interest in the life of Alfred W. Tucker, which interest was as follows: The said Tucker, at the time, was indebted to the said Esther C. Curtiss in the full sum of $4,000, for so much money which she had before that time, to-wit, in the year 1866, loaned to the said Tucker in United States gold coin, at his special instance and request, the whole of which, together with the interest thereon from the time of said loan, was due and unpaid on said last-mentioned date, and was also on said last-mentioned date further indebted to the said Esther C. Curtiss in the sum of $500, or thereabouts, for so much money before that time, and since the year 1866, paid, laid out, and expended for and on account of the said Tucker by the said Esther C. Curtiss, at his special instance and request, together with the interest thereon. "And on the day application was made as aforesaid, and immediately prior to the making of the same, the said Esther C. Curtiss, for valuable consideration, agreed with the said Tucker to loan and advance money thereafter at such times as he might demand till the amounts so loaned and advanced, in the aggregate, and the interest thereon, together with other sums so due as aforesaid, and the interest thereon, should amount to the total sum of $10,000. And plaintiff avers, on his information and belief, that afterwards, to-wit, subsequently to the making of said application and the issuance of said policy, and in pursuance of said agreement between the said Esther C. Curtiss and the said Tucker, she (the said Esther C. Curtiss,) at various times loaned and advanced to said Tucker various sums of money, which, together with the interest thereon, and the said sums of $4,000 and $500 and the interest due thereon, amounted in all to the sum of $10,000, and the whole of which was unpaid and due from said Tucker to said Esther C. Curtiss at the time of his death as herein stated, and no part of which has ever been paid. All of which was communicated to and known by the defendant at the time said application was made, and before and at the time of the issuance of the said policy." Appellant contends that these allegations disclose no insurable interest in Mrs. Curtiss within the meaning of section 2763 of the Civil Code. It is to be observed, however, that at the date of the policy the Civil Code had not been enacted, and the question is not whether the policy is obnoxious to the provision referred to, but whether it was rendered invalid by any rule or principle of the common law. There may be no difference between the two; and, indeed, it may be allowed that the Code provision is an indication of what, in the opinion of the legislature, the common-law rule was; but if there is a difference it is by the common law, and not by the Code, that the validity of the policy must be tested.

Bearing this in mind, we proceed to consider the specific objections of counsel for appellant to the statement of Mrs. Curtiss' interest. He claims that it appears from the allegations of the complaint that her right to recover the $4,000 loaned in 1866 and the $500 advanced after 1866 was, at the date of the policy, barred by the statute of limitations, and consequently that Tucker was under no legal obligation to repay any part of these sums or of the interest thereon, and he contends that the alleged agreement to advance other money sufficient with the sums previously advanced to amount to $10,000, was void under the statute of frauds, because, presumably, it was not in writing, and not to be performed within one year. As to the first proposition, the cases seem to hold that a debt, even though not legally collectible, by reason of the bar of the statute, gives an insurable interest. 1 May, Ins. § 108; Bliss, Ins. § 28, and cases cited. But, aside from this, we think it does not appear from the complaint itself that at the date of the policy the obligations of Tucker to Mrs. Curtiss were barred by the statute. The case of Dorland v. Dorland, cited by counsel, (Cal.) 5 Pac. Rep. 77, is not in point. It was merely held in that case as a rule of evidence that, an advance of money being proved, and no time for repayment mentioned, the presumption is that it is payable on demand, and that the statute begins to run immediately. Here, however, the question is as to a rule of pleading, and we do not understand that a complaint showing money to have been loaned at a date sufficiently remote to admit of the running of the statute raises a presumption that it has run. On the contrary, when the allegation is consistent with the opposite conclusion, i. e., that the debt is not barred, the defense must be raised by plea. Kraner v. Halsey, 82 Cal. 210, 22 Pac. Rep. 1137; Doe v. Sanger, 78 Cal. 151, 20 Pac. Rep. 366; Wise v. Hogan, 77 Cal. 187, 19 Pac. Rep. 278, and cases cited. Here the allegation that Tucker became indebted more than four years prior to the date of the policy is entirely consistent with the fact of an original promise in writing to pay at a date within four years, or with a written acknowledgment of the debt subsequently made, and an express or implied promise to pay it.

As to the proposition that the agreement of Mrs. Curtiss to advance other moneys was void, the rule of pleading is also against the contention of appellant.

If the agreement to be valid must have been in writing, then the allegation that it was so agreed is held to imply that it was so agreed in writing. Broder v. Conklin, 77 Cal. 336, 19 Pac. Rep. 513, and cases cited. So far, then, as the complaint is concerned, it clearly shows an indebtedness from Tucker to Mrs. Curtiss at the date of the policy, amounting to $4,500, exclusive of interest, and to that extent there can be no question that it shows her to have had an insurable interest in his life.

But did she have any interest beyond the amount of the then existing indebtedness? In other words, did her agreement to advance Tucker, on his demand, the balance of $10,000 create an additional interest? It has been held that a surety on an official bond has an insurable interest in the life of his principal, although there has been no breach of the bond at the date of the application for the policy; and that he may recover the full amount of the sum insured, although no breach of the bond has ensued. Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. St. 6. This conclusion was based upon the ground that the contingent liability of a surety brings him within the common-law principle that the only thing essential to relieve the policy of the character of a gaming or wagering contract is "that it shall be obtained in good faith, and not for the purpose of speculating upon the hazard of a life in which the assured has no interest," citing Insurance Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457. Upon the same principle it must have been held at common law that a binding contract by Mrs. Curtiss to advance money to Tucker, on his demand, gave her an insurable interest in his life.

We come next to the question whether the complaint was bad because of a failure to allege that plaintiff, at the date of the assignment to him, had an insurable interest in the life of Tucker. The allegation of the complaint is that on the 12th day of January, 1880, said Esther C. Curtiss, for a valuable consideration, to-wit, the sum of $10,000 and upwards, and in accordance with the terms of said policy, assigned, etc., to plaintiff, and a copy of the assignment, attached as an exhibit to the complaint, is referred to and made a part thereof. Referring to the assignment, it appears from its terms to have been made as collateral. There may be some ambiguity or uncertainty about the meaning of this allegation construed with reference to the terms of the assignment as set out in the exhibit, but no such objection was specified in the demurrer, and upon a general demurrer we think the complaint must be held to allege an assignment of the policy as collateral security for the repayment of $10,000 and upwards advanced by plaintiff to the assured. So far as it is affected by the law of this state, as it existed at the date of the assignment, there can be no doubt of the validity of the transfer. By section 2764 of the Civil Code it is provided that "a policy of insurance on life or health may pass by transfer, will, or succession to any person, whether he has an insurable interest or not, and such person may recover upon it whatever the insured might have recovered." It may be, however, notwithstanding this provision, that the parties to a life policy can make a valid stipulation against an assignment to one who has no insurable interest in the life insured; but, whether they could or not, we have no doubt that such a stipulation in a policy issued as this policy was, before the enactment of the Code, remains of binding force. It is necessary, therefore, to consider the terms of the policy in disposing of this point. By its express terms the amount insured is made payable "to Esther C. Curtiss, her executors, administrators, or assigns, within ninety days after notice and proof of the death of the insured," etc., but it is, in another clause, provided that any claim "made by any assignee shall be subject to proof of interest." Does this proviso apply to an assignee who holds the policy merely as collateral security for the repayment of money advanced to or for the insured? We hold that it does not. The law against assignments to parties without interest (where such is the law) and stipulations against such assignments are based upon the same motives and policy, and neither one nor the other applies to assignments by way of security. The assignee, in such case, is a mere trustee for the insured. What he collects on the policy he collects for him, and must apply it to the payment of the debt secured, accounting for any surplus. So regarded, such assignments do not involve the mischief which the common law or the contract of the parties was designed to prevent, and are consequently not within the meaning of the proviso in this policy. In the case of Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, where it was held that an assignment to one who had no insurable interest was invalid in other respects, the assignee was nevertheless allowed the advances for which the policy was security. The principle of that decision sustains our conclusion on this point. It was not necessary, therefore, that the plaintiff should allege any interest in the life of Tucker. If it was necessary that he should allege an indebtedness from the insured to him, we think the fact was sufficiently alleged as against a general demurrer, and, if it was necessary to allege preliminary proof to defendant of such indebtedness, we think that allegation is comprised in the general allegation that "all conditions on the part of E. C. Curtiss and plaintiff have been performed." The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled, and this conclusion disposes of the appeal from the judgment, which is accordingly affirmed.

With respect to the appeal from the order denying a new trial, it is clear, if our conclusions above stated are correct, that the superior court did not err in overruling defendant's objection to the admission of any testimony in support of the complaint. Nor did the superior court err in overruling the motion for a nonsuit.

Only one of the grounds of this motion remains to be noticed, the others being disposed of by what has already been said. This action was commenced more than two years after the liability of defendant accrued, and if the policy was executed out of this state the right of action was barred by section 339, Code Civil Proc. The complaint alleges that the policy, a copy of which is made part thereof, was executed in California, April 5, 1871. The answer admits the genuineness and due execution of the policy, a copy of which is annexed to the complaint, but denies that it was executed in California, alleging, on the contrary, that it was executed in Connecticut on the 14th of March, 1871, and pleading the bar of the statute. The plaintiff did not introduce the policy in evidence at the trial, and the contention of the defendant is that he, therefore, did not prove a policy executed in California, and consequently that he should have been nonsuited on the plea of the statute of limitations. But even if we admitted that with respect to this plea the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, which we do not, the contention of defendant could not be sustained. The last clause of the policy was in these words: "In witness whereof the said Aetna Life Insurance Company have, by their president and secretary, signed and executed this contract in the city of Hartford this 14th day of March, 1871, but the same shall not be operative until countersigned by M. P. Morse, general agent at San Francisco, Cal.,"—following which came the signature "E. A. Bulkeley, President; T. O. Center, Secretary;" and then the following: "Countersigned at San Francisco this 5th day of April, 1871. M. P. MORSE, General Agent." All this appeared by the copy set out in the complaint, the correctness of which was expressly admitted by the answer. It appeared, therefore, on the face of the pleadings that the policy, although partly executed at Hartford on March 14th, was not fully executed or operative until countersigned some time afterwards by the general agent at San Francisco. The plaintiff also testified at the trial that Morse countersigned the policy at San Francisco after it was returned from Connecticut, and this testimony was admitted without objection. The motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

There are numerous specifications of particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of the jury, as to which we say that it appears very plainly from the testimony that the procuring of the policy in question by Mrs. Curtiss was a perfectly honest and legitimate transaction. She had advanced large sums to Tucker, and there is very satisfactory evidence that shortly before the issuance of the policy Tucker, in applying for an additional advance, had distinctly acknowledged in writing subscribed by him an existing indebtedness of between five and six thousand dollars, and this acknowledgment was not qualified by any promise to pay upon a contingency, as in Curtis v. City of Sacramento, 70 Cal. 414, 11 Pac. Rep. 748, or by any declaration inconsistent with an intention to pay. It does not appear that Mrs. Curtiss was at the date of the policy bound by any contract in writing to advance Tucker the balance of the $10,000, but she had promised advances to a considerable amount, and there is evidence that she made them. It also appears that her written answers to questions contained in or accompanying her application for the policy were filled in by the agent of defendant, after a full and correct statement of all the facts as they existed. This is clearly and distinctly proved by the testimony of the agent who took the application. With this knowledge, which must be imputed to the company, it issued the policy, and continued to receive the premiums during the life-time of Tucker, i. e., for a period of nine years, during which time Mrs. Curtiss, on the faith of the policy, made advances which, with the old debt and interest accruing, must have exceeded $10,000. Under these circumstances we think it does not lie in the mouth of the defendant to charge her with misrepresentation in stating in her application that she had an insurable interest to the full amount of the policy, although, as matter of strict law, her interest at that time may not have amounted to so much. Her interest was, we think, sufficiently proven to sustain the verdict.

As to the alleged failure to prove an insurable interest in plaintiff at the date of the assignment, we have shown that none is required to support an assignment by way of collateral security. It was clearly proved that Mrs. Curtiss was largely indebted to plaintiff at the time of the assignment, at the time of Tucker's death, when the policy became payable, and at the time of her own death. This gave plaintiff a right of action on the policy, and all the questions which defendant attempts to raise about the payment or release of the indebtedness from Mrs. Curtiss to plaintiff, subsequent to the time when the loss became payable, are out of place here. Those are questions which can only arise between plaintiff and the heirs or other representatives of Mrs. Curtiss, they alone being concerned in a proper application or distribution of the proceeds of the policy. After a loss and fixed liability attached it is of no concern whatever to the insurer whether an assignee has or has not an interest in the life insured.

As to the alleged errors of law, many of them are disposed of by what has already been said. Some evidence, admitted against the objection of defendant, was immaterial at the time it was so admitted, but the complaint was subsequently amended before the close of the trial so as to make this evidence material. This cured the error. We find no material error in the instructions upon which the case was submitted to the jury, except that they are in some respects too favorable to the defendant. Judgment and order affirmed.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—KNOWLEDGE OF GRANTEE—QUIETING TITLE—ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACT.

1. A conveyance of land by a father to his daughter to encourage her marriage will not be set aside, although he was insolvent at the time, when she had no knowledge of fraud, and he had no intent to defraud.

2. An execution having been subsequently issued against such land by a judgment creditor of the father, the daughter filed a complaint to prevent a sale thereof, averring that she was the owner of "a portion of W. A. B.'s Oak Tree farm tract, as surveyed for W. A. B. by * * * as per map," etc.; that such creditor had levied thereon as the property of said B.; and that such sale will cast a cloud upon her title. Held, that the defect of not showing that plaintiff obtained title from W. A. B., her father, if it existed, was cured by the averment in defendant's cross-complaint of a conveyance to her by the father, and a trial upon such pleadings; and the fact that a demurrer was interposed is immaterial.

3. The fact that the antenuptial contract was not in writing is immaterial.

Wm. B. Sharpe and S. C. Devson, for appellant. Scrivner & Boone and Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. In the year 1883 there was a treaty or agreement of marriage pending between the plaintiff, then a young unmarried woman, and Alfred H. Cohen. Cohen was then a young lawyer just beginning the practice of his profession, and having no income or means sufficient to procure a home and support a family, and they were both unwilling to get married until they had a home. These facts coming to the knowledge of Watson A. Bray, the father of plaintiff, he concluded, in order to encourage the consummation of said marriage, to convey to plaintiff a lot of land and build a house thereon as a home for the young couple, provided the father of said Cohen would furnish it. After some conferences between the said Bray and the father of said Cohen, the proposition was accepted by the latter; whereupon Bray, on July 12, 1883, conveyed a lot of land, being the premises described in the complaint herein, to the plaintiff, (then Emma Bray,) and proceeded immediately to build a house thereon, which was completed in the early part of 1884. This was done with the knowledge of Cohen, and he was consulted about it. The house was furnished by said Cohen's father. In February, 1884, plaintiff and Alfred H. Cohen were married, and moved into the house, where they have lived ever since. It is found by the court, and clearly established by the evidence, that the said conveyance of said lot to plaintiff, and the construction of said house thereon, were the consideration which induced said marriage, without which it would not then (if ever) have been consummated. The value of the lot and the cost of the house amounted at the time to about $16,000, and the present value of the property is $18,000. At the time of the conveyance of said lot to plaintiff and the building of said house, the said Bray was the owner of several hundred thousand dollars' worth of property, and supposed himself to be worth a quarter of a million of dollars. The conveyance was not made with any design on his part to hinder or defraud creditors, (whether that fact be material or not;) and it is entirely clear that plaintiff and her husband believed him to be a man of large means, and fully able to make the said provision for her marriage, and that she accepted the same without any intent of hindering or defrauding his creditors. It turned out afterwards, however, that said Bray was, in fact, insolvent at the time said conveyance was made to plaintiff. On said July 12, 1883, the date of said conveyance to plaintiff, said Bray was indebted to the defendant Charles C. Knox in an amount exceeding $60,000; and on August 12, 1885, said Knox recovered judgment against said Bray for $79,218. On April 26, 1887, Knox caused an execution to be issued on said judgment, and delivered the same to the sheriff with instruction to levy it upon said lot conveyed by said Bray to plaintiff as aforesaid, as the property of said Bray. The sheriff made said levy, and was about to sell said lot, when the plaintiff brought this present action to restrain such sale, upon the ground that it would cast a cloud upon her title. The court gave judgment for plaintiff according to her prayer, and from said judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant Knox appeals.

The main question presented is whether the said conveyance from Bray to his daughter, under the circumstances above stated, was void as against the creditors of Bray. This question has been very ably and elaborately discussed by counsel, and a multitude of authorities have been cited. We will not undertake here to review these authorities, but will merely state the conclusions to which they clearly lead. Where one party conveys land to another for a valuable and adequate consideration, the conveyance will be good against the creditors of the grantor, although the latter intended thereby to defraud his creditors, if the grantee had no knowledge of such intent, and was in no way a participant in the fraudulent purpose. Marriage is the highest and most valuable of considerations; and when a conveyance is made upon such consideration, the grantee, if guiltless of fraud herself, is in, at least, as firm and sure a position as if she had paid in money the full value of the property conveyed. It has even been held that a voluntary conveyance to a daughter, intended as a settlement, and without present reference to her marriage, will become ex post facto valid against creditors and purchasers with only implied notice, if upon the credit of the conveyance a person has been induced to marry her. Marriage being in its nature permanent, and being the most important of all civil relations, the law will not lightly allow the inducements which have led to it to be disturbed. And the dowry of a bride, without special proof, is presumed to be an inducement to her marriage. The law does not require a delicate investigation into the quantum of influence which her property has had with hersuitor. A few of the many authorities which establish the principles above stated are the following: Bump, Fraud. Conv. pp. 305, 306, and cases cited; Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 212, and cases cited; Magniac v. Thomson, 7 Pet. 348; Prewitt v. Wilson, 103 U. S. 22; Wood v. Jackson, 8 Wend. 9; Herring v. Wickham, 29 Grat. 633; Huston v. Cantril, 11 Leigh, 146, 155; Sterry v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. 260, 271; Brown v. Carter, 5 Ves. 877, 878; Otis v. Spencer, 102 Ill. 622; Dugan v. Gittings, 43 Amer. Dec. 306. The case at bar presents a clear field for the application of these principles. It has none of those peculiarities or complications of facts which often make it difficult to determine what rule of law applies. It is a plain case of a conveyance upon the express consideration of marriage, which was the direct and immediate inducement of the marriage, and made, not only without any knowledge of fraud by the grantee, but without any intent to defraud on the part of the grantor. The court was therefore right in upholding the said conveyance against appellant, claiming as a creditor of Bray.

2. Appellant contends that the judgment should be reversed, because the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and because his demurrer on that ground was erroneously overruled. The point is, as we understand it, that facts constituting a cloud on plaintiff's title are not stated, because it does not appear that plaintiff derived her title from Bray, against whom the execution runs. The complaint shows, among other things, (in brief,) that since July 12, 1883, plaintiff has been the owner and in possession of a certain described lot of land; that said land is "a portion of W. A. Bray's Oak Tree farm tract, as surveyed for W. A. Bray by James T. Stratton, April, 1869, as per map," etc.,—"all of which was and is well known to the defendants herein;" that defendant Knox recovered judgment against Bray, caused an execution to be issued, and levied on said land as the property of Bray, and is about to have the same sold, as in this opinion heretofore stated; and that said sale will cast a cloud upon plaintiff's title, and greatly damage and impair the value thereof. It is not necessary to definitely determine whether this complaint is so totally defective in its statement of a cause of action as to be bad on general demurrer, or whether it merely presents a case of defective averments, assailable only on special demurrer; because defendant, in addition to his answer in which the averments of the complaint are denied, filed a cross-complaint in which he asked for affirmative relief, and in which he averred specifically the very facts which he contends should have been averred in the complaint of plaintiff. In his cross-complaint he avers that on said July 12, 1883, and for a long time prior thereto, the said Bray was the owner in fee and in possession of said land; that on said day he conveyed the same by deed to plaintiff, who is his daughter; that the deed was voluntary and without consideration; that plaintiff holds under said deed, and not otherwise; and that the deed was made to hinder and delay creditors, and particularly defendant. He prays that the deed be declared fraudulent and void, and that he be allowed to proceed with the execution. To this cross-complaint plaintiff filed an answer, in which she admitted said deed from Bray, and that she held under it, but denied that it was voluntary, or without consideration, or fraudulent, and averred the consideration of marriage, and the facts concerning said marriage, as heretofore stated. Upon these pleadings the case went to trial; and it would be a vain thing to reverse the judgment, and allow plaintiff to amend her complaint by averring facts already averred in the cross-complaint, and to again in that form present issues which have already been raised and determined. The appellant made no objection to the introduction by plaintiff of the said deed to her from Bray; and the issue of the validity of said deed, raised by the cross-complaint and answer to it, was the one issue tried; and therefore, if it be conceded that the complaint failed to state sufficient facts, such failure was cured by the statement of the omitted facts in the other pleadings, which present a case of "express aider." And the fact that there was a demurrer does not take it out of the rule. There was a demurrer in Schenck v. Insurance Co., 71 Cal. 28, 11 Pac. Rep. 807; but the court held there that the omission of a material fact in the complaint was cured by its averment in the answer. That case, in principle, cannot be distinguished from the case at bar. See, also, Pom. Rem. § 579. Many cases to the same point are cited by counsel for respondent.

3. We see nothing in the point that an ante-nuptial contract must be in writing. No question arises here as to the enforcement of a verbal contract which ought to have been in writing. There are no other points necessary to be specially noticed. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

DORRIS V. SULLIVAN. (No. 13,959.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 18, 1891.)

EASEMENT BY VERBAL AGREEMENT—PARTIAL PERFORMANCE.

1. Plaintiff purchased the right to build a ditch across certain land from the owner, but before its construction the latter conveyed to defendant. Held, in an action to enjoin the latter from using a portion of the water of said ditch, that a verbal agreement between plaintiff and the original owner, whereby the latter was entitled to a perpetual easement in a portion of such water, was within the statute of frauds, and evidence thereof was incompetent.

2. The fact that plaintiff had partly performed such agreement cannot avail defendant as a defense, unless he pleads facts sufficient to entitle him to specific performance thereof.

3. Such owner testified that by the verbal agreement he was to receive 20 inches of water, and pay $300 therefor; that, as the ditch built by plaintiff brought the water from a nearer stream than that agreed upon, he paid him only $175; but that he claimed and conveyed to defendant a ratable proportion of the water in such ditch. Defendant testified that he understood at the time of the conveyance that the owner could not sell or assign any right to the water without a settlement with plaintiff. No such settlement was ever had, and neither defendant nor the original owner ever offered to pay the balance of the purchase money. The evidence also failed to show any legal assignment to defendant of the original owner's alleged contract with plaintiff. Held insufficient to entitle defendant to specific performance.

4. Where, under such circumstances, it does not appear that plaintiff is not able fully to perform the contract on his part, defendant cannot enforce a specific part performance.

5. The instrument under which defendant claimed purported to convey to him all the original owner's right and interest in said ditch, without alluding to any contract by which he claimed such interest. Held insufficient to show any legal assignment of the original owner's alleged contract with plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. F. HARRIS, Judge.

Action for an injunction and damages by C. G. Dorris against John Sullivan. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Spencer & Raker and C. A. Raker, for appellant. J. D. Goodwin and Jenks & Claflin, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover damages for the diversion of water by the defendant from plaintiff's water ditch, and to perpetually enjoin the defendant from diverting water from said ditch in the future. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. Plaintiff's ditch was completely constructed in 1887, and ran through the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, and E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, of section 7, township 42 N., of range 13 E., owned by F. S. Chapman. Before the construction of the ditch, Chapman, on June 1, 1885, by an instrument in writing, granted to plaintiff, "for value received," the right of way for the ditch through this land. Thereafter, on December 7, 1885, before the ditch was constructed to or upon this land, Chapman conveyed the land and appurtenances to the defendant. On the following day, December 8, 1885, Chapman executed to defendant an instrument in writing, purporting to sell, assign, and convey to defendant all his (Chapman's) "right, title, and interest" in the ditch, (describing it as then being constructed by C. G. Dorris,) "which interest is the right to have twelve inches of water flow through said ditch to and upon said ranch, and there to be used by me for irrigation and domestic purposes as I may require; and I do hereby authorize the said John Sullivan, [defendant,] in his own name, to demand, use, and in all proper and legal manner maintain and exercise, the said right to the use of said water as it flows through and over said ranch belonging to me." The ditch was not extended to the Chapman land until 1887. The answer of the defendant denies that plaintiff owns the right of way through said land, and "denies that defendant, at the commencement of this action, or at any time, unlawfully kept or maintained, or either, any cut or flume in said ditch, or either, or threatens or intends to forcibly or unlawfully, or either, keep or maintain any cut in said ditch in the future, or at any time, or threatens or intends, or either, to deprive plaintiff of the use or benefit, or either, of said water ditch, or of the water thereof, (except so much as belongs to defendant,) or either, or continuously or permanently, or at all.

* * * Denies that defendant has no interest in or right to said water ditch, or either, or that defendant has no right to or interest in the waters of said ditch, or either. Denies that defendant has no right to take any portion of the waters flowing therein." The answer contains nothing except the foregoing denials and parenthetical statement, indicating that defendant owns any portion of the ditch, or is entitled to divert any water therefrom. It does not allude to any right to, or interest therein, derived from Chapman.

On the trial, after plaintiff had proved a prima facie case against him, the defendant offered in evidence the above instrument of December 8, 1885, executed by Chapman to him, purporting to grant and assign all Chapman's right, title, and interest in and to the ditch, and to the use of the water flowing therein. To this plaintiff's counsel objected, on the grounds that it was not relevant to any issue made by the pleadings, and that it did not appear that Chapman had any title or interest in the ditch or water. The court overruled the objection, and plaintiff's counsel excepted, and the instrument was admitted. As evidence of Chapman's interest in the ditch and water, defendant offered Chapman's deposition as to an oral agreement between Chapman and plaintiff, under which Chapman claimed whatever right he had to the ditch or water. Plaintiff's counsel objected to the deposition on the grounds (1) that the agreement was irrelevant; (2) that the agreement was not in writing; and (3) that it does not relate to the ditch described in the complaint. The court overruled the objections, and plaintiff's counsel excepted. After the deposition was read, plaintiff's counsel moved to strike it out on the grounds last stated; and the court overruled the motion, to which ruling an exception was taken. So far as it relates to the agreement between Chapman and plaintiff, the deposition is as follows: "Question. Did you ever enter into an oral contract with said Dorris for an interest in the waters of the Pitt-River ditch? Answer. I did. Q. State, as near as you can, the time when said agreement was made, and as fully as you can the terms of the same. A. About the month of February, 1885, Mr. Dorris came to my office, and stated he wanted to bring in the water of Parker creek in a ditch to use on land situated on North Fork of Pitt river, on the north side of the river. He stated he wanted assistance to carry the water across Pitt river in a flume. I told Dorris that I wanted water to irrigate my ranch; about twenty inches, measured under a four-inch pressure; and I asked him how much per inch he would charge me for the same. He [Dorris] stated that he would charge me $15 per inch. I accepted his offer at that price. Dorris then went to work constructing the flume across Pitt river, hired men to work, etc., and I paid the bills of the hired men, provisions, and lumber to the extent of $175 or thereabouts. It was distinctly understood between Dorris and myself that any advances I might make in paying for labor and materials in constructing the ditch should be applied by him [Dorris] in payment for my water. As an additional consideration, which I was to pay Dorris for my twenty inches of water, was the right of way across my land for his ditch." On cross-examination: "Q. State if you ever had any conversation with the plaintiff, C. G. Dorris, with reference to the use of water from Pitt-River ditch, for irrigation on the land formerly claimed by you. * * * If so, state what it was in full, and what you did. A. I did. Q. Did you ever have any agreement with said Dorris about having water from said Pitt-River ditch for irrigation? If so, was said agreement ever reduced to writing? A. I did. No. Q. If you were to have any water from said Pitt-River ditch at any time, state upon what conditions you were to have it. What were you to do, if anything, before you could have water to irrigate the land? State in full. A. I was to pay $15 an inch, measured under a four-inch pressure, to the extent of twenty inches; and also give Dorris right of way across my land for his ditch. Q. Now, tell what you did to fulfill each and all of those conditions. A. I paid $175, and gave him the right of way across my land. Q. Is it not a fact that you refused to have anything to do with the construction of the said ditch, and refused to pay anything towards the completion of such ditch, and used words to this effect: That 'I had all I want of the business, and do not want any water from the ditch, and do not want anything further to do with it, and do not intend to comply with any agreement in the premises,' to the plaintiff, C. G. Dorris, in the town of Alturas, Modoc county, near the Goose Brewery building, on or about the 1st day of June, 1885? A. I did not. No. Q. State if you did not have a similar conversation with John A. Free, of the same place, about the same time, and that you told him about the same, as above set out, as being said to said Dorris. A. No. Free presented an order from Dorris, I think, for hauling lumber. I refused to pay it until I saw Dorris. Q. Did you not refuse to pay an order on you from C. G. Dorris and in favor of said Free, for the reason you had nothing more to do with the matter, and did not intend to go any further in complying with your agreement with said Dorris, with reference to your getting water from said ditch for said land? How much were you to give said Dorris for water from said ditch to irrigate said land? State in full. A. No; I was to give $15 per inch to the extent of twenty inches and right of way across my land. Q. How much did you pay him? And why did you not pay him the agreed price? State in full. A. I paid him about $175. He [Dorris] failed to get the water across the river, and I did not propose to advance the balance until he performed his part. Q. From what stream did the water come that was to be turned into said Pitt-River ditch? A. Parker creek. Q. What disposition, if any, did you make of said land, and to whom, and when? A. I sold to John Sullivan in February, 1886. Q. Had said Pitt-River ditch been completed when you disposed of said land to John Sullivan? If so, how long before? A. It had not. Q. Did you ever turn any water from said ditch on the said land at any time? If yes, how much? A. No. Q. Had there ever been any water turned in said ditch when you disposed of said land to John Sullivan? A. No. Q. How much water was you to get, and what to pay for it, if anything? How much did you pay? State why you did not pay the full amount agreed upon between you and Dorris, if there was any such agreement. A. Dorris never performed his part of the contract. I was to get twenty inches of water, at $15 an inch. I paid about $175. Dorris failed to perform his part of the contract. Q. Did not the plaintiff, Dorris, come to you while you lived in Alturas, and about the last of May or the first of June, 1885, and request you to enter into writings with reference to your getting water to use from said Pitt river for said land, and you refused to sign any writing, and then declared you desired to have nothing further to do with the ditch and use of water on said land, and that you were through? A. No. Q. State whether you were not owing said Dorris at that time something over three hundred dollars on your verbal agreement with him with reference to getting water for said land, and that you failed to pay any of that amount for the reason that you were not going to comply with the agreement, if any. A. I did not owe Dorris anything until such time as he might furnish the water to me. I advanced about $175 to Dorris. The facts are stated in the foregoing answer."

The defendant, among other things, testified: "The reason I didn't get this deed of water the same time I got the deed to land was that Chapman was trying to get a settlement with Dorris that day, and I didn't get it. Chapman said he must have settlement with Dorris that day, and didn't get it. Chapman told me when he gave me the deed to land that he would have to have a settlement with Dorris to find out about the water, and the same before I got the deeds. I can't say whether Chapman ever had any settlement with Dorris before he gave me the deeds or not; both deeds had none that I knew of." Conceding that the testimony of Chapman was sufficiently definite to prove even a verbal contract, such contract must be construed to be a contract for 20 inches of water to be taken from plaintiff's ditch and used by Chapman for irrigating his ranch, perpetually, or as long as water should be conveyed through the ditch. Such a contract, if in writing, would have created a servitude upon, or an easement in, plaintiff's ditch property, (Civil Code, § 801, and by analogy, section 552; Washb. Easem. p. 379;) but such servitude or easement upon plaintiff's real property could not have been granted or created by a verbal contract.

It is claimed, however, that, as the verbal contract was partly performed by Chapman, he was entitled to enforce a specific performance thereof. In the first place, the defendant could not avail himself of this defense at the trial, without having affirmatively pleaded facts sufficient to entitle him to a specific performance, which he failed to do. Arguello v. Bours, 67 Cal. 450, 8 Pac. Rep. 49; Kentfield v. Hayes, 57 Cal. 411; Miller v. Fulton, 47 Cal. 147. In the second place, admitting the testimony of Chapman and defendant to be true, it does not prove facts sufficient to entitle defendant to a specific performance of any contract, even though the facts thus proved had been pleaded. The verbal contract was for 20 inches of water, at $15 per inch, amounting to $300. Chapman testified that he paid only about $175, and then refused to pay more because plaintiff had failed to perform his part of the contract,—failed to build the flume to convey the water from Parker creek across Pitt river, according to his first project, and the understanding when the contract was made; but, as plaintiff afterwards constructed a ditch conveying water from Pitt river to and across his land, Chapman claimed an interest in the ditch and water in proportion to what he had paid, and conveyed this interest to defendant. But it appears by the testimony of the defendant, which must be taken as absolutely true against him, that when Chapman conveyed the land he understood that he could not grant or assign any right to the water without a settlement with plaintiff; and defendant was never informed of any such settlement, nor was there any evidence of such settlement; but, on the contrary, plaintiff testified that no such settlement was ever made. There is no evidence that Chapman or the defendant ever offered or intended to pay the balance of the purchase money. Friren v. Castro, 58 Cal. 442. Nor does the evidence show any legal assignment of Chapman's alleged contract with plaintiff to the defendant. The instrument of December 8, 1885, only purports to convey Chapman's right and interest in the ditch, entitling him to 12 inches of water, without alluding to any contract by virtue of which he obtained or claimed such interest in the ditch, or such right to the water. By virtue of that instrument, the defendant claims an absolute legal right and title to the water which he has taken and intends to take from plaintiff's ditch in the future, and not a mere equitable right by virtue of an equitable assignment of Chapman's contract for the water. Since it does not appear that plaintiff is not able fully to perform the contract on his part, the defendant is not entitled to enforce a specific part performance by the plaintiff. In order to enforce specific performance at all, the defendant should have tendered full performance on his part, and asked full performance by the plaintiff, unless he made it appear that plaintiff was unable to perform some part of his contract.

It is suggested by respondent's counsel that the contract between plaintiff and Chapman may be regarded as an irrevocable license to Chapman to divert from plaintiff's ditch the quantity of water claimed, which, though granting no interest in the ditch or water flowing in it, by reason of the statute of frauds, would yet be a defense to the alleged trespass of cutting the ditch and diverting water therefrom. In answer to this, for the mere purpose of disposing of this appeal, it is only necessary to say that no license of any kind has been pleaded. Alford v. Barnum, 45 Cal. 483. But, as the cause must be remanded for a new trial, it is proper to say that this action is more than a mere action to recover damages for a past trespass. The complaint alleges, not only that the defendant broke and cut the bank of the ditch and put a box or flume therein, through which he diverted water from the ditch, and has forcibly maintained said cut and flume up to the commencement of the action, but further alleges "that said defendant threatens and intends to so forcibly maintain and keep said cut and flume in said ditch in the future, and thereby to deprive plaintiff of the use and benefit of said water ditch and of the waters thereof, continuously and permanently in future," etc. The prayer of the complaint is that defendant be perpetually enjoined from these threatened and intended future acts. As to this quoted averment of the complaint, the answer simply denies that defendant threatens or intends, unlawfully, to keep or maintain the cut in the ditch in the future, or to deprive the plaintiff of the use or benefit of the ditch, or of the water thereof, "except so much as belongs to defendant," continuously or permanently or at all. This is an admission that defendant threatens and intends to keep and maintain the cut and flume in the bank of plaintiff's ditch, and thereby deprive the plaintiff of the use of the ditch and water to an indefinite extent, "so much as belongs to the defendant." Under these pleadings, the principal issue to be tried relates to the permanent right of the defendant to continue to divert water from plaintiff's ditch in the future,—the right to a permanent easement in plaintiff's real ditch property,—and this was the issue actually tried, and to maintain which, on his part, the defendant was permitted to introduce in evidence the verbal contract between Chapman and the plaintiff. To admit a verbal contract, under the guise and name of a license, to prove a permanent easement in or servitude upon real property, would be to evade and defeat the statute of frauds. Browne, Frauds, §§ 22-30, 133. I think the trial court erred in admitting the deposition of Chapman as to the verbal contract between him and plaintiff, and that for this error the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial granted.

MURDOCK v. CLARKE et al. (No. 13,472.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1891.)

MORTGAGEE IN POSSESSION—ACCOUNTING.

1. A mortgagor, all of whose property was attached by creditors, agreed with the mortgagee, in consideration of his procuring a release of the attachments and of other advances, to place his business and property in the hands of an agent, who should manage it, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the mortgage debt and advances. It was agreed that the agent should be a person satisfactory to the mortgagor, and he was jointly selected by the parties. The mortgagor was to assist in the conduct of the business, which was to be carried on in the same manner as before. Held, that the agent was the representative of both parties, and that the mortgagees were not liable to the mortgagor for his mismanagement.

2. In such case, the mortgagees are held to the exercise of reasonable diligence in the management of the property mortgaged, and are not liable as trustees.

3. Where both the agent and the mortgagees kept their own cattle on the mortgaged land, along with the cattle of the mortgagor, the mortgagees were properly charged with a proportion of the running expenses, and with the value of the use of the land.

4. It being the duty of the mortgagor, under the agreement, to deliver all of the property, the mortgagees are not liable for failing to take possession of a saw-mill, in which the mortgagor had an interest.

5. In apportioning the expenses between the mortgagor and mortgagee, it was error to exclude taxes on the personal property from the deductions from the charges made against the mortgagor.

6. It not being necessary, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 454, to give an itemized account in the pleadings the findings, need not give the items of the account.

7. One who accepts a bill of sale purporting to transfer a certain number of cattle is not estopped thereby from denying that he actually received that number.

8. A conveyance of land to secure the payment of money, though the grantee is put in possession under an agreement for an accounting for the rents and profits, is only a mortgage, and does not pass the legal title.

9. Where the conclusions of the trial court as to the amount, necessity, or reasonableness of the expenditures rest on the weight of evidence, they are not reviewable on appeal, unless based upon some erroneous rule of law apparent on the record.

In bank. On rehearing. For former opinion, see 26 Pac. Rep. 601.

HARRISON, J. February 4, 1875, Adam Murdock borrowed from the defendant Clarke $8,500, for which he gave him his note, payable in one year after date, with interest at 1¼ per cent. per month, and as security for its payment made a deed to him of a tract of 330 acres of land, known as the "Beaver Creek Ranch," and assigned to him a swamp-land certificate of purchase of certain other lands known as the "Big Valley Ranch." These transfers were by instruments absolute in form, but Murdock continued to remain in possession of the property. Soon after this date, Clarke sold and assigned to his co-defendant, Cox, one-half of said note and security. Thereafter, viz., March 22, 1875, Murdock borrowed from Clarke and Cox the further sum of $5,000, and gave them his promissory note therefor. At this time Murdock's property, including the lands aforesaid, and his cattle and other personal property, were under attachment, and he was anxious to obtain the loan in order to free his property therefrom. The defendants agreed to loan him the money, and make such advancements as might be needed to free the property, provided such arrangement could be made that they would be secure; and it was thereupon mutually agreed that the property should be placed in the possession of one J. B. Stanton, who should have the care and management of it, and should account therefor to the defendants, and that, when the defendants had been paid the amount of their loans and advances, it should be restored to Murdock. It was also a part of the arrangement that Murdock should remain upon the property, and assist Stanton in its management. Under this arrangement, Murdock, on the 10th of April, 1875, executed to the defendants a bill of sale of the property, and also of his interest in a saw-mill and other property connected therewith which he owned jointly with one Quinn. Thereafter the defendants advanced for his use the further sum of $3,176.45, for which he gave them his promissory note, bearing date April 11, 1875, and Stanton was placed in possession of the property, and continued to manage it until his death, in 1886, after which one Snell was placed in charge thereof. Murdock died in December, 1875, and the plaintiff, having been appointed administratrix of his estate in 1876, qualified as such in October, 1878, and soon after brought the present action against the defendants for an accounting. The cause was tried by the court; findings were filed February 18, 1889, upon which a decree was entered July 3, 1889, wherein it found an indebtedness to the defendants of $31,926.37, for which they held the property as security, and adjudged that the plaintiff should pay that sum within 30 days; otherwise that the said property should vest absolutely in the defendants. From this judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

1. The court found, in substance, that Stanton was selected and mutually agreed upon by Murdock and the defendants to be the agent of both parties, to take the possession and management of the property assigned to the defendants, and that his subsequent holding and management thereof was in the capacity of such agent for both parties. This question of Stanton's agency was treated by both parties at the trial as an issue in the case, and considerable evidence in reference thereto was offered by each party without objection from the other. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff is not at liberty to urge here that by the answer of the defendants no such issue was before the court below. King v. Davis, 34 Cal. 100. The appellant, however, contends that this finding is not sustained by the evidence, and a very considerable portion of the briefs on behalf of each party is devoted to a discussion of this question. Its importance is recognized, since the determination of the relation which Stanton bore to the respective parties to the transaction very materially determines the principles upon which the account should be taken. If Stanton was the representative of only the defendants, his acts in the management of the property became their acts, and they are accountable for any mismanagement or waste committed by him, as well as for the use which he made of the property for his individual account; whereas, if he was the agent of Murdock as well as of the defendants, the defendants would not be accountable to Murdock or to the plaintiff for any of his acts or conduct.

In view of the importance and bearing which this relation has to the correct decision of the case, we have given to the evidence upon this point very careful consideration, and are satisfied that it fully supports the conclusion reached by the court below. It is very likely that the importance of distinctly defining this relation, as shown by subsequent events, was not appreciated by either of the parties at the time that they were about to agree upon the person who should be selected to take possession of the property, and for that reason the testimony in reference thereto is somewhat meager; but a consideration of the relative situation of the parties, and the object which each had in view, as well as the evidence of their negotiations in reference to such selection, warrants the conclusion that it was their intention that the person to be selected was to be the mutual representative of them all. Murdock was greatly embarrassed with debt. His property was all under attachment, at the instance of some of his other creditors. The defendants held his real estate as security for his indebtedness to them. Unless Murdock could get additional money with which to remove the attachments, he felt that his property would be sacrificed. If he could obtain this money, he thought that in a few months he would be able to settle his whole difficulty. The defendants were willing to accommodate him, if they could be secured, but they knew that the personal property would be no security to them if Murdock was left in possession thereof. A plan was finally agreed upon by which the property should be put in the possession of Stanton, who was to carry on the business in the same way that Murdock had done, and account for its profits to the defendants until their indebtedness was paid. Murdock was to remain on the place, and assist Stanton in the conduct of the business as much as he could in every way. It is a significant circumstance that, when they came to the selection of the person who was to take this possession, it was to be some one who was to be satisfactory to Murdock, and that Stanton was jointly selected as the person who was to manage and control the property. If it had been the intention of the parties that the defendants were to take possession and manage and control the property, there would have been no occasion for them to consult Murdock about the person who should have been put in charge, or to agree that Murdock should remain on the place and assist him. The defendants would in that case have selected their own agent, and the relation of the parties would have been that of pledgor and pledgee, with the strict responsibility and rights of each. We think that it fully appears from the record that the only purpose in the mind of either Murdock or the defendants was that, while accommodating him with the loan, they should be secured against any loss of the security at the instance of his other creditors, and that it was not the intention of either party that Murdock should lose the control of his business, or that the defendants should assume the responsibility of its management. Murdock himself was anxious to keep the business alive, and it would have been inconsistent with the purpose of both parties to hold that it was either the intention of Murdock to give to the defendants the possession and management of the stock-raising, or of them to assume it. Hence the selection of Stanton was made by their mutual consent, and the duties assumed by him were for the benefit of both. He was to manage the property for the benefit of Murdock, and in the manner in which Murdock had previously carried on the business, so that from the proceeds thereof Murdock's indebtedness to the defendants could be paid; and he was to hold the property, in order that in their security for this indebtedness the defendants might not be prejudiced. His relation to the property, and to the parties, resembled that of a trustee in a deed of trust, where the debtor transfers his property to a third person mutually agreed upon between them, to hold and pay the income thereof to his creditor. In such case the person agreed upon is regarded as a trustee for both parties.

These are some of the considerations which could have been addressed to the court below upon the evidence before it, and which we may assume influenced it in making the finding referred to. It is needless to mention the established rule that the sufficiency of the considerations, as well as the evidence upon which they are based, is addressed entirely to that court. It was proper for the plaintiff to call upon that court to re-examine their sufficiency in her application for a new trial, but, after the court had upon such examination declined to set aside its action, this court will not review its determination. The relation which Stanton bore to the property, so far as the liability of the defendants for his acts is concerned, was fixed at the time of his selection, and as between them nothing was afterwards done which changed this relation. The death of Murdock within the year doubtless materially affected the early closing of the trust, but it did not change the position which Stanton bore to the property, or his relation to the defendants. The court having determined that Stanton was the representative of Murdock, as well as of the defendants, in the management of the property, it follows that the respondents are not accountable for any of the acts of Stanton, or for any of the waste or mismanagement which is charged upon him by the plaintiff.

2. The appellant has also excepted to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court in regard to their expenditures in the management of the property since its assignment to the defendants, and has also objected to the findings themselves upon this point as not being sufficiently explicit, contending that the findings should be in reality an itemized statement of the account, rather than a summary of the transactions. It was not necessary for the findings to give the items of the account. It is not necessary in pleadings to give an itemized account, (Code Civil Proc. § 454,) and a finding which follows the pleading is sufficient. In this, as in other cases, it is sufficient to find the ultimate facts, or secondary facts, from which the ultimate fact necessarily follows.

The objections made by the appellant to the character amount, and necessity of the various expenditures incurred in the care and management of the property are matters that were properly presented to the court below, as well upon the motion for a new trial as upon the original trial of the case. Unless that court has made its determination upon some erroneous rule, or in violation of some established principle of law which is apparent from the record, we cannot review its action in these respects. In all matters in which its conclusion rests upon the weight of evidence, the necessity or amount or reasonableness of the expenditure, such conclusion is not reviewable by this court. If the court had found that a certain amount of expenditure had been made for any specific purpose, and the evidence fails to show that that amount of money has been expended for any purpose, it would be a sufficient reason for us to set aside the finding; but when, as in the present case, the finding is challenged only in general terms, and not specifically, and the objections are addressed to the necessity or reasonableness of the expenditure, rather than to its amount, we must accept the finding as correct. The action of the court below is presumed to be correct, and upon an appeal therefrom it is incumbent upon counsel to point out the error. This, in a case like the present, where an account has extended over many years, can be done only by taking the account as a whole, rather than selecting individual items, and expecting this court to examine the entire record for the purpose of determining whether, in connection with the result as finally ascertained, those items have been properly allowed.

3. In apportioning between the defendants and the plaintiff the expenses of keeping the cattle, the court adopted as a rule that "one-third of said expenses, including the wages of Stanton and Snell, but excluding the expenses of marketing said cattle, and taxes, should be deducted from the charge made against the Murdock estate." The court erred in not holding that one-third of the taxes upon the cattle should be deducted from the charge made against the Murdock estate. This error is so manifest that it is practically conceded by counsel for the respondents in saying that the insertion of the words "and taxes" in the finding was inadvertent. They also state in their brief that in fact the court did, in stating the account, deduct these taxes from the charge against the Murdock estate. We cannot, however, assume that such deduction was made, since in the same finding the amounts found to have been expended by the defendants upon said property are declared to be found "upon the principle of this finding." It is not necessary, however, to reverse the entire case for this error. The court below can take the proofs, upon this point, and, having ascertained the amount of taxes thus chargeable to the defendants, make the appropriate correction in the amount found due to them. If, upon taking such proofs, it shall appear to the court that the deduction has been made in the account already taken and stated, no change will be needed.

4. In finding 14 the court finds that between April, 1875, and January, 1876, the defendants advanced to Murdock the sum of $1,268.80, in addition to the amounts embraced in the three notes. The amount thus found to have been advanced is distinct from the amount found to have been expended in the care and management of the property, and cannot be upheld by an attempt to consolidate the whole amount of the moneys paid by the defendants, but must find support in the evidence pointed directly at the objects for which the court finds that the advances were made. We have examined the record with reference to this finding, and have not been able to find therein, nor have counsel pointed out to us, evidence in support of this finding of payments beyond the sum of $353.10, that are not included in the other findings. The finding is based upon the averment in the answer that the defendants expended the sum of $1,021 "in purchasing cattle belonging to said Adam Murdock at execution sales against him, and in releasing property of the same kind from attachments." There is no evidence in the record showing that any portion of this amount was paid by the defendants; and Cox, in his testimony, states that of this amount the sum of $600 was sent to Stanton for the purpose of releasing the attachments, and should not have been included therein, as it was covered by one of the notes. It was shown that Stanton paid the sum of $872.30 for releasing the attachments, of which he had received the aforesaid sum of $600, leaving the amount of $272.30, for which the defendants are entitled to be reimbursed. It also appears that Stanton paid for the defendants $80.80, for the expenses of organizing a swamp land district. This finding should therefore be corrected by substituting $353.10 for the sum of $1,268.80, named therein.

5. Upon many of the points presented by the appellant, the opinion of Mr. Commissioner HAYNE, rendered upon the former hearing of this appeal, (24 Pac. Rep. 272,) so correctly expresses the law applicable thereto that we incorporate into our opinion, and adopt his views thereon, as follows, viz.:

"(1) It is contended for the appellant that the defendants were trustees, and were therefore bound to account as such, and are held to the same strict responsibility in the management of the property committed to their care. It is true that mortgagees in possession are often spoken of as 'trustees.' But they are only so in a limited sense. Ten Eyck v. Craig, 62 N. Y. 422; Clark v. Sibley, 13 Mete. (Mass.) 213; Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Jac. & W. 184; 1 Hil. Mortg. 391. As remarked by SHAW, C. J., in reasoning to a somewhat different point: 'In some very limited respects, a mortgagee is a trustee; as when he has entered and is in the receipt of the rents and profits, he is liable to account therefor, and in that respect may be denominated a trustee.' King v. Insurance Co., 7 Cush. 7. That they are bound to account for the rents and profits is a matter of course. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. (13th Ed.) § 1016a; Raun v. Reynolds, 15 Cal. 471. And we think that the rule as to trustees in general, viz., that their accounts should be clear and accurate, and that all obscurities and doubts should be resolved against them, (2 Perry, Trusts, 4th Ed. § 821,) applies here. But the accounting is not to be extended to imaginary profits. Where no negligence or improper conduct is alleged, a mortgagee in possession is chargeable with what he has actually received, and no more. Benham v. Rowe, 2 Cal. 407. In this case negligence and improper conduct are charged, and various claims are based thereon. It is therefore necessary to consider what was the degree of care required of the defendants. Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, stated the rule as follows: 'If the mortgagee obtains possession of the mortgaged premises before foreclosure, he will be accountable for the actual receipts of the net rents and profits, and nothing more, unless they were reduced or lost by his willful default or gross negligence. By taking possession, he imposes upon himself the duty of a provident owner; and he is bound to recover what such an owner would, with reasonable diligence, have received.' 4 Kent, Comm. 166. This statement of the rule has found its way into the decisions of the courts and the treatises of text-writers, (see Hidden v. Jordan, 28 Cal. 309; Moshier v. Norton, 100 Ill. 68,) and a similar passage was quoted from a modern text-writer on the former appeal of this case, (59 Cal. 694;) but it cannot be determined from the opinion whether the court meant to establish a rule or not. But, if the term 'gross negligence' is to be taken in its ordinary sense, viz., as denoting the absence of slight care, (see Shear, & R. Neg., 4th Ed., § 49,) it is manifest that the passage quoted is somewhat inconsistent; for if the mortgagee, by taking possession, 'imposes upon himself the duty of a provident owner, and is bound to recover what such an owner would, with reasonable diligence, have received,' it is evident that he is bound to something more than slight care, and is responsible for something less than gross negligence. What we think the passage means, when taken as a whole, is that the mortgagee in possession is bound to exercise reasonable care, and is responsible for the want thereof. This was the construction given to similar language by a comparatively recent case in Alabama. The court said: 'On a bill to redeem, a mortgagee in possession will not be held accountable for anything more than the rents actually received, unless there has been willful default or gross negligence, which, in such case, is the measure of reasonable diligence.' Gresham v. Ware, 79 Ala. 199. That reasonable diligence is required is laid down in several cases. Shæffer v. Chambers, 6 N. J. Eq. 548; Strong v. Blanchard, 4 Allen, 543, 544; Scruggs v. Railroad Co., 108 U. S. 375, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 780. It seems plain, upon principle, that the mortgagee in possession is bound to something more than slight care. And we think that Chancellor Kent, and the courts and writers who adopted his language, meant to say that reasonable care was required. Applying this rule to the case before us, we think that the evidence shows, without material contradiction, that, while there were some errors of judgment, the general management of the property was what was required. Especially does this appear when it is considered that it was agreed that the ranches were to be run as they had been by the mortgagor. This does not mean that, if the mortgagor was negligent as to any matter, the mortgagees should be so too, but that the management of the mortgagees should be on the same general lines as that of the mortgagor; and, as above stated, we think it was.

"(2) Much argument is based upon the undoubted fact that both Stanton and the defendants kept their own cattle upon the ranches, not separate from the Murdock cattle, but together with them. This was certainly wrong. But it was settled on the former appeal that it made them liable for a proportion of the running expenses, (59 Cal. 695, 696;) and, in addition to this, the court below allowed the value of the use of the land. This, we think, was all that could properly be charged against the defendants on this account. In addition to the cattle, the defendants sent some horses to the property. This was because the horses were needed for ranch work, and they were used for that purpose. This was for the benefit of the property, and nothing can be charged against the defendants by reason thereof. Similar remarks apply to the stallion. He was useful as a work-horse and for breeding the ranch mares. The money made from outside parties during the breeding season belonged to the defendants.

"(3) Part of the property mentioned in the bill of sale was a half interest in a portable saw-mill located upon public land, and owned by Murdock in partnership with one Quinn. No profits were ever made from this mill, and it does not clearly appear what finally became of it. It was moved once while Quinn was in control. Afterwards it was moved again, and it seems that one Harris 'took it.' The court below found that the defendants never had possession, and the evidence leads us to the same conclusion. The defendants incurred no liability to Murdock or his estate, by not taking possession; for it was as much his duty to deliver it to them as theirs to receive it, and there is nothing to show that he tendered it. Even if the defendants be considered as having been in possession, we cannot say that there was a want of reasonable care on their part. Quinn was allowed, with the acquiescence of Murdock, to run it, as he had been previous to the bill of sale. After Murdock's death Quinn was the surviving partner, with authority to settle up the affairs and dispose of the property. He is the person who is accountable to the plaintiff in relation to the matter. The defendants are not bound to litigate with him for the benefit of the estate.

"(4) A point is made in relation to the number of cattle received by the defendants with the ranches. The bill of sale purports to transfer 1,322 head, and it is argued that its acceptance estopped the defendants from denying that they received that number. There is no force in this suggestion. After the bill of sale was signed, it was Murdock's duty to deliver the cattle in accordance therewith. If he did not perform this duty to its full extent, the defendants were certainly at liberty to prove the fact."

We have also reached the same conclusion that was reached by the commissioner regarding the error in the decree, as well as his reasons therefor, viz.:

"There is also a radical error in the decree. The court adjudged, in effect, that the legal title passed to the defendants, and it gave to the plaintiff a certain time in which to redeem, failing which, the property was to vest absolutely in the defendants. But, as it is admitted that the conveyances were intended only to secure the payment of money, they were mere mortgages, and did not pass the legal title. 'It is the settled rule in this state that, if a deed absolute in form was made merely to secure an indebtedness (to the grantee,) it is a mere mortgage, and does not pass the title.' Smith v. Smith, 80 Cal. 325, 21 Pac. Rep. 4, and 22 Pac. Rep. 186, 549. See, also, Hall v. Arnott, 80 Cal. 352, 22 Pac. Rep. 200; Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 275, 17 Pac. Rep. 225; Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 309, 13 Pac. Rep. 866; Healy v. O'Brien, 66 Cal. 519, 6 Pac. Rep. 386; Taylor v. McLain, 64 Cal. 514, 2 Pac. Rep. 399. And the fact that the mortgagees were put in possession does not change the rule. As was said in Smith v. Smith, above cited, 'such a deed gives a mere lien upon the property, just as if the parties had put their agreement in the form of a mortgage;' and it has been decided that,

In this state, the interest of the mortgagee is not enlarged or affected by the fact that he is in possession under the mortgage. Dutton v. Warschauer, 21 Cal. 609. The legal title, therefore, remained in Murdock, and vested in his heirs, and is not in the defendants; and the court below was not authorized to decree that it should vest absolutely in the defendants upon the failure of the plaintiff to pay what was due within a certain time. The defendants, however, have a right to retain possession until the sums due to them have been paid; and, even if they have not, the court has power to impose proper conditions upon the plaintiff. Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 311, 13 Pac. Rep. 866; Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271, 17 Pac. Rep. 225; De Cazara v. Orena, 80 Cal. 134, 22 Pac. Rep. 74. And the answer prays that the property be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the debt. The decree, therefore, ought to have provided that, in case of the failure of the plaintiff to pay what was due within the specified time, the property should be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of whatever is due to the defendants."

The order denying a new trial is affirmed; but the court below is directed to modify the judgment, in conformity with the foregoing opinion, by deducting therefrom the sum of $915.70, with proper allowance for interest, the same being the difference between $353.10 and the sum of $1,268.80, found to have been advanced by the defendants between April 14, 1875, and January 1, 1876, in addition to the amount of the three promissory notes; and to further modify the judgment to such extent that one-third of the amount of taxes paid by the defendants upon the personal property after November 1, 1877, shall be deducted from the expenses incurred in the management of the estate; and, for the purpose of ascertaining this fact, the court is directed to take such testimony relative thereto as may be offered by the respective parties. The judgment is further modified by striking therefrom the following clause, viz.: "And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that, if the plaintiff fails, neglects, or refuses to pay said sum found due the defendants, as aforesaid, on or before the expiration of said 30 days, then, and in that event, said property, real and personal, and all the right, title, and interest of the plaintiff as administratrix of the estate of Adam Murdock, deceased, and all the right, title, and interest which the estate of Adam Clarke, deceased, has or had in or to said property and every part thereof, shall vest absolutely in the defendants, and shall forever thereafter be the property of the defendants, discharged and released from all claims or demands on the part of the plaintiff, or on the part of the estate of said Adam Murdock, deceased." And the court is directed to insert in the judgment, in lieu of the clause so stricken out, a direction to the effect that in case the plaintiff shall fail to make the redemption provided for in said judgment, the said property, held by the defendants as security, shall be sold for the purpose of satisfying the amount of said judgment, with such terms and provisions included in said judgment as are proper for a sale under a decree for the foreclosure of a mortgage; and, as thus modified, the judgment shall stand affirmed.

EASTON v. MONTGOMERY et al. (No. 13,-258.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1891.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—CONTRACT OF SALE—ABSTRACT OF TITLE—WHEN DEED TO BE DELIVERED—DEFECTIVE TITLE—FRAUD.

1. A contract for the sale of land which provides "title to prove good or no sale," without specifying the time within which the examination is to be made, implies a reasonable time.

2. Where the agreement does not provide that the vendor shall furnish the abstract, it is incumbent upon the vendee to provide it, to ascertain the condition of the title.

3. Where a title is defective, the vendee is obliged to point out the defect to the vendor, and give a reasonable time to perfect the same, before bringing an action to recover a deposit.

4. In an action by the vendee to recover a deposit upon the ground that the title is defective, he is limited to the defects pointed out.

5. A contract for the sale of land provided that the agents of the vendor "are authorized to return the deposit if the title is defective." Held, the fact that the vendor's title was defective at the date of the contract does not give a right of action to recover the deposit without notice of the defect to the vendor.

6. Where one holds a contract for a deed, and pays a part of the purchase price, he may make a valid agreement for the sale of the land, the deed to be delivered by him thereafter.

7. Where the agent acting for the vendee had full knowledge of the condition of the vendor's title before making the contract, the fact that he failed to inform the vendee does not constitute fraud on the part of the vendor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

Action by George Easton against Montgomery and others to rescind a contract and recover a deposit. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for appellants. Van Ness & Roche, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. During the month of August, 1887, there was great excitement in the real-estate market in the county of Santa Clara, popularly known as a "boom." This excitement subsided at about the end of that month, and thereafter it became much more difficult to sell real estate in that county. During this period, viz., August 15, 1887, one A. H. Albers, who was the owner of the tract of land described in the instrument hereinafter set forth, made a contract with the defendants, Montgomery and Rea, for the sale of the tract to them for the sum of $29,000, of which they paid him $1,000 as a part payment, and were to pay the remainder on or before January 1, 1888. Montgomery and Rea were real-estate brokers, and were acting in this matter as the agents of the defendant, Chase, and the money which they then paid to Albers as part payment upon said purchase had been previously placed in their hands by

Chase for the purpose of investing in real estate as a speculation. They took the contract in their own names for the reason that it was uncertain whether Chase would approve the purchase. Chase, however, did approve the purchase as soon as informed thereof, and prior to the 20th day of August. On the 20th day of August, 1887, one Lawrence, as the agent of the plaintiff, and acting in his behalf, entered into negotiations with Montgomery and Rea for the purchase of this tract of land, and, after being informed of the nature of the interest therein held by Chase, agreed with them upon the terms of purchase, and thereafter, upon the same day, in pursuance of said agreement, the plaintiff paid to Montgomery and Rea the sum of $500, and received from them the following instrument: "Received, San Jose, August 20, 1887, from Geo. Easton, by Lawrence, the sum of ($500) five hundred dollars, in gold coin, being a deposit and part payment on account of bargain and sale made to h . . this day, to a certain lot, tract, or parcel of land, lying, situate, and being in the county of Santa Clara, state of California, and bounded and described as follows: Being 187 acres, known as 'Albers' Place,' situate on Albers' road, bounded on the east by Albers' road, and on the south by Storey road; said farm having been sold to said Easton this day for the sum of ($46,750) forty-six thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, in gold coin, the balance to be paid as follows: Forty-five hundred dollars on or before Monday, August 22d, at one o'clock P. M.; one-third of purchase price within thirty days; and balance on or before two years, at 7 per cent. from date, or this deposit to be forfeited without recourse. Title to prove good or no sale, and this deposit to be returned. The said deposit is to remain in the hands of Montgomery and Rea, the agents making this sale, until the title passes. And they are authorized to return the same to the buyer if the title is defective. C. M. CHASE, by MONTGOMERY & REA, Real-Estate Agents." August 22, 1887, the plaintiff paid the sum of $4,500, named in the instrument to be paid on that day; and on September 19, 1887, he paid the further sum of $666.67, and delivered to Montgomery and Rea a note of Lawrence for $333.33, for which he received from them the following instrument: "San Jose, Sept. 19, 1887. $1,000. Received from Geo. Easton, by Lawrence and Lyons, one thousand dollars, in consideration of which the time for payment on the Rancho Coronado is extended thirty days. The above payment is on account of the purchase price. C. M. CHASE, by MONTGOMERY & REA." Thereafter the plaintiff commenced this action to recover from the defendants the amount of money so paid by him, and for a cancellation of the note of Lawrence. The transcript does not show the date at which action was commenced, but alleges that prior thereto, viz., September 28, 1887, he demanded from the defendants a return of the money and of the note, which was refused.

The instrument above set forth is not an agreement for the purchase of an option, but is a contract for the sale of lands.

Benson v. Shotwell, 87 Cal. 49, 25 Pac. Rep. 249. It is more in the nature of a memorandum to satisfy the statute of frauds than a contract embracing all the terms of the agreement between the parties. Being signed by Chase, it satisfies the statute of frauds so far as to be capable of enforcement against him, and its execution by him and delivery to the plaintiff is a sufficient consideration for the support of a promise on the part of the plaintiff to pay the money therein named as the price of the land. Cavanaugh v. Casselman, 26 Pac. Rep. 515. There is no mention in it of the time at which a conveyance of the land is to be made, or within which an examination of the title is to be had. Ordinarily, parties entering into an executory agreement for the purchase and sale of real estate make provision therein in these respects, specifying the time allowed for examination of the title; for furnishing abstract; making report of defects and objections, specifying the time within which the vendor may thereafter make his title good, and the character of the conveyance to be executed by him; but, in the haste attendant upon the excitement of a "boom," these formal provisions are frequently omitted, and the construction of the contract is left to implication or established rules.

It is evident from the provision inserted in the memorandum, "title to prove good or no sale, and this deposit to be returned," that it was contemplated by the parties that an examination of the title was to be made on behalf of the plaintiff, and that upon such examination it might be found defective. As no time was specified within which such examination should be made, a reasonable time therefor was implied. Allen v. Atkinson, 21 Mich. 351. The parties did not agree that the condition of the title should be ascertained from any particular abstract, or from an abstract to be furnished by Chase; and in this respect the case is distinguishable from Smith v. Taylor, 82 Cal. 533, 23 Pac. Rep. 217, and from Boas v. Farrington, 85 Cal. 535, 24 Pac. Rep. 787. The agreement being silent upon this point, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to provide the abstract, and to satisfy himself as to the condition of the title. Carr v. Roach, 2 Duer, 20; Espy v. Anderson, 14 Pa. St. 312. He was not at liberty, however, to pronounce the title defective without any examination or upon a partial examination. Having assumed to examine the title for the purpose of determining whether it was good, it was incumbent upon him to make a complete examination thereof. He could call upon the defendants for any information with reference thereto, and it then became their duty to furnish such information as they possessed. Benson v. Shotwell, supra. If, upon such examination, it appeared to him that the title was defective, it then became his duty to report to the vendor the particulars wherein such defects were claimed to exist, and in the absence of any time fixed by the agreement within which the vendor should remove these defects, or satisfy his objections, a reasonable time would be allowed therefor. More v. Smedburgh, 8 Paige, 600.

The burden is on the vendee to point out the defects in the title. Dwight v. Cutler, 3 Mich. 566. If the vendor fails within such time to remedy the defects thus pointed out, the purchaser, in any action to recover the purchase money or deposit paid by him, upon the ground that the title is defective, is limited to such defects as were then pointed out. 1 Chit. Cont. 434; Todd v. Hoggart, Moody & M. 128.

It does not appear whether the plaintiff caused any examination of the title to be made, except that Montgomery in his testimony says that in October, long after the demand for the return of the deposit, "we received a letter from Mr. Easton, and another one from his attorney, saying that the title was imperfect." There is no evidence in the record that the particulars in which the title was imperfect were called to the attention of the defendants, or that any demand was ever made upon Chase to remedy these defects prior to making the demand for the return of the deposit, or prior to the commencement of the action.

The plaintiff contends, however, that, inasmuch as at the date of the instrument Chase's title to the land was defective, the clause in the instrument, "and they are authorized to return the same to the buyer if the title is defective," gave him an immediate right of action to recover the deposit, which he can enforce at any time thereafter. This principle contended for by the plaintiff would be equally applicable to a title with any incumbrance or any defect, however slight, or however easily removed. We do not, however, construe this clause as conferring such right. In every executory contract for the sale of land there is an implied condition that the title of the vendor is good, and that he will transfer to the vendee by his deed of conveyance a title unincumbered and without defect. Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N. Y. 535; Pomeroy v. Drury, 14 Barb. 418; Inness v. Willis, 48 N. Y. Super. Ct. 192; Dwight v. Cutler, 3 Mich. 566; Warv. Abst. 293. The money left with Montgomery & Rea, by the plaintiff, as a deposit, was a part payment on account of the purchase by him of the land, and was not given upon the consideration that Chase then had a good title to the land purchased, but upon the consideration that the plaintiff would receive from him a good title thereto at the time when, by the terms of the agreement, he should be called upon to make a conveyance. The "defective" condition of the title referred to in the last clause of the instrument is "pointed only at incurable defects in the title, and not to such imperfections as are capable of being removed after the agreement is made, and while the title is under investigation." Stowell v. Robinson, 5 Scott, 211. "The object of this clause evidently is to avoid disputes about the title, and while it is being adjusted the purchaser keeps his money for other operations. The same with the vendor; he is enabled to find another purchaser if his first vendee is dissatisfied with the title." Brizzolara v. Mosher, 71 Ill. 41.

It is not necessary, however, that the vendor should be the absolute owner of the property at the time he enters into the agreement of sale. An equitable estate in land, or a right to become the owner of the land, is as much the subject of sale as is the land itself; and whenever one is so situated with reference to a tract of land that he can acquire the title thereto, either by the voluntary act of the parties holding the title, or by proceedings at law or in equity, he is in a position to make a valid agreement for the sale thereof. As was said by Mr. Justice PATERSON in Burks v. Davies, 85 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. Rep. 613: "If, though he be not the absolute owner, it is in his power, by the ordinary course of law or equity, to make himself such owner, he will be permitted within a reasonable time to do so." If the agreement is made by him in good faith, and he has at the time such an interest in the land, or is so situated with reference thereto, that he can carry into effect the agreement on his part at the time when he has agreed so to do, it will be upheld. 1 Chit. Cont. (11th Amer. Ed.) 431; Dresel v. Jordan, 104 Mass. 407; Townshend v. Goodfellow, 40 Minn. 312, 41 N. W. Rep. 1056; Smith v. Cansler, 83 Ky. 371; Gaither v. O'Doherty, (Ky.) 12 S. W. Rep. 306; Tapp v. Nock, Id. 713; Ley v. Huber, 3 Watts, 367; Tiernan v. Roland, 15 Pa. St. 429. We cannot lose sight of the proposition that in this country, where values of land fluctuate rapidly, and where transfers are so frequent, it is very common for the purchaser of land to make a transfer before he has acquired the title. It would work great injustice to hold that no one could make a valid contract for the sale of land until he has himself become clothed with the absolute title. Even in the present case it appears that the plaintiff, after the agreement for the purchase was made, placed the property on the market immediately after the first payment was made, and endeavored to sell the same prior to his obtaining the title thereto. He himself testifies: "I was trying all the time to make a trade of the property pending our getting a title to the property."

It has been held that when the vendor has no interest whatever in the lands which he agrees to convey, and his contract of sale is the mere speculation of a volunteer, courts will refuse to enforce the contract at his instance, and will rescind the agreement at the instance of the vendee, upon the ground that the contract was not made in good faith. The correctness of this rule in its application to a case wherein there is no charge of bad faith has, however, been seriously questioned, and was distinctly repudiated in Dresel v. Jordan, supra. It is held, also, that the vendee may maintain an action to rescind the agreement upon the ground that the vendor, at the time of entering into the agreement, knew that he could not make the conveyance, or fraudulently represented himself as the owner of the premises, (Inness v. Willis, supra;) and that if, subsequent to entering into the agreement, the vendor voluntarily puts it out of his power to complete the contract,—as if he should sell the land to another pending the existence of the agreement,—the vendee may treat the contract as rescinded, and bring his action for the deposit, (Burwell v. Jackson, supra.) In either of these cases the ground for the rescission is the fraud of the vendor, either at the time of entering into the contract, or by his subsequent acts.

There is no question, however, in the present case of fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the defendants. Montgomery informed Lawrence, who in making the purchase was acting for the plaintiff, of the exact condition of the title, and the relation which Chase bore to it. Whether Lawrence informed the plaintiff thereof is immaterial. The fact that Lawrence knew all about it before making the agreement removes all charge of fraud or concealment on the part of the defendants. The plaintiff, moreover, does not place his right of recovery upon the ground of fraud, but solely upon the fact that Chase did not have the title to the land at the date of the agreement. Chase, however, although not then holding the absolute title, did have an interest in the land sufficient to sustain an agreement on his part to sell the same. The plaintiff in an action therefor, with proper parties, could at any time have enforced a specific performance in his behalf of the contract with Chase. Chase had furnished the money with which Montgomery and Rea had paid Albers the deposit on the contract of sale. The purchase had been made in pursuance of previous directions from Chase to Montgomery and Rea, and, after the contract had been entered into, had been ratified by Chase. As between Chase on the one part, and Montgomery and Rea on the other, the interest acquired by that contract belonged to Chase, and in a proper action Albers could have been compelled to convey to Chase, as he afterwards did voluntarily so convey. Prior to making the contract with the plaintiff, Chase had authorized Montgomery and Rea, who were his agents, to sell the land; and in pursuance of such order, which was in writing and exhibited to Lawrence, they made the agreement with the plaintiff in the name of Chase. This was such an additional recognition by them of the interest of Chase in the land that Chase would be able to enforce any bona fide contract made by them in his behalf.

It is not necessary for us to decide whether by the terms of this agreement the title was to pass to the plaintiff prior to the payment of the last installment. The general rule, in the absence of special provisions in reference thereto, is that the vendee is not entitled to a conveyance until the full payment of the purchase money, and that, the acts of payment and conveyance being mutual and dependent, neither party is in default until after tender and demand by the other. In the present case we have seen that the right of rescission did not exist, and in any action upon the contract, either to enforce it, or to recover damages for its breach, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show a performance on his part of all the acts required to be performed by him before he could call upon Chase, and a subsequent failure on the part of Chase to comply with his part of the agreement. The plaintiff, not having alleged or proved such performance, is not in a position to maintain an action for the recovery of the money paid by him in part performance of his obligations, while the contract is still in existence and uncompleted. The judgment and order of the court below are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CASHMAN v. HARRISON. (No. 13,289.)¹

BILL OF EXCHANGE — EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT OF FUND—PRESENTMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. An instrument in the form of a bill of exchange was given by the drawer in settlement of his liability to the payee, and the drawer delivered certain property to the drawee for sale, with the understanding that the proceeds were to be applied on the bill. There was no agreement that the drawee should accept or pay the bill before sale, or that it should be wholly satisfied therefrom, or by payment of less than its face value. Held, that the instrument was a bill of exchange, and not an equitable assignment of the fund arising from the sale.

2. The fact that the drawer had no reason to believe the drawee would accept or pay the bill before the sale of the property excuses, as to the drawer, non-presentment for acceptance or payment and notice of dishonor, under Civil Code Cal. § 3220.

3. Where the consideration of a bill of exchange is in issue, evidence thereof is competent in rebuttal, and error in receiving it in chief, over the objection of incompetency, is harmless.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Action by James Cashman against C. H. Harrison on a bill of exchange. Trial to the court. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. F. Preston, for appellant H. McCrea and J. D. Sullivan, (Hepburn Wilkins, of counsel,) for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This action is by the payee against the drawer of a bill of exchange, of which the following is a copy: "$2,019.70. San Francisco, December 29, 1881. Pay to the order of James Cashman $2,019.70, gold coin of the United States, value received, and charge the same to account of C. H. HARRISON. To R. S. Howland, San Francisco. No." Of the defenses pleaded, two are alternately insisted upon here, viz.: (1) That the instrument was intended to effect merely an equitable assignment of a portion of a fund, and therefore is not what it purports to be; or (2) that, if it be considered and treated as a bill of exchange, there was no presentment of it to the drawee for payment, and no notice to the drawer of its dishonor. To excuse the non-presentment for payment, it was alleged in the complaint, and found by the court, "that the defendant at the time of drawing said bill as aforesaid, had no reason to believe that R. S. Howland, the drawee therein named, would accept or pay the same, and defendant at said time well knew that said drawee had no funds in his hands due or owing to defendant." The court also found that "the said bill was not intended as an assignment of a portion of any fund whatsoever," but that "said bill was executed by defendant in settlement of a liability to plaintiff theretofore incurred by defendant under a certain bond, and said liability existed in full force as a cause of action in plaintiff's behalf at the time of the execution of said bill by defendant as aforesaid." The judgment was for plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The facts and circumstances pertinent to the questions to be decided are substantially as follows: In February, 1881, one Tibbey chartered the plaintiff's schooner for a sealing voyage in the Northern Pacific. To secure the performance of the charter-party on the part of Tibbey, and for his accommodation, the defendant executed a bond to plaintiff in the penal sum of $6,250, but the defendant was not interested in the charter-party, nor in the sealing voyage. The schooner, after fishing for a season, sailed to Yokohama, Japan, with such cargo of skins as had been taken on the voyage, and there got into trouble and litigation. When news of her arrival in Yokohama, and of her trouble there, was received in San Francisco, Tibbey, to secure indemnity to the defendant for his liability on the bond to plaintiff, assigned to him the cargo of skins. While matters were in this condition, the plaintiff was demanding of defendant payment of about $3,100, which he claimed to be due him on the charter-party, and which Tibbey was unable to pay. Through the intervention and assistance of R. S. Howland, acting as the agent and adviser of plaintiff, a settlement was effected between plaintiff and defendant, the terms of which, as then executed, were (1) that plaintiff's demand was reduced to the sum of $2,019.70; (2) that defendant turned over to Howland his security for indemnity (the cargo of skins) to be disposed of and converted into money by the latter; and (3) that defendant drew on Howland the bill of exchange in suit for the sum of plaintiff's reduced demand, ($2,019.70.) This settlement was made with the consent of Tibbey. At the time of this settlement it was believed by all the parties concerned that the money product of the cargo would be even more than sufficient to pay the bill; but it was well known by plaintiff and defendant, at the time the bill was drawn, that defendant had no funds in the hands of Howland, and it was quite as well understood that Howland was not expected to accept or pay the bill until he should receive money for that purpose from the sale of the cargo, nor to pay a greater sum than he should thus receive. There appears to have been no agreement or understanding, however, that the bill should be wholly satisfied from the fund to be realized from the sale of the cargo, nor, in any event, by payment of less than the sum it called for. Howland, in his deposition, says: "It was understood that if sufficient funds came to me from the sale of that cargo it was to be paid to Cashman upon this instrument, (the bill,) to the amount named therein. * * * Harrison had no reason to believe that I would accept or pay said bill before the money came." Again he says: "I don't remember any other instrument executed at that time for the purpose of portioning the fund that was expected to be realized from the sale of the cargo of said schooner, nor did I understand that this instrument was for such purpose. I understood that the legal title to said cargo of said schooner, immediately prior to the execution of the bill of exchange, was in Harrison. The legal title to the cargo was vested in Harrison by the Tibbeys by their assignment of the same to him, to secure him for the liability he had incurred in their behalf by his bond given to Cashman. Harrison gave Cashman this paper or instrument to settle his liability to Cashman on account of this very bond for the payment of the charter money." The cargo of skins was finally sold in London, but after paying expenses, including expenses of litigation in Japan, Howland realized therefrom only $600, which was not received by him until some time after May, 1883; and when it was received the defendant took it out of his hands, so that no part of it was paid on the bill of exchange.

1. I think the bill was intended to be what it plainly purports to be, an inland bill of exchange, and that the finding that it "was not intended as an assignment of a portion of any fund whatsoever" is justified by the evidence. By turning over his indemnity security to Howland, Harrison intended merely to provide funds, then supposed to be sufficient, for the payment of the bill at such future time as those funds were expected to come into Howland's hands; thereby gaining time to realize upon his own security for indemnity. But the evidence fails to show that plaintiff agreed to rely solely upon that security, or that the bill of exchange should not have the legal effect of a bill of exchange. The substance of the transaction was—First, to settle and liquidate the amount of defendant's liability on his bond; and, second, to exchange securities for the payment thereof. The bill of exchange was given to secure the payment of the sum for which defendant was liable on his bond thus liquidated by the settlement. Had it been the intention of the parties that the bill was to operate only as an assignment of the fund to be realized from the cargo, and that it was to be wholly satisfied from that fund alone, it is difficult to conceive why, when the fund was received by Howland, the defendant should have thought himself entitled to demand and receive the whole of it, or why Howland should have complied with the demand. The taking of the money proceeds of the cargo out of the hands of Howland seems utterly inconsistent with the assignment theory, and can be rationally accounted for only upon the supposition that the defendant regarded the instrument as being what it purported to be; and, so regarding it, concluded as matter of law that his liability upon it had been discharged by want of timely presentment of it to the drawee, or notice of dishonor; and consequently that he was entitled to withdraw his funds from Howland.

The bill itself, before acceptance, has no tendency to prove the assignment, but the contrary. In Harris v. Clark, 3 N. Y. 118, the court, by RUGGLES, J., after reviewing the cases, said: "The principle appears to be firmly established that a bill of exchange does not of itself give to the holder, either at law or in equity, a lien upon the funds of the creditor in the hands of the debtor until after acceptance by the latter." To the same effect are Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat. 286, and Tiernan v. Jackson, 5 Pet. 580. In the well-considered case of Attorney General v. Insurance Co., 71 N. Y. 325, it was held that even a check upon a bank, which has funds of the drawer, does not operate as an assignment of the fund, unless the check specify the particular fund upon which it is drawn; and a like decision was rendered in Lunt v. Bank, 49 Barb. 221. In Bank v. Jauncey, 3 Sandf. 257, it was insisted by counsel that a bill of exchange drawn against a consignment of cotton, but without specifying the fund, was itself an equitable assignment by the drawer of the cotton or its proceeds. To this the court answered: "This is certainly carrying the doctrine of equitable assignment very far, and is, in our judgment, entirely unsupported by authority. In the cases cited by counsel, and in all the other cases where an order has been held to be an equitable assignment of a particular fund, the fund has been specified in the order, and the party giving the order has thereby divested himself of all right to control the fund purporting to be assigned. The form of the assignment is immaterial, but these two ingredients first named are essential. * * * A bill of exchange, however,—and the instrument in question is nothing more nor less,—differs from such an order. It must be payable at all events, and not out of a particular fund. If its payment is contingent, either with regard to the event or the fund out of which it is to be made, it is not a bill of exchange, but an order or assignment of a fund. The converse of this is also true, that, if the instrument be a bill of exchange, it is not an assignment of a fund."

2. Assuming, as we must, that the instrument is a bill of exchange payable immediately, as it purports to be, I think presentment thereof for acceptance or payment, and notice of dishonor, according to the general rule, were excused as to the defendant. Section 3220, Civil Code, provides: "Presentment of a bill of exchange for acceptance or payment and notice of dishonor are excused as to the drawer, * * * if, at the time of drawing, he had no reason to believe the drawee would accept or pay the same." See, also, Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 1073-1081 inclusive; Terry v. Parker, 1 Nev. & P. 752; Bank v. Hughes, 17 Wend. 94. The finding of the trial court that, at the time of drawing the bill, the defendant had no reason to believe that the drawee would accept or pay the same, is well supported by the evidence, and brings the case fairly within the Code exception to the general rule requiring presentment for acceptance or payment according to the tenor of the bill and notice of dishonor. To bring a case within this Code exception, it is not necessary, as contended by counsel for appellant, to prove fraud on the part of the drawer of the bill. The exception is based on the mere fact that the drawer, at the time of drawing the bill, "had no reason to believe the drawee would accept or pay the same;" and it is certainly possible that this fact may exist without fraud. It may be attributable to folly, or to a degree of negligence not at all evincive of fraud. Indeed, it is consistent with an ill-founded belief that the drawee would accept and pay the bill. Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 1073. Except for the purpose of proving want of consideration, fraud, accident, or mistake, which might nullify the instrument, parol evidence is inadmissible to vary or contradict a bill of exchange. "Therefore, if a bill or note be absolute upon its face, no evidence of a verbal agreement made at the same time, qualifying its terms, can be admitted." If the bill is payable on demand, "it cannot be shown by verbal testimony that it was agreed that it should not be paid * * * until the amount was collected from certain sources; nor until a certain draft was received; * * * nor that a note [or bill] in which no time for payment is expressed, and is therefore constructively payable on demand, was to be paid at a specified time; * * * nor that the liability of the drawer, maker, or other party was not to be enforced; * * * nor that it was to be paid out of a particular estate." Id. §§ 80, 81, and cases there cited. In this case there is no pretense of fraud on the part of the plaintiff or drawee, or that there was any accident or mistake affecting the express obligation of the drawee. The parol evidence introduced was admissible only for the purpose of proving the consideration or want of consideration for the bill, the timely presentment, demand, etc., or the excuse for not having made them. Id. § 81a.

But conceding, for the sake of the argument merely, that the parol evidence was competent to prove, and that it did prove, that the bill was payable only when Howland, at some future time, should receive from Japan or England the cash proceeds of the cargo of skins, yet, by withdrawing from Howland the whole cash proceeds of the cargo after they were received by him, the defendant committed a fraud by which he forfeited the right to require demand and notice. Id. § 1081. Besides, he thereby precluded any possible prejudice to himself by want of demand and notice. Said Lord DENMAN, in Terry v. Parker, supra: "The question is whether want of effects in the hands of the drawee excuses the holder of a bill of exchange from the necessity of presenting the bill for payment, as well as of giving notice of dishonor to the drawer. Many cases establish that notice of dishonor need not be given to the drawer in such a case, and the reason assigned is because he is in no respect prejudiced by want of such notice, having no remedy against any other party on the bill. This reason equally applies to want of presentment for payment, since, if the bill was presented and paid by the drawee, the drawer would become indebted to him in the amount, instead of being indebted to the holder of the bill, and would be in no way benefited by such presentment and payment." In Bank v. Hughes, supra, COWEN, J., said: "When the drawer has plainly suffered nothing, and can sustain no mischief for want of demand and notice, none need be made or given." Had the plaintiff demanded and received from Howland the full proceeds of the cargo, $600, that sum would have been credited on the bill. Had defendant, after withdrawing the $600 from Howland, paid it to plaintiff, the result would have been the same. Is defendant prejudiced by his withdrawal and retention of the $600, which should, and, according to his theory, would, have been paid to plaintiff if demanded? The principle upon which the exception to the general rule solely rests, is that, in the cases to which it applies, the drawer is in no degree prejudiced by the failure of the holder to protest the bill, and would not be benefited by demand and notice of dishonor. It thus appears that in no aspect of the case was the defendant prejudiced by want of presentment of the bill or notice of dishonor.

3. It is contended that the court erred in permitting plaintiff to introduce the bond of defendant to plaintiff as evidence in chief, against defendant's objection on the grounds that it was "immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent." The bond was certainly competent, relevant, and material on the issue as to the consideration for the bill, raised by the answer, and insisted upon here. But it was at least irregular to introduce it in chief, since the bill was prima facie evidence of a sufficient consideration; but it was not objected to on the ground that it was offered out of the proper order, or that it could properly be offered only in rebuttal. That it became relevant in rebuttal there is no question; so that the error, if it was such, of admitting it out of the proper order, was harmless. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

BERRY et al. v. KOWALSKY, (two cases.
Nos. 13,116, 13,309.)¹

BREACH OF OPTION CONTRACT — SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT—EVIDENCE—EXCHANGE RULES.

1. A complaint for the breach of the following contract, "Received of A. Gerberding one hundred dollars, for which I allow him the privilege of delivering me, at any time within thirty days from date, five hundred tons S/87 wheat, at one dollar and eighty cents per cental," signed, "E. H. K.," which is set out in hac verba, is sufficient on demurrer, although it does not allege that defendant executed the same.

2. The fact that the abbreviation "S/87" is used as descriptive of the wheat to be delivered under the contract does not make the complaint unintelligible and uncertain, as oral evidence may be introduced to explain the customary meaning, and need not be pleaded.

3. Where the contract sued upon was written on a sheet, with rules of the produce exchange printed at the head, and plaintiff testified that it was no part of the contract, and that the contract had no connection with the exchange, it was error to exclude evidence tending to show that it was an exchange contract, as well as the exchange rules governing such contracts.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by F. G. Berry and John F. English against E. H. Kowalsky for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Thornton & Merrybach, for appellant. Whittemore & Sears, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. There are two appeals in this case, upon distinct records. No. 13,116 is from the final judgment, and upon the judgment roll. No. 13,309 is from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, upon a record consisting of a statement of the case in addition to the judgment-roll. On the appeal from the judgment it is contended that the court erred in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the complaint, and that the findings do not support the judgment. On the appeal from the order the errors assigned are errors in law occurring at the trial. The following is a copy of the verified complaint: "The said plaintiffs complain of the said defendant, and for cause of action herein allege: That on the 15th day of July, 1887, the plaintiffs paid to defendant the sum of one hundred dollars for the right and privilege of delivering to defendant five hundred tons of wheat at any time within thirty days from said 15th day of July, at the rate of one dollar and eighty cents per cental. Said contract is in the following words and figures, to-wit: 'San Francisco, July 15, 1887. Received of A. Gerberding one hundred dollars, for which I allow him the privilege of delivering me at any time, within thirty days from date, five hundred tons S/87 wheat, at one dollar and eighty cents per cental. E. H. KOWALSKY.' That said contract was made in the name of A. Gerberding, as the agent of plaintiffs, but the plaintiffs were and still are the real parties in interest; that said plaintiffs, on the 13th day of August, 1887, in the said city and county of San Francisco, at the office of said defendant, tendered the delivery of said five hundred tons of wheat to said defendant, and performed all the conditions on their part undersaid contract. Said plaintiffs then and there demanded from said defendant the sum of eighteen thousand dollars, payment as the price of said wheat according to said contract; that said defendant denied having purchased said wheat, and refused to pay for said wheat, to the damage of plaintiffs in the sum of eighteen thousand dollars; that said plaintiffs made said contract with said defendant in good faith, for the purpose of delivering said wheat to said defendant, and had said wheat in warehouse in San Francisco for the purpose of delivering the same on said contract to said defendant. Wherefore plaintiffs pray for judgment against said defendant in the sum of eighteen thousand dollars, interest and costs of suit, and for such other and further relief as justice may require. WHITEMORE & SEARS, Att'ys for Plaintiff." This complaint was demurred to on the ground (1) that it is ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain, in that "no meaning is alleged of the words 'S/78' in the contract;" and (2) that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The alleged contract is not, does not purport to be, and is not alleged to be, an agreement "to sell and buy," nor an agreement on the part of the plaintiffs to sell wheat at any time. It imposes upon the plaintiffs no obligation to be performed by them. If it be a valid contract, it is an agreement by the defendant, for an executed consideration, to buy and accept delivery of, from the plaintiffs, a certain quantity of wheat, within a certain period of time, for a certain price, at the option of the plaintiffs, and to pay plaintiffs the price therefor. Civil Code, §§ 1726-1730; Whart. Cont. § 453a. Nor is the action brought to recover the price or value of wheat "sold and delivered," or "bargained and sold," but to recover damages for defendant's breach of his alleged conditional agreement to buy the wheat at plaintiffs' option.

1. As against a general demurrer, I think the facts expressed and implied in the complaint barely constitute a cause of action. The written instrument set out purports to have been signed by the defendant, and it is designated as the contract for the breach of which (afterwards alleged) the action is brought. This implies that it was executed by the defendant. The instrument admits the receipt of a consideration of $100, for which defendant "allows" (gives) plaintiffs the "privilege" (option) to deliver (or not) to defendant, within thirty days, 500 tons of wheat, "at [the price of] one dollar and eighty cents per cental." The giving of the privilege to deliver the wheat to defendant at a certain price implies that he will receive it and pay for it the price specified. The foregoing, I think, is the only admissible construction of the instrument as pleaded. If it will not bear this construction, it can have no effect as an agreement. As a breach of this agreement, it is alleged that, within 30 days, the plaintiffs tendered a delivery of the wheat, and demanded payment of the price, thus creating the condition upon which defendant's liability depended; and that defendant refused to pay the price. This shows a breach of the agreement, for which the plaintiffs were entitled to such damages as proximately resulted therefrom.

2. The grounds of the special demurrer, that the "complaint is ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain," do not appear on the face of the complaint. The words or abbreviations "S/87" appear to have been used as descriptive of the wheat, and to require oral evidence of their customary meaning in the business of dealing in wheat; but such oral evidence need not be stated in a pleading in which the written agreement is set out in hæc verba. The meaning may be proved on the trial for the purpose of enabling the court to interpret the words. Civil Code, §§ 1636, 1644-1646; Callahan v. Stanley, 57 Cal. 476. Had it appeared on the face of the complaint that, even with the aid of parole evidence, the words "S/87" as used were meaningless, and that a complete contract was expressed without them, they might have been disregarded as surplusage, (Harrison v. McCormick, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 830;) and certainly a complete contract is expressed without them. But it does not appear that, read in the light of admissible oral evidence, they are meaningless or unintelligible. So read, they may have a certain unambiguous meaning descriptive of the subject of the contract. Therefore the court could not see, on the trial of the demurrer, that those words were unintelligible, or that their use rendered the complaint ambiguous or uncertain.

3. The execution of the contract, and the breach thereof, as alleged, are found as facts. Therefore, the findings support the judgment.

4. The contract, as set out in the complaint, being denied, it appears by the statement on motion for new trial that, to prove the contract, plaintiffs offered in evidence a paper on which was written the alleged contract as pleaded. Above the manuscript, and on the same paper, was printed matter composed of what was admitted to be extracts from the rules of the Produce Exchange and Call Board of San Francisco. The paper was objected to by counsel for defendant on the ground that it varied from the contract as pleaded, the printed matter not being set out in the complaint. Thereupon, for the apparent purpose of proving that the printed matter was no part of the contract, and that the contract was entirely independent of the printed heading, the plaintiff Berry, on behalf of plaintiffs, testified to the circumstances under which the contract was made, and to what he claimed to have been all the verbal negotiations—all that was said by each party—preceding and leading up to the signing of the written contract, which, he said, was drawn by him according to the verbal understanding. He was further permitted to testify, against the objection of defendant's counsel, that the "contract was drawn independent of any connection with what is known as the 'Produce Exchange,' * * * I was not figuring on the contract on the board. It was business outside. * * * I never read the printed matter on the top of the contract. It had nothing whatever to do with the contract. It is the written portion of this piece of paper that constitutes the entire contract between myself and the defendant." F. J. Bonney, a witness for the defendant, testified that he was a farmer, and was a member of the Produce Exchange and Call Board on or about July 15, 1887, and was somewhat familiar with the rules thereof, and that he was present when the contract in suit was made, and heard the preliminary talk between the parties, but was not present when defendant signed the contract. Thereupon defendant's counsel asked the witness the following questions, each of which was objected to on the ground that the effect of the answer thereto would be to vary the written contract; and the objection to each question was sustained by the court, defendant duly excepting: "Question. Was there any reference had in the conversation between these parties to what was known as the 'Call Board Contract?' Q. Was anything said about the contract which was to be entered into between the parties being governed or to be complied with or performed under the rules of the San Francisco Produce Exchange and Call Board? Q. Was the term 'board contract' used in reference to the contract proposed to be executed by them in regard to the dealing in wheat upon which they were entering?" The defendant's counsel also offered in evidence all the rules and regulations of the Produce and Exchange Call Board; but, upon objection by plaintiffs' counsel, they were excluded by the court. It appeared that the plaintiff English, and Gerberding, (in whose name the contract was made,) were members of the exchange board at the date of the contract. The defendant, at the same time, owned a seat in the board, but was not then occupying it, having leased it temporarily to another person. The plaintiff Berry had formerly been a member of the board. As to whether, under the facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence, the contract could properly be considered a "board contract," and as to what extent, if at all, it was governed or affected by the rules and customs of the board, the testimony was conflicting. Without deciding whether the testimony of Berry on the part of the plaintiffs was properly admitted or not, I think after it was admitted the proffered testimony of Bonney, and the rules of the exchange board on the part of defendant, should also have been admitted. The testimony of Berry may have influenced the decision of the court to the prejudice of the defendant, and it does not appear that it did not. Had the testimony of Bonney and the rules of the board been admitted, they might have even more than neutralized the effect of Berry's testimony. It was not questioned by either party that the words "S/87" in the contract were to be interpreted by reference to the rules and customs of the produce exchange board. Each party, without objection, introduced expert testimony as to the effect of the rules on the meaning of those words; and it is, at least, possible that the contract may have been otherwise qualified by them. Whether it was so or not could not have been determined without a knowledge of those rules and customs, together with a knowledge of the circumstances under which the contract was made. After the plaintiffs had been permitted to testify as to those circumstances, and that the contract was independent of the rules of the board, the proffered evidence on the part of the defendant as to the same matters should have been admitted. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial granted.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment upon the ground last discussed in the opinion of Commissioner VANCELIFF. Upon the other points I express no opinion.

HOYT v. SELBY SMELTING & LEAD Co. et al. (No. 13,072.)

REPLEVIN—FINDINGS OF FACT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—TAXATION OF COSTS.

1. A judgment in favor of the pledgee in an action of replevin for the pledge against him and his bailee, by one to whom the latter had sold it, will not be disturbed where the court finds that the property was pledged by a duly-authorized agent of the pledgor, and the evidence of the agent's authority is conflicting.

2. The decision of a motion to retax costs will not be disturbed where the items appear proper on their face, and the objections thereto were heard and determined upon conflicting evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department

1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco. JAMES G. MA-GUIRE, Judge.

Action by A. A. Hoyt against Harris & Rhine and Selby Smelting & Lead Company for the possession of certain bullion. Trial to the court. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. Hunt, and W. W. Davidson, for appellant. P. Reddy and F. E. Whitcomb, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, C. This is an action of claim and delivery, brought by plaintiff against the defendants, for the possession of 230 bars of base bullion, or its alleged value, and damages for its detention. The allegations of the complaint, and the averment of value, are specifically denied by the answer, and for a further separate defense defendants justify under a pledge. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment rendered in the alternative in favor of defendants. The appeal is taken from the judgment and the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The facts necessary to be stated, in connection with the points upon which we have rested our decision, are as follows: On the 30th and 31st days of October, 1884, the defendants Harris & Rhine, partners doing business as merchants at Independence, in the county of Inyo, Cal., commenced two actions, one for $386.64, and another for $589.11, against the Owens River Mining & Smelting Company, a corporation of this state, having its principal place of business in San Francisco, and its smelting works and mining property in Inyo county. That thereafter writs of attachment were issued at the instance of Harris & Rhine, and placed in the hands of the sheriff of Inyo county, who executed the same by levying upon and taking into his possession, with other property, the bullion in question as the property of the said corporation. Afterwards, on the 5th day of November, 1884, one A. P. Minear, the superintendent of the company, and in charge of its smelting works, mining property, and business in Inyo county, for the purpose of releasing the bullion and all the property of the company in said county from these attachments, thereby enabling it to continue the operation of its smelting works, and the working of its mines, agreed to deliver, and subsequently upon the release thereof did deliver, the bullion in question to Harris & Rhine, in pledge to secure to them the payment of a valid and undisputed debt of the corporation, with the undertaking and agreement, on the part of Harris & Rhine, that they should ship the bullion to the Selby Smelting & Lead Company, of San Francisco, to be reduced and refined by it, and that they should cause it to be sold, and out of the proceeds retain the amount of their claim, costs of transportation, reducing and refining, and pay over the balance to the corporation on its order. On the same day, in pursuance of this agreement, they shipped the bullion to San Francisco, to the Selby Smelting & Lead Company, in whose possession it was at the time this action was brought. The plaintiff herein, who is an alleged creditor of the corporation, claims to be the owner and entitled to the possession thereof under and by virtue of a bill of sale, executed to him by the secretary of the corporation in pursuance of a resolution adopted at a meeting of the board of directors held on the 13th day of November, 1884, authorizing and directing him to sell the bullion to plaintiff for $2,000. It further appears that the meeting was called specially for this purpose, the object being, as was testified to by the secretary of the corporation, "to protect Mr. Hoyt against certain creditors," and "to turn the bullion over to Mr. Hoyt so as to prevent creditors from getting it, and that he subsequently understood that Harris & Rhine were the creditors referred to." The corporation was organized under the laws of this state for the purpose of carrying on a mining and smelting business in Inyo county. A. P. Minear was the superintendent of the company, and intrusted with the management of its business in that county, which is distant about 500 miles from San Francisco. It is contended that Minear, as superintendent of the company, had no power or authority to pledge the property in question, and that the agreement in relation thereto between Minear and Harris & Rhine was not binding on the corporation. The court in its decision found that the Owens River Mining & Smelting Company, acting by and through its duly-authorized agent, A. P. Minear, entered into the agreement referred to with Harris & Rhine, and in pursuance thereof, acting by and through said agent, delivered said property to them, in pledge for the purposes stated in the agreement. As the evidence upon this point is substantially conflicting, the finding, under the well-established rule of this court as to conflict, will not be disturbed on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify it. The conclusion here reached renders it unnecessary to notice the question involving the validity of the sale of the bullion to plaintiff, further than to say that the court below found adversely to plaintiff, and that there was evidence to support the finding.

In relation to the motion of plaintiff to re-tax the bill of costs filed by the defendants herein, and which was denied by the court, it is sufficient to say that upon its face the items of costs and disbursements charged appear to be proper, and, as the objections thereto were heard and decided by the court in favor of respondents, upon evidence which was substantially conflicting, we are of the opinion that the court properly exercised its judicial discretion in denying the motion. We therefore recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

GORHAM et al. v. HEIMAN et al., (SNELL et al. Interveners. Two cases. Nos. 12,958, 13,333.)¹

MINING BROKERS — COMMISSIONS — STATUTE OF FRAUDS — AGREEMENTS RELATING TO SALE OF LAND.

1. An agreement was made between two brokers and the owner for an equal division of the commissions received upon the sale of a mine. Afterwards one of them secretly made an agreement with a third broker, by which the latter was to receive all of a 10 per cent. commission on the purchase price fixed by the owner, and the former to have all the mine sold for above that price. Held, that the first broker was entitled to one-half of the entire amount realized above the price fixed by the owner.

2. Where the purchase money of a mine was payable in installments, and broker's commissions were to be deducted from each installment as paid, it is error to render judgment for the full amount of commissions before all of the installments have been paid.

3. Where the court finds that the owner of a mine agreed with two brokers to sell it on commissions to be shared between them, and that a direction by the owner to the buyer to pay all the commissions to one of them was for the benefit of the other, it is immaterial that the court made no finding upon allegations of a partnership between the brokers, and of fraudulent collusion between the owner and the broker in so directing the payment of commissions.

4. Civil Code Cal. § 1624, subd. 6, requiring agreements employing an agent or broker to buy or sell real estate for compensation or commission to be in writing, does not apply to contracts between brokers to co-operate in making sales for a share of the commissions.

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action in chancery by Gorham & Rank against Heiman & Hamilton. Snell and others intervened. Trial to the court.

Decrees for plaintiffs and interveners. Plaintiffs appeal from the decree in favor of interveners, and defendants appeal from both decrees. Reversed.

Cyril V. Grey, W. S. Goodfellow, L. F. Dunand, and Cabanis, Winans & Belknap, for appellants. Royce & Cummings, for respondents. Bishop & Watt, for interveners.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a suit in equity arising out of a controversy between several opposing claimants to a sum of money in the hands of the London & San Francisco Bank. There are two appeals in the case,—the first, No. 12,958, being an appeal by plaintiffs from a part of the judgment in favor of the interveners; and the second, No. 13,333, being an appeal by the defendants Heiman & Hamilton from the whole judgment, which was in favor of the plaintiffs and the interveners. The two appeals have been argued and submitted, and may be conveniently considered together.

The controversy arose upon the following state of facts: In January, 1886, and prior thereto, John Rathgeb and brother were owners of a valuable mine in Calaveras county, known as the "Cordova Mine," which they were willing to sell for $150,000, less 10 per cent. commission, to any broker who might effect a sale for them at that figure. The plaintiffs, Gorham & Rank, were partners in the business of selling mines and other real estate on commission, and had been in communication with the Rathgebbs, endeavoring to secure written authority to make sale of their mine. The interveners, Snell and others, partners in the same business, had likewise been endeavoring to secure such authority from the Rathgebbs, but neither had succeeded. The matter being in this situation, plaintiffs and interveners, each without the knowledge of the other, brought the Cordova mine to the attention of the defendants, Heiman & Hamilton, who also were engaged as partners in selling mines on commission, and who, by reason of certain business connections, had unusual facilities for disposing of such properties in the London market. The result was that defendants Heiman & Hamilton, without the knowledge of the interveners, entered into an oral agreement with the plaintiffs, to the effect that they would unite with them in obtaining written authority from the Rathgebbs to make the sale, that they would co-operate in effecting it, and divide the commissions equally. At the same time, without the knowledge of the plaintiffs, the defendants entered into another oral agreement, with the interveners, that they would unite with them in obtaining written authority from the Rathgebbs, and, in making the sale, the interveners to take the whole of the 10 per cent. commissions, and the defendants to have what they could get over and above $150,000, the price asked for the mine by the owner. In pursuance of these agreements, the interveners furnished the defendants with the written report of an expert, and other valuable information they had concerning the mine, and gave the defendant Hamilton a letter of introduction to the owners, upon the understanding that he should visit them at the mine, for the purpose of procuring their written authority to sell. Shortly thereafter Hamilton did visit the mine, but he went in company with the plaintiff Rank, by whom he was introduced to the owners, and assisted in making measurements of the workings, taking photographs, etc. He did not inform the Rathgebbs of his connection with the interveners, nor, it would seem, did he make any use of their letter of introduction. The result of his and Rank's visit to the mine was that the owners concluded to confide the business of making the sale to the plaintiffs and defendants Heiman & Hamilton, and to give them exclusive control of the property for a limited time. It seems to have been understood that Hamilton was to proceed to London for the purpose of effecting the sale there; and for the purpose of facilitating his operations, and at the same time protecting the owners, it was decided to put the transaction in the form of a grant of the mine to Hamilton, the deed to be deposited in escrow with a San Francisco bank, under instructions to deliver it to him upon payment of £30,000, less 10 per cent. A written memorandum to this effect was made at the mine in January, 1886, and afterwards, in March, 1886, a deed, granting the mine to Hamilton, was deposited, with instructions for its delivery, in a bank at San Francisco. Meantime Hamilton had proceeded to London, where he effected a sale of the property for £40,000, to be paid in installments extending over a period of 18 months. For the purpose, apparently, of conforming to the terms of this sale, the Rathgebbs executed another conveyance of the mine directly to the English purchaser, and deposited it with the London & San Francisco Bank, under written instructions for its delivery to the grantee, upon the payment of £30,000 in certain installments, 10 per cent. of each installment, as paid, to be placed to the credit of the defendant Heiman. But, although this was the form by which written authority to make the sale was given, it was understood and intended by the Rathgebbs, and by Hamilton and Rank,—the four parties who participated in the negotiations preceding the agreement,—that the direction to the bank to pay the 10 per cent. of the £30,000 to Heiman was for the equal benefit of the plaintiffs and defendants; that is to say, Gorham & Rank, as copartners, were to have one-half, and Heiman & Hamilton the other half, of said commissions. The defendants Heiman & Hamilton, however, seem to have determined at this stage of the proceeding to repudiate the claim of the plaintiffs to any share in the commissions, as well as their agreement with the interveners that they should have the whole thereof; for they concealed the fact that a sale had been made, and, even after Heiman had drawn and appropriated 10 per cent. of the first £5,000, he responded to the inquiries of plaintiffs and interveners by a denial of the sale. Before the second installment of £5,000 was paid, the plaintiffs, having discovered the truth, commenced this action, making Heiman & Hamilton and the Rathgeb defendants. Afterwards, by order of the court, the bank was made a defendant; but, having no interest in the controversy beyond that of a mere stakeholder, its pleadings need not be considered. The Rathgeb defendants are practically out of the case. The plaintiffs allege against them certain acts of collusion with Heiman & Hamilton, which they deny, and their denial is sustained by the findings of the court. For the rest, it is sufficient to say that in their answers to the complaints of plaintiffs and of the interveners the Rathgeb defendants sustain the allegations of the plaintiffs, and deny those of the interveners, so far as they are brought in relation to the controversy. It will be understood, therefore, that, in speaking of the defendants hereafter in this opinion, Heiman & Hamilton alone are intended.

The plaintiffs in their amended complaint allege that on or about the 18th of January, 1886, they and the defendants associated themselves together as copartners, under an oral agreement to deal in mining properties, and divide the profits equally. That in pursuance of said agreement they informed defendants about the Cordova mine, and that the owners had orally agreed to give them, and such others as they chose to associate with them, a written contract to pay a commission, provided they procured a purchaser for said mine at $150,000 or more. That it was then and there agreed that Hamilton and Rank should examine the mine and if Hamilton was satisfied therewith, and satisfactory terms could be made with the owners, Heiman should advance the money to defray Hamilton's expenses in going to London and making the sale. That Rank and Hamilton went to Calaveras county, examined, mapped, and photographed the mine. That the owners then and there orally agreed to pay them and their associates 10 per cent. commissions, provided they made a sale in three months at $150,000 or over, and that said agreement should be reduced to writing in San Francisco, and executed in the presence of Gorham and Heiman. That afterwards John Rathgeb came to San Francisco, and, conniving with defendants to deceive and defraud plaintiffs, executed writings empowering defendants to sell the mine and receive the proceeds. That Hamilton sold the mine to an English corporation for £40,000, to be paid as follows:

5,000.....	5 months thereafter,
5,000.....	6 " "
5,000.....	9 " "
5,000.....	12 " "
5,000.....	15 " "	and
10,000.....	18 " "

—Each of the deferred payments to bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. That on August 31st the Rathgeb defendants executed deeds of the mine, and deposited them in the London & San Francisco Bank, with instructions to deliver them to the purchaser upon payment of the purchase price; and, for the purpose of defrauding plaintiffs out of their share of the commissions, instructed the bank to pay the commissions to Heiman. That the first payment was made August 31, 1886, and 10 per cent. thereof, amounting to $2,418.12, paid to and appropriated by Heiman, to the exclusion of plaintiffs. Upon these allegations, in substance, the plaintiffs prayed—First, that the defendants be required to bring in the papers deposited in the bank, to the end that they might be properly reformed so as to preserve the rights of the plaintiffs; second, that Heiman & Hamilton be required to account for and pay to them one-half of the commissions received; third, that the bank be made a party; fifth, for an injunction against payment by the bank to Heiman & Hamilton pendente lite; sixth, for costs and general relief. To this complaint Heiman & Hamilton each interposed a general demurrer for want of facts, which being overruled, they answered separately, denying all the material allegations of the complaint, except the sale of the mine and its terms, and alleging an exclusive contract between themselves and the Rathgeb defendants for its sale and the payment of the commissions. Afterwards a supplemental complaint was filed, alleging the payment to the bank of two additional installments of the purchase price of the mine, and the receipt and appropriation by Heiman of 10 per cent. of the second installment, all of which was admitted by the several defendants to be true. Afterwards the interveners were permitted to file their complaint in intervention, wherein they alleged that in November, 1885, they associated themselves as copartners, under an oral agreement to deal in mining properties, and divide the profits. That there after they were engaged in negotiating a sale of the Rathgeb's mines, and while so engaged were informed by Heiman & Hamilton of the facilities they claimed to have for selling mines in London. That they thereupon informed defendants of their attempts to sell the Rathgeb's mine, and that they were to receive 10 per cent. of the selling price, which must not be less than $150,000. That defendants offered to aid them in negotiating a sale, and they "then and there agreed that said Snell and his associates would place said property in the hands of said Hamilton & Heiman for sale;" defendants to receive for their compensation in making the sale the excess which might be obtained over $150,000, and the interveners to receive the 10 per cent. That in pursuance of this agreement the interveners delivered to the defendants a written report and diagram of the property, supplied other information, and thereafter continued to render all possible aid to defendants in making a sale. That afterwards a sale was made as alleged in the complaint. That John Rathgeb was well informed of all the facts, and well understood that interveners were to receive the commissions on the sale. That after the sale said Hamilton induced John Rathgeb to order the commissions to be paid to him. That they refuse to pay any part thereof to the interveners, though demanded, etc. Wherefore interveners pray—First, that the bank be directed to pay them such sums as may be found to be due, etc.; second, that Hamilton &

Heiman be ordered to pay them the sums they have received; and, third, for general relief. To this complaint in intervention the plaintiffs and the Rathgeb's interposed demurrers, which were overruled; whereupon they answered, denying all the material allegations contained therein. The defendants Heiman & Hamilton answered by similar denials without having demurred.

Upon these pleadings the cause was tried by the superior court without a jury, and the facts found substantially as set out in the beginning of this opinion, from which it was concluded as follows: "As against the defendants, the plaintiffs are entitled to one-half of the sum on deposit in the London & San Francisco Bank, Limited, as the commissions; as against the defendants, the interveners are entitled to the whole of said commissions; as between the plaintiffs, the interveners, and the defendant London & San Francisco Bank, Limited, the plaintiffs are entitled to one-third, and the interveners to two-thirds, of the sum on deposit in said bank. Defendants Hamilton & Heiman to pay the costs." The following judgment, omitting formal recitals, was at the same date signed and filed by the judge, together with the findings, and was afterwards duly entered: "Now, therefore, in accordance with law and decisions and findings aforesaid, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiffs, C. L. Gorham and J. B. Rank, do have and recover of and from the defendants C. A. Hamilton and Joseph Heiman the sum of seven thousand two hundred and seventy-five dollars, with interest at seven per cent. per annum from the 31st day of August, A. D. 1886, and for their costs, taxed at the sum of ——. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the interveners, Henry Snell, W. E. Griswold, James McMeahan, and S. W. Howland, do have and recover of and from the defendants C. A. Hamilton and Joseph Heiman the sum of fourteen thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, ($14,550,) with interest thereon from the 31st day of August, A. D. 1886, and their costs of this action, taxed at the sum of ——. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant London & San Francisco Bank, Limited, do pay over and deliver to the plaintiffs and interveners, above named, all funds received and held by it as commissions on the sale of the so-called Rathgeb or Cordova mine, or held by it to the credit or order of the defendants C. A. Hamilton and Joseph Heiman, or either of them, and all moneys received by it from the Union Gold Company, Limited, or from John Rathgeb, Sr., and Hans Rathgeb, or either of them, to the credit of said defendants C. A. Hamilton and Joseph Heiman, or either of them, to the extent of the judgments in favor of the plaintiffs and interveners herein ordered, in the proportions following, viz., one-third of such funds to the plaintiffs, and two-thirds thereof to the interveners. Done in open court this 25th day of May, A. D. 1888."

We will first consider the appeal of the defendants from this judgment.

1. They contend that the superior court erred in overruling their demurrers to the complaint of the plaintiffs, because the oral agreement to form a copartnership to deal in mining properties therein alleged was void. But, reading the whole complaint together, it is apparent that the contract alleged was merely to buy and sell as brokers, and there is no statute of frauds requiring such contracts to be in writing. Besides, there is enough in the complaint to show a cause of action against the appellants, independent of the contract of partnership. It shows an agreement to co-operate in obtaining authority to sell, and in selling, a mine for an equal share of the commissions. It shows that the agreement was acted upon. It shows performance on the part of plaintiffs, collection of the commissions by appellants, and refusal to divide. Certainly this establishes a cause of action if the agreement was valid, and we know of no ground upon which it can be held invalid. Counsel seem to rely on section 1624, Civil Code, subd. 6. But, clearly, that provision was only designed to protect owners of real estate against unfounded claims of brokers. It does not extend to agreements between brokers to co-operate in making sales for a share of the commissions. It may be, as counsel argue, that the allowance of such claims as plaintiffs and interveners make in this action, unsupported as they are by any written evidence of the contract, opens the doors to frauds of as gross a nature as were ever perpetrated by real-estate brokers, under pretense of oral employment by the owners to make sales; but, if so, the evil is one which the legislature alone can remedy. It might be as plausibly argued that contracts should generally be held void if not in writing, but the law is otherwise. Id. § 1622. The court did not err in overruling the demurrers.

2. The objections to the sufficiency of the complaint in intervention urged in the argument are better founded, and will be referred to hereafter, but for the present it is sufficient to say that defendants did not demur to the complaint in intervention.

3. It is no objection to the sufficiency of the findings that they do not respond to the allegation of a partnership between plaintiff and defendants. As we have seen, that allegation is wholly immaterial. We think the findings do clearly and sufficiently show that it was understood and intended by the Rathgeb's that plaintiffs were to have a share in the business of selling the mine, and an equal share of the commissions; that the direction to pay the commissions to Heiman was for the benefit of all these parties; and that Heiman was thereby constituted the agent and trustee of plaintiffs in the collection of their share of the commissions.

4. Such being the case, the allegation that the Rathgeb's colluded with defendants to defraud the plaintiffs becomes immaterial, and the failure to find this allegation true does not affect their right to recover.

5. The findings in favor of the interveners are certainly rather meager, but they come fully up to the allegations of their complaint, so that the particular objection made to them goes rather to the complaint than to the findings themselves. In setting out their agreement with defendants, interveners allege that they agreed "to place said property in the hands of Heiman and Hamilton for sale," but they nowhere allege compliance with this stipulation, or anything equivalent to it, or excuse for non-compliance. Their complaint was, in this respect, extremely faulty; but the court, in the absence of a demurrer, seems to have treated the allegation quoted as the equivalent of an allegation that interveners agreed to furnish Heiman & Hamilton with such information as they possessed concerning the mine, introduce them to the owners, and, when the mine should be placed in their hands, to assist in making a sale. This, in substance, is all they are found to have done, and this, no doubt, if such was the agreement, was a sufficient consideration for an agreement by defendants to allow them all the commissions on the price demanded by the owners. But the allegations of the complaint in intervention as to these matters are too loose and vague to deserve commendation, and the findings are necessarily like the pleadings. It is not necessary, however, to decide whether these deficiencies would necessitate a reversal of the judgment, since there is another ground upon which we are convinced it must be reversed; and, when the cause is remanded, the interveners will have an opportunity of amending their complaint so as to show precisely what they stipulated to do, and their compliance with their stipulations, or their excuse for any failure to comply.

6. The defendants make the point that the findings do not support the judgment, and in this respect we think their contention must be sustained. There is nothing in the pleadings or the findings to show that anything more than the three first installments of the price of the mine, amounting to £15,000, has been paid by the English purchaser, and it clearly appears that, under the contract with the Rathgebbs, Heiman & Hamilton were only to receive for commissions 10 per cent. of the amount actually paid into the bank. But the judgment against them in favor of the interveners is for 10 per cent. of £30,000, and in favor of plaintiffs for half that sum; in other words, there are judgments against them for commissions which, so far as the record shows, they have never received, and may never become entitled to. For this error the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

For the purpose of such further proceedings, it is necessary that the superior court should be advised of our views respecting the controversy between plaintiffs and interveners as to the proportion of the fund in the hands of the bank to which they are respectively entitled. The plaintiffs contend, in support of their appeal, that the superior court erred in directing payment to them of only one-third of said fund, and we think they are right in this contention. It may be that defendants have become personally liable to the interveners for an amount equal to the whole of the 10 per cent. commissions on £30,000, and that, as against the defendants, the interveners would be entitled to the entire fund. But if one-half of the fund has always belonged to the plaintiffs, it cannot be taken away from them, and given to a party to whom the defendants, without right or authority, agreed to give it. According to the findings, the defendants, before obtaining any authority from the mine-owners, agreed to give the interveners the entire amount of the commissions. This, as we say, may have resulted in a personal liability to that amount, but the right of the interveners to share in the specific fund is dependent upon the right of the defendants, and can by no possibility exceed it. Now, this fund was created by the act of the mine-owners, and belongs to those for whose benefit they designed it. They had a right to select their agents for the sale of the mine, and they selected, not the defendants only, but the plaintiffs and the defendants, and they agreed with the plaintiffs that they should have one-half of the commissions. By virtue of this agreement, one-half of the commissions became the property of the plaintiffs, and the defendants had no power to dispose of it. The mere fact that Heiman was empowered to draw the whole of the commissions conferred upon defendants no property in the share of the plaintiffs. It simply constituted Heiman their trustee to receive and pay over the money to them. For these reasons the part of the decree appealed from by the plaintiffs must be reversed.

It remains to be decided what further proceedings in the superior court are necessary for determining and enforcing the rights of the parties. As to the plaintiffs, there seems to be no necessity for a new trial of the issues upon which their right to recover from defendants one-half of the commissions depends, but, for the purpose of determining the amount to which they are entitled, it will be necessary, by supplemental complaint and additional findings, to ascertain the amount paid by the purchaser of the mine, for upon that depends the amount of commissions earned. As to the interveners, they should be allowed to amend their complaint, and as between them and plaintiffs and defendants there should be a new trial. If they again recover, the funds in the hands of the bank should be equally divided and applied in satisfaction of the respective judgments in favor of plaintiffs and interveners. If the interveners fail to recover, the fund in the bank should be applied, as far as necessary, in satisfaction of the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to proceed in accordance with the views herein expressed.

LA GRILLE et al. v. MALLARD. (No. 14,189.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—COMPLAINT—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. A complaint alleging that plaintiffs, in accordance with a contract made by them as original contractors with defendant, papered and decorated several rooms in a dwelling-house of the latter, and furnished the labor and material therefor, sufficiently shows that plaintiffs were "original contractors," within Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1187, which provides that every "original contractor," claiming the benefit of a mechanic's lien, must file his claim within 60 days after the completion of any building, improvement, etc.

2. Section 1187 further provides that such claim must state the terms, conditions, etc., of the contract; and Civil Code, §§ 1609, 1610, provide that a consideration may be executed or executory, and, where executory, it is not indispensable that the contract should specify its amount, or the means of ascertaining it. Held, that an allegation that defendant promised to pay "the reasonable value" of said labor and material indicated a sufficient consideration to render the contract valid.

3. Where, on appeal by defendant from a default judgment, on the ground that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, the evidence is not before the court, the question will be determined by the allegations of the complaint.

4. Papering or decorating a house with paper decorations is a proper subject-matter of a mechanic's lien.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by La Grille & Kraft against Walter Mallard to enforce a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas Mitchell, for appellant. E. C. Rover, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, in which plaintiffs obtained a decree, the defendant having filed an answer, and then failed to appear at the trial. He now appeals from the judgment, and insists that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The notice of lien was filed 34 days after the completion of the work. If the plaintiffs were not original contractors, the complaint is fatally defective, and will not support the judgment, for the notice of lien was not filed within 30 days. The evidence not being before us, this question must be weighed and determined by the allegation of the pleading.

The plaintiffs allege "that on or about the 10th day of June, 1886, plaintiffs made and entered into a contract, as original contractors, with the defendant herein, whereby the plaintiffs were to paper and decorate, with paper decorations, the walls and ceilings of four rooms and the hall in the building, the same being a dwelling-house of the defendant; and afterwards, about the 10th day of July, 1888, by the direction and request of the defendant, plaintiffs papered with plain paper the walls and ceiling of one other room and two closets in said building; the said plaintiffs were to furnish, and did actually furnish, the labor and material used in doing said papering and decorating in said building, and the defendant promised and agreed with plaintiffs that he would pay for said labor and material the reasonable value thereof, to be so paid when said work should be completed." Under this allegation the plaintiffs furnished the material and performed the labor in decorating these rooms, under a contract made directly with the owner, and were to receive from him what the services and material were reasonably worth, when said work was completed. If it had been agreed between the parties as to the exact amount to be paid by defendant, then certainly there would have been a complete and perfect contract, and the plaintiffs would have been original contractors, within the meaning of the statute; or if it had been stipulated that the compensation should be determined by arbitration, that would not have detracted from the completeness of the contract, or defeated the claims of plaintiffs that they were original contractors. Section 1609 of the Civil Code provides: "A consideration may be executed or executory, in whole or in part." Section 1610: "When a consideration is executory, it is not indispensable that the contract should specify its amount or the means of ascertaining it; it may be left to the decision of a third person, or regulated by any special standard." Section 1611: "When a contract does not determine the amount of the consideration, nor the method by which it is to be ascertained, or when it leaves the amount thereof to the discretion of an interested party, the consideration must be so much money as the object of the consideration is reasonably worth." It is a common practice for a party desirous of erecting a building to let different contracts to various parties for the building of certain portions of it. These parties would all be original contractors, and men employed by them would be entitled to file liens as laborers. Under this contract, men working for plaintiffs in the decoration of this house would have been entitled to their laborers' liens; and that, too, under section 1194 of the Code of Civil Procedure, prior to the satisfaction of any lien filed by plaintiffs. Plaintiffs and their employes both being entitled to liens, in order to distinguish their status, the former must unquestionably be designated as original contractors. These views are not in hostility to the case of Sparks v. Mining Co., 55 Cal. 389, or Schwartz v. Knight, 74 Cal. 432, 16 Pac. Rep. 235. Indeed, the case of Sparks v. Mining Co., supra, is in line with the foregoing views, for the test as there defined is: If there could be intermediate lienholders for work done or materials furnished, then the plaintiffs here would be contractors. We have already seen that such a result might follow in this case, and, measured by the foregoing test the plaintiffs are original contractors, and filed their notice of lien within the statutory time. Papering or decorating a house with paper decorations is as much the subject-matter of lien as painting or putting on a hard finish of plaster. The paper loses its character of personality, becomes affixed to the building, and its removal therefrom results in a destruction of its value. For the foregoing reasons let the judgment be affirmed.

MERITHEW v. ORR. (No. 14,241.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1891.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—EVIDENCE NOT OF RECORD.

Where, in an action for the balance due on a mutual account, the items of which are set forth in the complaint, the court has found for plaintiff in a less sum than that demanded, and defendant, appealing from the judgment, brings only the judgment roll before the supreme court, the finding is conclusive, and the judgment will be affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action on a mutual account by one Merithew against one Orr. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. F. Fisher, for appellant. Brousseau & Hatch, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. It is alleged in the complaint that on November 4, 1888, the defendant's testator was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $761.32, the balance of a mutual account; that, after the death of the said testator, and the probate of his will, plaintiff's claim was duly presented to defendant, the executor, for allowance, and was rejected. The answer denied that the defendant's testator was indebted to plaintiff, as alleged, or at all. The court found that on April 15, 1888, plaintiff and the testator, Matthew W. Orr, had a settlement of their accounts with each other, and agreed that there was due at that time from plaintiff to Orr the sum of $115; that said Matthew W. Orr thereafter became indebted to plaintiff for hay sold to him in his life-time in the sum of $515; for one mare, $75; for the use of a team and mowing-machine 10 days, $15; and for hauling hay, $30; amounting to $635; leaving a balance due plaintiff at the time of the death of said testator in the sum of $520. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for the last-named sum, with interest, and defendant has appealed. The appeal is from the judgment, the judgment roll only having been brought before us. It cannot be said that the findings go beyond the issues. The action is to recover the balance due on the mutual account; and the items were duly set forth in the claim presented, and in the complaint. The court found as an ultimate fact that the estate was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $520, which was less than the amount claimed. The evidence is not before us, and the finding is therefore conclusive. The judgment is affirmed.

ROBBERY—EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL.

1. Where, on a trial for robbery, it is conceded that there was blood upon defendant's coat, a witness who saw him shortly after the alleged robbery is competent to testify that such blood was fresh, although he is not an expert.

2. The denial by the trial court of a motion for new trial, on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, tending to show statements of the prosecuting witness inconsistent with his testimony, will be affirmed, where two eye-witnesses gave testimony directly contrary to that of such prosecuting witness, since such new evidence is merely cumulative.

3. Newly-discovered evidence, the only office of which is to impeach an adverse witness, is insufficient to justify a new trial.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Appeal of Loui Tung from a conviction of robbery. Affirmed.

C. C. Stevens and J. A. Donnell, for appellant. Frank P. Kelly, Dist. Atty., W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., and Oregon Sanders, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was convicted of robbery, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. It is insisted that the court erred in its decision of questions of law. Many of the exceptions to the court's rulings are technical in the extreme, and others have not even a technicality upon which to lean for support. As an example, at the trial it was conceded that there was blood upon defendant's coat. A witness testified that shortly after the alleged robbery he saw the defendant, and there was fresh blood upon his coat. Counsel for defendant moved to strike out the statement as to its being fresh blood, upon the ground that the witness had not shown himself to be an expert. We fail to see that the question involved was such as to prevent any witness of ordinary understanding from testifying regarding it. The remaining exceptions were based upon rulings made upon matters largely in the discretion of the court, and we discover no abuse of that discretion. The offense was proven to have been committed in the city of Los Angeles, which constitutes sufficient proof of the venue. People v. McGregor, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 97, and cases there cited. The evidence is contradictory, and we will not disturb the verdict of the jury upon the ground of its insufficiency. The motion for a new trial, upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence, is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court. The affidavits relied upon tend to show statements of the prosecuting witness inconsistent with the testimony he gave in the case, thereby impeaching him. Two eye-witnesses gave testimony at the trial directly contradicting his testimony in all material points, and in that respect the facts set out in the affidavits would be simply cumulative. Where the only office of newly-discovered evidence is to impeach an adverse witness, it is insufficient for the purposes of a new trial. Stokes v. Monroe, 36 Cal. 388; People v. Anthony, 56 Cal. 399. Considering the character of these affidavits proffered, we cannot say that the court might not have reasonably inferred that the verdict would have been the same had the evidence set out in the affidavits been before the jury. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

BAIRD v. MILFORD LAND & LUMBER CO.
(No. 13,143.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1891.)

LEASE OF TIMBER-LAND—CONSTRUCTION.

A contract leasing certain land, with the privilege of removing timber therefrom, provided that the lessee should remove at least 1,500,000 feet the first year, and 2,000,000 each succeeding year, and pay one dollar per thousand feet therefor, in quarterly installments; provided that, if he should not remove such amount in any one year, he should pay therefor and remove the same in any subsequent year without further charge; the lease to continue 20 years, renewable at the option of the lessee, on certain stated terms. Held, that such contract provided only for the sale of the timber, and not for a continuous rent, and, where the timber is all removed before the end of the lease, the lessor cannot recover rent for the remainder of the term. Modifying 26 Pac. Rep. 1084.

On rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a rehearing is denied, but the following portion of the opinion, being unnecessary to a decision herein, is eliminated therefrom: "It is certain that defendant cannot be deprived of the use of the land for general lumbering purposes until the end of the twenty years named, whether the timber is removed or not, and we do not think that the parties intended that any consideration should be paid to plaintiff during that term other than the value of the merchantable timber at the price fixed."

NILES v. EDWARDS. (No. 13,050.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 30, 1891.)

CONVERSION—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 3336, which provides that, where an action for the conversion of personal property has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, the measure of damages shall be the highest market value of the property at any time between the conversion and the verdict, a finding of the highest market value of the property, between the conversion and the trial, will not sustain a verdict for that amount, in a case which was pending for one year, unless there is a finding that the suit was prosecuted with reasonable diligence.

In bank. Motion for rehearing. For former report, see 27 Pac. Rep. 159.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing of this cause is denied, but the judgment heretofore pronounced by the department is modified so as to read as follows: For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. This modification of our previous order is made because our attention is called to the fact that there is nothing in the findings to fix the amount of the damages to which the plaintiff is entitled. The rule of damages for conversion of personal property is prescribed by section 3336 of the Civil Code, as follows: "The detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be: (1) The value of the property at the time of the conversion with the interest from that time, or, where the action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, the highest market value of the property at any time between the conversion and the verdict, without interest, at the option of the injured party; and (2) a fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property." In this case the date of the conversion was November 17, 1886; action commenced, November 29, 1886; trial, December 13, 1887. The complaint alleges damages in the sum of $1,000, and prays judgment for $1,000, or for the highest market value of the stock before verdict. Waiving all questions as to the time when the plaintiff must make his election as to which method of computing damages he will ask the court to apply, and assuming that in this case he had a right to claim the highest market value, the findings are clearly insufficient to support a judgment on that basis. There is, it is true, a finding that the highest market value of the stock between the conversion and the trial was $3,300, but there is no finding, express or implied, that the action had been prosecuted with reasonable diligence. We could, perhaps, say as matter of law that the action was commenced in time to entitle the plaintiff to the benefit of the rule allowing the highest market value, but, a whole year having elapsed between the commencement of the action and the trial, it cannot be concluded as matter of law that it was prosecuted with due diligence. It may have been or it may not have been so prosecuted, and, without an express finding in his favor on this point, the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment based on the highest market value, and, as there is no finding of the value of the stock at the date of conversion, there is nothing to sustain a judgment based on the other branch of the rule. A retrial of the cause is therefore necessary.

MOFFAT v. GREENAWALT et al. (No. 14,310.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1891.)

APPEAL—BONDS—FAILURE OF SURETIES TO JUSTIFY.

1. A complaint in an action on an appeal-bond which alleges that defendant, in an action in the justice court, "appealed to the superior court of said county from said judgment," is a sufficient averment that an appeal was taken, and it is unnecessary to set out the several acts performed in taking it.

2. Where the condition of a bond is that, "if the appeal be withdrawn or dismissed," the obligors will pay the amount of the judgment, the fact that the sufficiency of the bond was excepted to, and the sureties failed to justify, does not relieve them from liability, where execution was stayed on the filing of the bond, though the appeal was dismissed for failure to give a sufficient bond.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 978, which provides that when exceptions have been taken to the sufficiency of sureties, unless they justify within five days, "the appeal must be regarded as if no undertaking had been given," the sureties, on failure to justify, are not released from the obligation of an appeal-bond given, on the ground that no appeal was taken, but the appeal may be dismissed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. WADE, Judge.

Action by Moffat against Greenawalt and others, on an appeal-bond from a justice court. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Dupy & Bently and R. Dunnigan, for appellants. Adams & Mitchell, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This was an action against the defendants as sureties upon an undertaking, given on an appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff in the justice's court of Los Angeles city township. The judgment was rendered in the justice's court, June 3, 1889. On the 18th of June the defendant in that case served and filed a notice of appeal therefrom, and on the 21st of June an undertaking on appeal executed by the defendants herein was filed in the justice's court. June 22d the plaintiff excepted to the sufficiency of the sureties, and they failed to justify; and, no other undertaking being filed, the papers in the case were not transmitted to the superior court by the justice; and on the 7th of November, 1889, the superior court, upon the motion of the plaintiff, dismissed the appeal.

1. The allegation in the complaint that the defendant in the action in the justice's court "appealed to the superior court of said county and state from said judgment" is a sufficient averment of that fact. The "appeal" is the ultimate fact to be alleged. The several acts performed in taking it are but probative facts, and their allegation in the complaint would be obnoxious to the charge of alleging evidence instead of facts. The provisions of section 456, Code Civil Proc., have no application to an averment of this nature. An appeal is not in any sense a "judgment or other determination." The objection urged in support of the demurrer, that the averment in the complaint that the "appeal was dismissed by the superior court" does not sufficiently comply with the requirements of section 456, Id., if it had any merit, was cured by the allegation in the answer that the court made an order that the appeal be dismissed, "which said judgment was duly made, duly rendered, and duly given."

2. It is contended by the appellants that, upon their failure to appear and justify after the plaintiff had excepted to their sufficiency under the provisions of section 978, Code Civil Proc., "the appeal must be regarded as if no such undertaking had been given;" and they further contend that, inasmuch as if no undertaking had been given, the appeal was "not effectual for any purpose," there was no appeal which could be dismissed; consequently their liability on the undertaking never attached. At the common law, when special bail were excepted to, they were considered as no bail, unless they justified, and, if they did not justify, the court would, upon their application, order an exoneretur to be entered upon the bail-piece, but until this was done they were held liable. 1 Tidd, Pr. 258. In Bramwell v. Farmer, 1 Taunt. 427, the court affirmed a judgment against the bail under these circumstances, saying: "The bail had nothing to do with the exception or the waiver of it. They entered into a recognizance, and thereby incurred the obligation to perform it." In New York, under a provision similar to that in our Code, it is held that the sureties upon an undertaking on appeal are liable thereon, although they have failed to justify after an exception has been taken to their sufficiency. Manning v. Gould, 47 N. Y. Super. Ct. 387; McSpedon v. Bouton, 5 Daly, 30. By their undertaking, the defendants promised and agreed that, "if the appeal be withdrawn or dismissed," the appellant would pay the amount of the judgment so appealed from. This was an original and independent agreement on their part, (Tissot v. Darling, 9 Cal. 278;) and, in legal effect, was entered into by them with the plaintiff. By virtue of the provisions of section 979, Code Civil Proc., upon the filing of the undertaking staying proceedings, all proceedings under the execution are to be stayed; and it was shown at the trial that, upon the making and filing of said undertaking, the property levied upon under an execution upon the judgment was released. The consideration recited in the undertaking was the "staying of the execution of the judgment appealed from." As soon as this undertaking was filed, it became an executed obligation on their part, and, whenever the contingency upon which the obligation was to depend arose, their liability became fixed. This liability could not thereafter be defeated by any act or omission on their part, or on the part of their principal. Their agreement to be bound, in case the appeal should be dismissed, extended as well to a dismissal resulting from their failure to justify as to a dismissal resulting from a failure on the part of their principal to prosecute the appeal. In Murdock v. Brooks, 38 Cal. 596, it was held that when the party in whose favor the undertaking was executed had had the benefit of a stay of execution the sureties could not be heard to say that the undertaking was void because all the forms of the statute, through their omission, were not complied with, and that the failure of the sureties to justify constituted no defense. In People v. Shirley, 18 Cal. 121, it was said: "The justification forms no part of the defendants' contract, and in no manner affects their liability." We do not think that it was competent for the defendants, after they had executed the undertaking, to avoid their liability thereon by any act of their own, or any failure to comply with a provision which is intended solely for the protection of the respondent.

3. The contention that no appeal was taken cannot be maintained. Section 974, Code Civil Proc., provides that "the appeal is taken by filing a notice of appeal with the justice or judge, and serving a copy on the adverse party;" and the provision in section 978 that the appeal "is not effectual for any purpose, unless an undertaking be filed," implies that, when the undertaking is filed, the appeal is effectual. The subsequent clause in section 978 that unless, when an exception has been taken to their sufficiency the sureties justify within five days thereafter er, "the appeal must be regarded as if no such undertaking had been given," is to be construed, not as having the effect, ipso facto, to vacate the appeal already completed, but as giving to the respondent the right, if he shall choose to avail himself thereof, to move for its dismissal, upon the ground that since it was taken it has become ineffectual. The jurisdiction of the superior court attached upon the perfecting of the appeal, by the filing of the undertaking, and, having once attached, could be divested only by an order of dismissal, or some other act of that court. This principle was recognized in Coker v. Superior Court, 58 Cal. 179, where it was said that, when the papers have been served and filed within the time limited therefor, "the appeal is completed; and although some of the papers which make up the appeal may be defective, or may not have been served or filed in the order named in the statute, or an execution may have been issued on the judgment and levied, yet they are, unless fatally defective, sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the appellate court, and to stay proceedings on execution according to section 979, Code Civil Proc." The principle was also recognized in Wood v. Superior Court, 67 Cal. 115, 7 Pac. Rep. 200, where it was held, under a state of facts almost identical with those in the present case, that the superior court should have granted the motion made on behalf of the respondent to dismiss the appeal. The expression used in the opinion, "the appeal was not perfected, and the superior court has no jurisdiction of the case," must be read in connection with the matter before the court, which was a review of the action of the superior court in proceeding to try the case. The court meant by that expression that the superior court had no jurisdiction against the objection of the respondent to try the case, or to change the judgment of the justice's court. It did not mean that it had no jurisdiction of the appeal; otherwise it would not have directed a dismissal thereof. It follows that the superior court in the present case had jurisdiction to dismiss the appeal, and that upon such dismissal the appellants became liable for the amount of the judgment appealed from. The judgment and order of the court below are affirmed.

GODDARD et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 14, 335.)

WRIT OF PROHIBITION—ASSIGNEE IN INSOLVENCY—JURISDICTION.

A writ of prohibition will not be granted to compel the superior court to discontinue an action by an assignee against petitioners to recover the property of the insolvent, on the ground that the assignee acquired no title to the property in controversy, since the court has jurisdiction to determine that question in the pending suit.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Petition of Goddard and others for writ of prohibition to superior court of San Francisco to compel the discontinuance of a suit against petitioners. Writ denied.

Sullivan & Sullivan, (T. I. Bergin, of counsel,) for petitioners. Naphtaly, Freudenrich & Ackerman and E. H. Rixford, (T. H. Rearden, of counsel,) for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an application to this court for a writ of prohibition to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, department 3, JOHN F. FINN, Judge, commanding and directing said court and judge, and assignee and receiver appointed by said court, to desist from further proceeding in the matter hereinafter stated. It is alleged in the petition that on December 1, 1890, W. H. Eastland and John Fowler were copartners, residents of this state, and doing business in the city of San Francisco under the name of Eastland, Fowler & Co., and as such partners were indebted to the petitioners in a large sum; and, in order to secure the same, the said firm made a transfer and conveyance of certain of its assets to the petitioners, and possession thereof was given to them. On the 9th of December, 1890, the said W. H. Eastland and John Fowler filed their petition in insolvency in the said superior court. The said petition is entitled "In the matter of W. H. Eastland and John Fowler, copartners," and recites that it is made by said named persons, "copartners in business." Such proceedings were thereafter had that an assignee of said insolvents was appointed, and the clerk of said superior court executed to said assignee an assignment and transfer, purporting to convey to said assignee "all the estate, title, right, and property of W. H. Eastland and John Fowler, and of the copartnership of Eastland, Fowler & Co., in and to all the assets of said Eastland and Fowler, and of said copartnership." Thereafter the said assignee, by virtue of said assignment, brought and is now maintaining an action in said superior court against the petitioners, to set aside the transfer made to them by the firm of Eastland, Fowler & Co., on December 1, 1890, alleging that said transfer was a fraudulent preference, and in violation of the insolvent act of 1880. In said action a receiver has been appointed, and he has, by the order of said court therein, taken possession of the said property claimed by petitioners and in controversy in said action. It is also shown that, prior to the appointment of said assignee, a receiver was appointed in the insolvency proceedings to take possession of the property of said insolvents until the appointment of an assignee, and he was directed by the court to commence the action now pending in said court against petitioners, and that said action was brought by him, and upon the appointment of said assignee the latter was substituted as plaintiff, and the action is being continued in the name of said assignee. The writ applied for is asked to prohibit the said superior court, and its judge, and also the assignee of said insolvents, and the receiver appointed in the said action against petitioners, from further proceeding upon the orders appointing said assignee and receiver, and from exercising the powers in said orders, or either of them, granted, with regard to the property transferred to petitioners by the said firm of Eastland, Fowler & Co., on December 1, 1890.

It is claimed by petitioners that the said superior court in the insolvency proceedings never acquired jurisdiction over the assets of the firm of Eastland, Fowler & Co., because the said petition of W. H. Eastland and John Fowler in insolvency was not filed by or on behalf of the said firm of Eastland, Fowler & Co., and contains no averment of the existence, at any time, of such a firm. Upon this assumption it is argued that the assignee appointed in said proceedings acquired no title to the property of said firm. We do not find it necessary to determine whether this contention of petitioners, in regard to the effect and scope of the insolvency proceedings, is correct or not, as, in any view, we are clear that the writ applied for must be denied. The respondent court has jurisdiction of the action of said assignee against the petitioners here, and of the parties thereto, and had to appoint a receiver to take possession of the property in controversy, and its jurisdiction is in no wise affected by or dependent upon the proceedings in insolvency. If, as claimed by the petitioners, the assignee acquired no title to the property in controversy by virtue of these proceedings, they will have ample opportunity to present and have that question determined in the action, to which they are parties, now pending in the superior court. The order appointing the assignee in the insolvency proceedings has already been made, and it is not the office of a writ of prohibition to prevent him from prosecuting such suits as he may deem proper for the recovery of property which he claims is vested in him as such assignee. Writ denied.

ANZAR v. MILLER et al. (No. 12,938.)

MEXICAN GRANTS — ADVERSE POSSESSION — WHEN TITLE VESTS.

1. A Mexican grant not confirmed by the land commissioners confers no title, although judicial possession of the land was given the grantee. Following Botiller v. Dominguez, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525.

2. The fee of lands held under an imperfect grant vests for the first time upon the issue of a patent, and no length of adverse possession prior thereto will support the statute of limitations.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Benito county; JAMES F. BREEN, Judge.

Action to recover real estate by P. E. G. Anzar against Henry Miller and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for appellants. William Reade, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Defendants appeal from the judgment and an order refusing a new trial. This action is brought under sections 380 and 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to try title to, and recover possession of, 28.41 acres of land in the county of San Benito. The plaintiff derives title under a patent from the United States in confirmation of a grant made by a prefect to Mariano Castro, May 19, 1839. The defendants claimed under a grant to one Jose Modesto, an Indian, dated March 23, 1843. Judicial possession was given to Modesto, March 23, 1843. Defendants also plead the statute of limitations. The claim of Modesto was never presented to the United States board of land commissioners for confirmation. On the trial the defendants relied upon the grant to Modesto and the judicial possession as a perfect grant, not forfeited by non-presentation; but since this appeal was taken, the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Botiller v. Dominguez, 130 U. S. 238, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525, declared that all Mexican grants, whether perfect or not, must have been presented to the land commissioners on pain of forfeiture. The only defense left is therefore the plea of the statute.

In addition to their claim under Modesto, the defendants also procured a patent from the state of California, to which the land had been listed by the United States. Of the defendants' possession it is sufficient to say, that since 1861, they have maintained an adverse possession of the demanded premises, sufficient in all respects to constitute a bar under the statute, if the plaintiff's title could thus be barred prior to the issue of the patent. The grant to Castro was for a plot of ground 100 varas front and 200 varas deep, a square of 100 varas in front of his house, "being the spot which is occupied by his garden and the four pieces of land [suertes de tierra] which he cultivates on the Ricon de Pajaro; without detriment, however, to the Indians, who there have lands, which have been granted to them." The Ricon de Pajaro contained about 100 acres of land, and the evidence seems to show that Castro cultivated different portions in different years. The grant was therefore an imperfect grant, and it has been held repeatedly that in such cases the fee was in the United States, and vested in the patentee for the first time upon the issuance of the patent. This precise question was presented in Gardiner v. Miller, 47 Cal. 570, and was there fully considered, and a conclusion reached which has since been uniformly adhered to, and we are entirely satisfied with its correctness. It is there said: "The grant had passed a present and immediate interest in the general tract, to the extent of the quantity designated; but that quantity had to be segregated, and until the segregation the title attached to no particular part of the premises. The principal question, therefore, is whether the statute then commenced to run against the right of the government thus to segregate and perfect the grantee's interest. * * * By the patent thus issued, the government divested itself of any interest in the tract described, and the eby the legal title to the particular tract became, for the first time, vested in the grantee under Sutter." It was therefore held that, inasmuch as the statute could not run against the title while held by the United States, it did not commence to run against the claimant until the patent issued to him. The same ruling was made in Henshaw v. Bissell, 18 Wall. 255.

Some doubt is supposed to have been raised upon this question by some remarks of Mr. Justice Fox in Norris v. Moody, 84 Cal. 143, 24 Pac. Rep. 37. This part of Justice Fox's opinion, however, did not receive the approval of a majority of the court; and it is obvious, from what has been said, that the ground upon which it is held that the statute does not begin to run until the patent issues is not because of any qualification in the statute, but because, the fee being in the United States, such statute cannot affect it; and it may be added that because such statute, so construed, would be violative of the treaty under which the United States acquired the country. In San Jose v. Trimble, 41 Cal. 536, which is relied upon here, it is intimated that a grantee may be barred by the statute as to the right he has before the patent, and that he may acquire a new right by the patent; and the intimation is that in such case the new right is not barred. A similar idea is advanced in Hayes v. Martin, 45 Cal. 559. These cases are not favorable to appellants. We are not called upon to express an opinion as to the operation of the statute upon a perfect grant in which the title was not in the United States, or as to the grants the survey of which had been approved under the act of congress passed June 14, 1860. There is nothing in the case to raise any question of laches. The plaintiff asserts no equitable rights, and, whatever may be said as to the form of the action, it is simply to recover land. In such case the statute of limitations generally furnishes the rule by which to determine whether the delay to assert the right is fatal. We think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLIEF, C.

HOWELL v. BURLINGAME et al. (No. 14, 083.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 30, 1891.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where the sole question is one of fact, and the evidence, though conflicting, is sufficient to justify the findings, the judgment will be affirmed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Action by Charlotte Howell against E. C. Burlingame and one Marsh. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Albert M. Stephens, for appellants. Minor & Woodward, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action to recover damages for alleged willful and malicious trespasses on real property of the plaintiff. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the findings were that the defendants "wantonly and maliciously, unlawfully and with force," committed the trespasses complained of, and thereby damaged the plaintiff in the sum of $800, and that $200 more should be allowed as exemplary damages. Judgment was accordingly entered against both defendants for $1,000 and costs. The defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and have appealed from the judgment and order. The only contention on the part of appellants is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings as against the defendant Marsh. It is said: "There is no evidence whatever to sustain the finding that Marsh wantonly or maliciously trespassed upon the property." And again: "The complaint alleges that Marsh committed the trespass at the instigation of Burlingame. The facts are that Burlingame committed the trespass himself, and that Marsh had nothing whatever to do with it." We have carefully read over all the evidence presented in the record, and, in our opinion, it was sufficient to justify the findings as against both defendants. It is true there was some conflict, but in such cases the decision of the trial court is ordinarily held conclusive in this court. We advise, therefore, that the judgment and order be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CESENA. (No. 20,749.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 30, 1891.)

RAPE—EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL.

1. A conviction of assault with intent to rape will not be reversed on account of discrepancies in the testimony of certain children, witnesses for the state, when such discrepancies are no greater than should be expected from their tender ages, and their statements are strongly corroborated by other evidence and by defendant's own testimony.

2. The refusal of the trial court to grant a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence will be affirmed when such evidence is merely cumulative or contradictory of the state's testimony, and counter-affidavits show that unless such testimony is false defendant must have known of it before.

3. Counter-affidavits are competent on such motion to show that defendant has not exercised due diligence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; J. K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Marcos Cesena was convicted of assault with intent to rape, and from the judgment of conviction he appeals. Affirmed.

Morehouse & Keaney and Mr. Tuttle, for appellant. W. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

TEMPLE, C. The defendant, having been convicted of an assault with intent to commit rape, appeals from the judgment and an order refusing him a new trial. He does not complain of any ruling at the trial, nor does he deny that there is some evidence tending to prove the charge against him, but he contends that the testimony of the main witnesses against him is contradictory, and so improbable that they are not to be believed; that it furnishes proof of a conspiracy; and that the charge is a pure fabrication. But it does not strike us in that way; the discrepancies in the statements of the children are not more than should be expected from their tender age. Then there is much to corroborate their account. Indeed, the testimony of the defendant himself, carefully analyzed, affords many items strongly confirming their story. The statements as to the time when Cesena left the saloon constituted only conflicting testimony, and was properly left to the jury. We do not attribute very much importance to the testimony as to time. It is easy to be mistaken in such matters. And then the value of the evidence depends largely upon the credibility of the witnesses, a matter peculiarly for the jury. The newly-discovered evidence is all cumulative, or simply contradictory of the testimony of the people, and the counter-affidavits show that, if the story be not a pure fabrication, the defendant must have known of it and of the witness. Counter-affidavits may be used on such motion, to show that due diligence has not been used. Such applications are addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and the presumption is that the discretion was properly used. We see no reason for interfering with the action of the court in this case, whether its decision were based upon lack of due diligence, or a belief that the proposed evidence would not render a different result probable, though a new trial were had. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

PECK et al. v. BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (No. 14,053.)

ROAD SUPERVISORS—REMOVAL OF OBSTRUCTION—MANDAMUS—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

1. Under Pol. Code Cal. § 2643, which gives boards of supervisors general supervision over highways, with power to abolish or abandon such roads as are not necessary, a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the board to remove an obstruction from a highway is insufficient, when it fails to show that the obstructed road had not been abandoned and discontinued by the board.

2. Pol. Code Cal. §§ 2645, 2731, make it the duty of road overseers, under the direction and supervision of the road commissioner, and pursuant to orders of the board of supervisors, to take charge of the highways, and keep them clear from obstructions. Held, that a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the board of supervisors to remove an obstruction from a highway is insufficient when it fails to state that the attention of the road commissioner or road overseer had ever been called to the obstruction, or that either of them had ever been asked to have it removed.

3. The duty to remove was on the road overseer, and he should have been made a party to the proceeding.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Application by George H. Peck and J. C. Hannon for a writ of mandate to the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county. Writ denied. Petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

John Mansfield and Edgerton & Blades, for appellants. Frank P. Kelly, O'Melveny & Henning, and James McLachlan, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county "to clear of obstructions, repair, open, put in condition, and keep in condition for public travel," a portion of a road situate in that county. A demurrer to the verified petition was interposed and sustained by the court below. The applicants declined to amend, and thereupon judgment was entered dismissing the proceeding. The appeal is from that judgment. The demurrer was upon several grounds, and, in our opinion, was properly sustained, for the following reasons:

1. Boards of supervisors have general supervision over the roads within their respective counties. They must lay out and establish such highways as are necessary for public convenience, and may abolish or abandon such as are not necessary. Pol. Code, § 2643; County Government Act, § 25, subd. 4. It is not stated in the petition, and it in no way appears therefrom, that the obstructed road had not been abandoned and discontinued by the respondent board.

2. It is made the duty of road overseers, under the direction and supervision of the road commissioners, and pursuant to orders of the board of supervisors, to take charge of the highways within their respective districts, and to keep them clear from obstructions and in good repair. Pol. Code, §§ 2645, 2731, et seq. It is stated in the petition that the road complained of is within a certain named road-district, but it is not stated that the attention of the road commissioner or road overseer had ever been called to the alleged obstruction, or that either of them had ever been asked to have the obstructions removed.

Writs of mandate are issued only to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station. Code Civil Proc. § 1085. The duty here was upon the road overseer, and he should at least have been made a party to the proceeding. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

HINKEL v. DONOHUE et al. (No. 13,318.)

PRACTICE—DISMISSAL OF ACTION.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 581, which provides that an action may be dismissed by plaintiff at any time before trial on payment of costs, provided no counter-claim has been made, or affirmative relief sought, by cross-complaint or answer, defendant cannot file such pleadings after an order of dismissal has been filed by plaintiff with the clerk who is authorized to enter the same, though it was not entered at the date of its filing.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Action in ejectment by Patrick Donohue and others against John Hinkel. Suit dismissed on plaintiff's motion. Defendants appeal. Affirmed. For former report, see 26 Pac. Rep. 374.

Mich Mullany and W. C. Burnette, for appellants. O'Brien, Morrison & Daingerfield, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff commenced an action in ejectment against the defendants by filing a complaint on the 23th of November, 1887. Summons was issued thereon upon that day, but no service thereof was ever made upon either of the defendants. March 16, 1888, the attorneys for the plaintiff filed with the clerk of the court the following paper writing, viz.: "[Title of court and cause.] The above-entitled cause is hereby dismissed, and the clerk of the above-named court is hereby authorized to enter said dismissal of record. O'BRIEN & MORRISON, Attorneys for Plaintiff." At the time of filing said dismissal, no appearance had been made in the action by or on behalf of either of the defendants, and the said dismissal was within a day or two thereafter entered by the clerk in his register of actions. September 13, 1888, the appellants served upon the plaintiff and filed with the clerk an answer to the complaint in said action. October 17, 1888, the attorneys for the plaintiff served upon the defendants and filed with the clerk a notice that on October 26, 1888, the plaintiff would move the court for an order "that a judgment of dismissal of said action be entered without prejudice, at plaintiff's costs, nunc pro tunc, as of March 16, 1888, and striking out the answer filed herein September 13, 1888. October 18, 1888, the defendants filed a cross-complaint, which on the same day was served upon the plaintiff's attorneys; and on the 20th of October, 1888, the attorneys for the plaintiff served upon the defendants, and filed with the clerk, a notice that on October 26, 1888, they would move the court for an order "striking out the so-called cross-complaint that was filed herein on the 18th day of October, 1888." When these motions came on for hearing, they were granted by the court, and an order was made that a judgment of dismissal of the action be entered, and that the cross-complaint be stricken from the files. Judgment dismissing the action was thereupon entered January 17, 1889. From this judgment the defendants have appealed, bringing up the foregoing matters by bill of exceptions. Section 581, Code Civil Proc., provides that "an action may be dismissed, or a judgment of nonsuit entered, in the following cases: (1) By the plaintiff himself at any time before trial upon payment of costs:

provided, a counter-claim has not been made or affirmative relief sought by the cross-complaint or answer of the defendant. * * * The dismissal mentioned in the first two subdivisions of this section is made by entry in the clerk's register; judgment may thereupon be entered accordingly." At the time the plaintiff gave the notice of his intention to move for an order that a judgment of dismissal of said action be entered, the defendants had not sought any affirmative relief by their answer, nor had they filed any cross-complaint. The above section of the Code gave to the plaintiff the right to have the action dismissed upon the mere filing of the dismissal, and to have judgment entered thereon accordingly. The defendants could not, by filing a cross-complaint, after receiving this notice, deprive the plaintiff of this right. The fact that before the motion was heard by the court the defendants filed a cross-complaint did not impair the right of the plaintiff to have the motion determined according to the facts as they existed when the notice of the motion was given. The order when made, and the judgment entered in pursuance of the order, related to the first step taken in its procurement, and is to be regarded as having been made at that date. The right of the plaintiff as it existed October 17, 1888, to have his motion granted, did not depend upon the relative speed of himself and the defendants in any race to procure the first hearing before the court. Indeed, even if it had been a matter of discretion with the court to grant or deny the motion of the plaintiff, we think that, under the facts disclosed by the record herein, it would have been an abuse of discretion had the judge refused to grant the motion. When the matter came before the court for hearing, and it determined that the plaintiff's motion should be granted, the court, upon having its attention called to the fact that subsequent to the making of the motion the defendants had filed a cross-complaint, was justified in striking that also from the files. The judgment is affirmed.

EXECUTORS—FAILURE TO PRESENT CLAIMS—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—WAIVER.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1493, provides that all claims arising on contracts, whether due or not, must be presented within the time allowed in the notice for presenting claims against the estate of the decedent, and claims not so presented shall be barred. Section 1500 provides that no action shall be brought on any claim against an estate unless the claim is first presented to the executor or administrator, except that an action may be brought by any holder of a mortgage to enforce the same against the property mortgaged, where all recourse to any other property of the estate is expressly waived in the complaint. Held, that where the holder of a mortgage commenced an action to foreclose nearly two years after the time allowed for presenting claims had expired, and about six months after the note matured, the complaint expressly waiving all recourse to other property, the action was not barred, although the claim was never presented for allowance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by Anglo-Nevada Assurance Corporation against executors of Nadeau et al. to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

S. M. White and Chapman & Hendrick, for appellants. Jarboe Harrison & Goodfellow and Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to foreclose a mortgage executed by decedent on the 10th day of November, 1886, to secure payment of a promissory note for the sum of $150,000 and interest, dated November 6, 1886, payable "on or before September 6, 1889." Nadeau died January 15, 1887. His will was admitted to probate, and his executors appointed, April 18, 1887. Pursuant to an order of the probate court, notice to creditors was published on April 25, 1887, and the 10 months within which creditors were required to present their claims expired February 25, 1888, about 18 months before the maturity of the note. This action was commenced March 29, 1890, nearly 6 months after the maturity of the note. Neither the note nor the mortgage was ever presented to the executors for allowance, but in the complaint all recourse against any other property of the estate than the mortgaged property is expressly waived. Judgment of foreclosure was rendered in the usual form, except that there was no judgment for a deficiency, nor for counsel fees. This appeal is from the judgment upon the judgment roll, including a bill of exceptions, showing that it was stipulated at the trial that the facts stated in the answer of the defendants (the substance of which is included in the above statement) are true. There was also a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it does not state a cause of action, and on the further ground that "it appears from said complaint that the plaintiff's alleged cause of action is barred by the provisions of section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure."¹

Counsel for appellants contend that plaintiff's entire claim arising upon the note and mortgage was barred by sections 1493 and 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure, because it was not presented to the executors or allowance within 10 months from the publication of notice to creditors; and that it does not come within the

¹ Sec. 1493. All claims arising upon contracts, whether the same be due, not due, or contingent, must be presented within the time limited in the notice, and any claim not so presented is barred forever. * * *

Sec. 1500. No holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon, unless his claim is first presented to the executor or administrator, except in the following cases: An action may be brought by any holder of a mortgage or other lien to enforce the same against the property of the estate subject thereto, where all recourse against any other property of the estate is expressly waived in the complaint. * * *

exception contained in section 1500, (viz., "an action may be brought by any holder of a mortgage or lien to enforce the same against the property of the estate subject thereto, where all recourse against any other property of the estate is expressly waived in the complaint,") because, when the action was commenced, plaintiff had no right to enforce the mortgage against any property of the estate, and therefore could not have "expressly waived in the complaint" a right that it did not then have. No authority is cited for this except a legal definition of the verb "to waive," from which counsel deduce the proposition that nothing else than an existing right can be waived. But this deduction is not warranted by the decisions from which the definition relied upon was extracted nor by authority of lexicographers. The verb "to waive," as well as the noun "waiver," is properly used in different senses. Webster defines the verb thus: "(1) To relinquish; to give up claim to. (2) To throw away; to cast off; to reject; to desert. (3) (Law.) (a) To throw away; to relinquish voluntarily, as a right which one may enforce, if he chooses. (b) (Old Eng. Law.) To forsake; to desert; to abandon." The same author defines the noun "waiver" as follows: "(Law.) The act of waiving, or not insisting on, some right, claim, or privilege." In the third definition above, an example of a voluntary relinquishment is given, viz., "as a right which one may enforce, if he chooses;" but this does not imply that one may not relinquish, "give up claim to," or "abandon" a thing to which he has no right; and an example might have been given of such relinquishment of a "claim to" something without right, for both the verb and the noun are often properly used in this sense, and the legislature may have so used the verb, if that meaning was intended. Besides, it is not clear that the plaintiff had no right to "recourse against" other than the mortgaged property at the time it filed its complaint. Plaintiff may have had the right, though the remedy for its enforcement depended upon the contingency of whether or not the defendants would plead the statute of limitations. If there had been no waiver in the complaint and no plea of the statute of limitations, plaintiff might lawfully have taken judgment for a deficiency, and might have enforced such judgment against other than the mortgaged property. However this may be, the object of the exception, in section 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is to require a plaintiff to put his waiver upon record, in his complaint, so that there may be no question that he had waived recourse, etc.; and it is immaterial whether or not he had made the waiver before his complaint was drawn, by failure to present the claim to the executors within the 10 months or otherwise. The construction contended for by counsel for appellants would deprive the exception of any effect in all that large class of cases in which the mortgage debt does not become due until after the expiration of the 10-months notice to creditors; yet there is no conceivable reason why the legislature should have intended to exclude this class of cases from the exception. Finally, the question as to the construction of the exception has been decided by this court adversely to the contention of appellants' counsel in a number of cases: Society v. Hayes, 56 Cal. 303; Morrell v. Morgan, 65 Cal. 575, 4 Pac. Rep. 580; Dreyfuss v. Giles, 79 Cal. 409, 21 Pac. Rep. 840; Bank v. Charles, 86 Cal. 323, 24 Pac. Rep. 1019. DYKE et al. v. BANK OF ORANGE et al.

(No. 14,351.)

MONEY JUDGMENT—DOCKET ENTRY—USE OF DOLLAR-MARK.

In a docket entry certain figures were placed under the words "amount of judgment," and other figures underneath the first were preceded by the word "costs." The last two figures of each sum were divided from the others by a vertical red line, the customary dollar-mark being omitted. Held, that the words "amount" and "costs" indicated a money judgment, and the red line the division of the sums into dollars and cents, and that the judgment was sufficiently docketed to create a lien, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 672, providing that, if judgment be for the recovery of money, the amount must be stated in the docket under the head of "Judgment;" if for any other relief, its general character must be stated.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. TOWNER, Judge.

Action by Lydia A. Dyke and F. M. Dyke against the Bank of Orange and F. M. Harris, sheriff, to enjoin an execution sale of their homestead under judgment recovered against them by the defendant bank. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Ray Billingsley, for appellants. Chas. S. McKelvey, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. The plaintiffs are husband and wife, and own a tract of land in Orange county, upon which they reside, and which they claim as a homestead. On October 30, 1888, the defendant Bank of Orange obtained a judgment against F. M. Dyke and others for the sum of $394.82 debt, and $34.40 costs. On July 8, 1890, an execution was issued on this judgment, and placed in the hands of the defendant, Harris, who, as sheriff, on July 9, 1890, levied the same on a part of plaintiffs' homestead, and advertised it for sale. This action was brought to enjoin the sale. The plaintiffs prevailed, and the defendants bring this appeal from the final decree upon the judgment roll, including a bill of exceptions.

The plaintiffs' declaration of homestead was recorded on the 12th day of August, 1889, more than nine months after the rendition of the judgment against F. M. Dyke, on which the execution was issued; and the only material question presented for decision is, was the judgment properly docketed so as to become a lien on plaintiffs' land before the recording of their homestead? There is no question that the judgment was properly docketed on October 31, 1888, in all respects, except as to the requisite statement of the "amount" of the judgment, which the court found to have been stated in the third column of the docket, under the heading "Amount of Judgment," as follows, and not otherwise:

AMOUNT OF JUDGMENT.
	301	82
Costs.....	84	40

(Folio 74.)

Red

As conclusions of law, the court found that this was not a sufficient statement of the amount of the judgment; that the "judgment did not become and was not a lien upon the homestead premises" before the declaration of homestead was recorded; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to the relief demanded. Counsel for appellants contend that the conclusions of law are not supported by the facts found, and I think this point should be sustained. Section 672 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "If judgment be for the recovery of money or damages, the amount must be stated in the docket under the head of 'Judgment;' if the judgment be for any other relief, a memorandum of the general character of the relief granted must be stated." In the first place, the word "amount," in its connection with the numeral figures, indicates that the judgment is for money or damages, since the amount of any other kind of relief is not required to be stated, nor could a memorandum of "the general character" of other kinds of relief be expressed by numeral figures, however written or marked. In the second place, the word "costs," immediately preceding the figures 3440, indicates that those figures represent money, since judgments for costs are always for money. Finally, the position of the figures in the columns headed "Amount of Judgment," inclosed by double lines, and divided by a single red line, plainly indicates that the figures on the left of the red line represent dollars, and those on the right represent cents. This mode of writing dollars and cents is more generally practiced, and quite as well understood as that in which the dollar-mark ($) is used. It is almost universally practiced where sums of money are to be written in columns, as in blotters, journals, ledgers, and statements of accounts. When so written, not only courts, but all persons of common education, readily read and understand the figures as representing a definite number of dollars and cents. In this form statements of accounts are ordinarily reported to the courts by executors, administrators, referees, and masters in chancery. When and where was an exception to such a report sustained on the ground that it was unintelligible?

A question similar to the one under consideration was decided in the case of De Lashmuth v. Sellwood, 10 Or. 319, in which the court, by WATSON, C. J., said: "The objection that it does not appear from the docket entry what the figures in the column headed 'Amount of Judgment,' stand for presents a question by no means new in this court. In the case of French v. Rogers, disposed of at the last term, we held, in effect, that any mark commonly understood and ordinarily employed in business transactions to denote the division of figures, obviously representing money, into dollars and cents, would suffice for that purpose in entries of this character. Such we deemed the mark ordinarily used in setting down sums of money on paper to denote the amount represented by the two figures on the right as cents, and that represented by the figures on the left as dollars; and the same effect, in our judgment, must be allowed to the lines and spaces in the ruled money columns in regular account books or official records similarly prepared. General usage and common understanding have given such marks and lines, when so employed, a signification by which, not individuals only, but courts as well, are enabled to determine what, and what amount, figures so placed were intended to represent, with as much ease and almost as much certainty as though the dollar-mark itself, or written words, even, had been used to express the same meaning." Upon this point the respondent cites several cases in which it was held that mere numeral figures in a tax assessment roll do not express the value of the property assessed, viz.: Hurlbutt v. Butenop, 27 Cal. 50; Brady v. Seamen, 30 Cal. 610; People v. Savings Union, 31 Cal. 132, and People v. Hastings, 34 Cal. 571. As to these cases, it is to be remarked, in the first place, that in none of them are the numeral figures written in columns similar to those in the docket in this case. In none of them is there any line or mark separating dollars from cents. In none of them are the figures written in the form commonly employed in account-books and records to denote that they are intended to represent dollars and cents. In the second place, while admitting that the strict rule applied to the assessment cases may be too firmly established to be overruled or disregarded by the courts in that class of cases, I think there is no necessity for extending it to the class to which this case belongs. The only case in this court, except the assessment cases, having any bearing upon the question under consideration, that I have been able to find, is that of Hibberd v. Smith, 50 Cal. 511. In that case the alleged defect in the docket was that it did not state the Christian name, nor the initials of the Christian name, of the judgment debtor; yet this court held that the docketing was sufficient to constitute a lien upon the land of the judgment debtor. I think the judgment should be reversed, and that the court below should be directed to render judgment upon the findings of fact in favor of the defendants.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the court below is directed to render judgment upon the findings of fact in favor of the defendants.

JONES v. TALLANT et al. (No. 13,265.)

COMPROMISE—PAROL EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. The owner of certain bonds, pledged to secure a debt, gave a written order for their delivery to another, who paid the debt with money borrowed by him for that purpose, pledging the bonds as security, and thereafter paid interest on the loan. He afterwards contributed to the expense of litigating the bonds, and the former owner acknowledged that he no longer claimed any interest in them. Upon the death of the first owner, his son claimed that they were part of the estate, and, after an investigation and on the advice of his attorneys, entered into an agreement with the person to whom they had been delivered, by which, in consideration of $1,500, the son acknowledged that they were not part of the estate, and were the property of the other party, who in turn agreed to make no claim on the estate. By direction of the son, the bonds were not inventoried, and no claim against the estate was ever made. The agreement was never rescinded, nor was the $1,500 ever repaid or tendered by the son or his heirs. Held, that the evidence sustained a finding that neither the son nor his heirs had any interest in the bonds, and that they were the property of the other party.

2. The admission of parol evidence of a written contract was harmless error, where the contract was afterwards introduced.

Commissioners' decision. Department

1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by Charles A. Jones, administrator of Louis G. Partridge, against Elizabeth Tallant and others, to determine the right of plaintiff in certain bonds pledged to defendant Tallant by defendant John Partridge. Trial to the court. Judgment for defendant John Partridge, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Peter G. Partridge, the father of Louis G. Partridge, and the uncle of John Partridge, was the owner of the bonds in suit, and had pledged them to a bank as security for a debt of $7,000. Demand for payment having been made, John Partridge paid the debt with funds borrowed by him from defendants Tallant & Co., and the bonds were delivered to him by the bank on the written order of Peter Partridge. John Partridge pledged them to Tallant & Co. as security for the money advanced to pay the debt to the bank, and thereafter paid interest to Tallant & Co. on the loan. At this time the bonds were worth but little, but afterwards appreciated in value, as the result of litigation, to the expense of which John Partridge contributed. Upon learning of this litigation, Peter Partridge stated that he had no claim to the bonds; that they belonged to John, who had paid his money for them. Peter Partridge died, leaving a will devising all his property to Patrick Partridge, his brother, disinheriting his son Louis. Louis threatened to contest the will, and an agreement was made between Patrick and Louis, by which he withdrew his objections to the will, and allowed the same to be probated in consideration of his receiving half of his father's estate. Louis claimed that the bonds were part of the estate, and his attorneys investigated the matter, and reported to him that John claimed the bonds had been given to him by Peter in consideration of his having paid the debt to the bank. The accounts kept by John with Peter Partridge showed an item of $7,000 which John claimed was the amount paid to the bank, and this item was indorsed by Peter Partridge, "Audited and correct." Upon advice of his attorney, and at the same time the first agreement was made, Louis entered into an agreement with John, (Exhibit B,) by which, in consideration of $1,500, he acknowledged the bonds as the property of John, and no part of the estate of Peter, and John agreed to make no claim against the estate. The money was paid, and by direction of Louis the bonds were not inventoried by the administrator. No claim against the estate was ever made by John Partridge. After the death of Louis, his widow filed a petition in the estate of Peter Partridge, alleging that the bonds were part of its assets; and an order was made directing them to be inventoried, and a decree subsequently rendered which, without determining the question of ownership, adjudged that the interest of said estate in the bonds should be distributed to the heirs of Louis, subject to administration of his estate. The sum of $1,500 was never repaid or tendered to John by Louis or his heirs, nor was any attempt to rescind the agreement (Exhibit B) ever made. The court found that Louis and his heirs had no interest in the bonds, and that they belonged to John, subject to the claim of Tallant & Co.; and that Louis, after full investigation of the rights and ownership of John in and to said bonds, entered into the agreement, (Exhibit B.)

T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. Pillsbury & Blanding and E. J. Pringle, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to determine the right of the plaintiff, as the administrator of Louis G. Partridge, deceased, to certain bonds which are claimed to have belonged to Louis G. Partridge, subject to a claim of Elizabeth Tallant and others, as pledgees, for money advanced upon the bonds to John Partridge. There is no question made as to the right of the pledgees to be reimbursed the money due them, whether the bonds properly belonged to Louis G. Partridge in his life-time, or whether they properly belong to John Partridge. The appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendants, and an order denying a new trial.

The contest here is mainly as to whether the findings of fact, which show that the estate of Louis G. Partridge and his heirs at law have no interest in the bonds, and that they are the legal property of John Partridge, subject to the claim of Elizabeth Tallant et al., are sustained by the evidence; and, further, whether the court erred in permitting Mr. Thomas B. Bishop to testify as to an agreement between Louis and John Partridge, which had been reduced to writing. After a careful examination of the whole record, we are satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to support the findings. And particularly is this the case with reference to those which show the nature of the agreement between John and Louis Partridge, whereby it is evident that for an adequate, sufficient, valuable consideration, which has never been returned or offered to be returned to John Partridge, Louis, with a full knowledge of the facts and circumstances of John's claim to the bonds, and acting under the advice of able attorneys, voluntarily entered into the agreement marked "Exhibit B," whereby he in effect transferred to John all his (Louis') interest in the bonds, and acknowledged John as the owner thereof, and the administrator and heirs of Louis are bound by his acts.

As to the matter of the evidence of Mr. Bishop, even conceding that the portion referring to the terms of the written agreement was inadmissible, it is plain that no injury resulted, as the instrument itself was placed in evidence, and was controlling in the matter. We perceive no error in the record, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

INGERMAN v. MOORE et al. (No. 12,733.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1891.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—DANGEROUS MACHINERY—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Where an employe was injured while operating a scantling machine and saw, by a projecting set-screw which was concealed below the saw, the fact that he had been employed for nine months in putting lumber in place to be cut by the saw, and had run the machine for 18 days in the absence of the foreman, is not sufficient evidence to warrant a court to say that, as a matter of law, he was experienced, and knew the location of the set-screw, and the danger of putting his hand below the saw.

2. In such case, it was not error to instruct that if defendants were negligent in not giving proper instructions to the servant, and warning him of danger, it was immaterial whether the hand was pulled off by the set-screw or cut off by the saw.

3. Where the record of a particular ruling is not embodied in a bill of exceptions, it forms no part of the record on appeal, and leave will not be granted to file the same afterwards as an additional record.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

Action by Ingerman against Moore and others to recover damages for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. F. Herrin and Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for appellants. Pillsbury & Blanding, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action to recover damages for a personal injury sustained by the plaintiff, and alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. The complaint alleges, in substance, that at the date of receiving the injury, and for some time prior thereto, plaintiff was employed by defendants in their saw-mill; that his regular work was to assist the man in charge of a "scantling-machine and saw" for cutting lumber, plaintiff's duty being "to put the lumber in place, to be run through the machine and cut by the saw." On or about February 14, 1884, the man regularly employed to run this machine became sick, and plaintiff was directed by the defendants to take his place for the time. The plaintiff expressed a doubt as to his ability to do so on account of his inexperience, but was assured by defendants that he was qualified to take charge of this work, and he did so. While engaged in this work, in removing some slivers from under the saw, plaintiff's sleeve caught on a set-screw fixed upon and projecting from a shaft located below the saw, which shaft worked the rollers carrying lumber to the saw, and by means thereof the arm of plaintiff was wound around the shaft, and so broken as to necessitate amputation. It is alleged that the plaintiff did not know of this set-screw, and could not see the same, and was not acquainted with the danger of removing the slivers, and that in the attempt to remove the same he acted in the same manner as he had seen the man do who had regular charge of the machine. The complaint further alleges that the work of running the machine was dangerous, and plaintiff was inexperienced and ignorant of the dangers attending the same, and that defendants knew this, and neglected to warn him of such dangers, or properly instruct him in such work. In their answer the defendants allege that plaintiff was employed to take the place of the foreman on the scantling-machine, when for any reason necessary; that he had frequently done so, and was fully acquainted with the work, and never expressed any doubt of his ability to run the machine and saw; that he had been fully instructed and warned concerning the saw, and the mode of using it, and of the danger of said employment; and that plaintiff knew the work was dangerous, and that it was fraught with danger to attempt to remove slivers from the saw when in motion. Plaintiff recovered a judgment for $12,500, and costs. The defendants appeal.

The principles of law governing this class of actions are clearly defined. It is well settled that one who enters the service of another takes upon himself the ordinary risks of the employment, and if he is an adult, and engages to do a particular work, the employer has a right to presume, unless otherwise informed, that the employee is competent to perform it, and understands and appreciates such risks. But, on the other hand, when one who is known to be an inexperienced person is put to work upon machinery which is dangerous to operate unless with care, and by one familiar with its structure, the employer is bound to give him such instructions as will cause him to fully understand and appreciate the danger attending the employment, and the necessity for care. This rule is thus stated by the supreme court of Wisconsin: "We think that it is now clearly settled that if a master employs a servant to do work in a dangerous place, or where the mode of doing the work is dangerous and apparent to a person of capacity and knowledge of the subject, yet if the servant employed to do work of such a dangerous character or in a dangerous place, from youth, inexperience, ignorance, or want of general capacity, may fail to appreciate the dangers, it is a breach of duty on the part of the master to expose a servant of such character, even with his own consent, to such dangers, unless he first gives him such instructions or cautions as will enable him to comprehend them, and do his work safely, with proper care on his part." Jones v. Mining Co., 66 Wis. 277, 28 N. W. Rep. 207. It is true this rule which requires the employer to give proper instructions is most frequently applied in cases where persons of immature years are employed about dangerous machinery, but the same principle governs where the person so put to work is of mature years, but without experience in the particular work, and without knowledge of the actual dangers attending it. But, of course, the fact that the person injured was of mature years, as was the plaintiff here, is a matter for the careful consideration of the jury in determining whether he fully understood and appreciated the dangers of his position. It is claimed by the appellants that they were not guilty of any negligence towards plaintiff, and that plaintiff by his own want of care contributed to the injury which he received. In passing upon the question of defendants' alleged negligence, it was necessary for the jury to determine: (1) Was plaintiff in fact inexperienced in the work in which he was engaged? and, if so, (2) were defendants informed of this fact? (3) If defendants were so informed, did they neglect to give him notice of the location of the set-screw, and to instruct him in the manner of running the machine, so as to guard him against the injury which he received?

The verdict of the jury necessarily implies that all of these questions were answered affirmatively in the minds of the jury, and upon all of them there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, unless it can be said as a matter of law that, upon the plaintiff's own statement, showing the length of time he had been employed as assistant on the machine, and how much he had himself run it in the absence of the foreman, the jury ought to have found that he was not inexperienced in the place he was temporarily filling, and not without knowledge of the location of the set-screw, and the danger to be incurred from placing his hand where he did while the machine was running. It appears from plaintiff's own testimony that he had worked inside of the mill, taking lumber from the big saw, for nearly two years, and had been employed as assistant on the scantling-machine,—that is, in putting the lumber in place to be cut by the saw,—for about nine months; and during that time he had, upon different occasions when the foreman was absent, run the machine, in all 18 days prior to the accident. It does not appear that plaintiff's duty as assistant was such as would necessarily give him knowledge of the structure of the machine, or of the existence of the projecting set-screw, which was a concealed danger. It is not shown that he had ever been called upon, or that it was any part of his duty, to become acquainted with this machinery, or to adjust it when out of order. It is doubtless true that some men, with the same opportunity, would have become familiar with its mechanism, and fully qualified to take charge of it, but it is a matter of common experience that all men would not. There is a difference in the capacity of men to acquire a particular knowledge of machinery, or the arrangement of its parts, or manner of construction; some having greater power of observation, and more desire to investigate and understand, than others. The extent of plaintiff's knowledge of this machinery was therefore a question of fact for the jury to determine from all the evidence before them, and we think it was fairly submitted to them in the instructions of the court.

The defendants insist that the plaintiff was himself guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to remove the sliver without stopping the machinery. We think, however, that upon the evidence in this case this was a question of fact to be determined by the jury, and the finding upon this point would largely depend upon plaintiff's knowledge, or want of knowledge, of the location of the set-screw. If he knew the screw was there and projecting, it was gross carelessness for him to place his hand where he did, with this shaft in motion. If he was ignorant of its existence, it was still a question for the jury to consider whether he was exercising due care in what he did, unless he knew that he could remove the sliver with safety to himself. In reaching a conclusion the jury might properly consider that he had often seen such obstructions removed from near the same place when the saw was in motion, and had received no notice that it was dangerous to do so, and that to have stopped the machinery, in order to remove the sliver, would have occasioned delay in the work, and that it was not the custom to do so. It seems clear to us that the inference to be drawn from these facts would not necessarily be that the plaintiff was guilty of culpable negligence, and different persons might fairly dissent as to the proper conclusion to be reached. In such a case the question to be decided is one of fact for the jury, and not of law for the court. And when the matter has been passed upon by the jury, and the judge of the trial court is satisfied with their finding, the verdict is conclusive of the question here. The law upon this point is clearly stated in the case of Coombs v. Cordage Co., 102 Mass. 585, as follows: "Whether it was possible for the plaintiff to have met with the accident from inadvertence or want of acquaintance with the danger of his position, without being chargeable with a want of reasonable care, we think is a question to be submitted to the jury. The facts that he saw, or might have seen, the machinery in motion, and might have known that it was dangerous to expose himself to be caught in it, are considerations which should be regarded on one side. On the other, some allowance should be made for his youth, his inexperience in the business, and for the reliance which he might have placed upon the direction of his employers. It has been held in other cases that previous knowledge of a danger is not conclusive evidence of negligence in failing to avoid it." In the case of Swoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 420, the plaintiff had been working in the mill for about 14 days, carrying slabs from the gang-saws, and placing them on the rollers; and when injured he had taken hold of a heavy slab, too heavy for one man to carry, and was pulling it, walking backwards, when he slipped back against the cog-wheels near the slab run, and his feet were caught and leg drawn into the cog-wheels, and permanently injured. It was shown that he had not been warned about the cog-wheels, and had never noticed them until he was hurt, but that he could have seen the cogs if he had stopped work to look for them, and that he was without experience and knowledge in mills. Upon these facts the court held that the question of contributory negligence was for the jury, and that the trial court erred in holding, as a matter of law, that there was such negligence. The court there said: "The plaintiff at the time of the injury was properly engaged in the active discharge of his duty. He testified that he had not been warned about these cogs, and had not noticed them until after he was hurt. Contributory negligence presupposes the doing of some act which ought not to be done, or the omission to do something which should be done,—in other words, a want of due care. 5 Amer. Law Reg. (N.S.) 405, note. If he did not know of the exposed and dangerous condition of these cogs, then by remaining at work he was not doing something which he should not have done; and the effort he was making, at the time of the accident, to remove the slab, showed no want of due care on his part, but, on the contrary, was commendable. Even if he had known of the cogs and their unguarded condition, it would not thereby conclusively follow that he could not recover. Other facts and circumstances would have to be considered in connection therewith,—his age, his intelligence, his experience, and such like,—so that the jury might ascertain and determine whether he fully understood and appreciated the danger." See, also, Dowling v. Allen, 74 Mo. 13.

The jury must have found in this case that plaintiff was without knowledge of the existence of the set-screw, and did not know that he was exposing himself to danger from it when he placed his hand where he did. We do not feel authorized to disturb the verdict of the jury on this point.

The instruction complained of, to the effect that, if defendants were negligent in not giving proper instructions to plaintiff, it was immaterial whether his hand was pulled off by the screw or cut off by the saw, could not, upon the evidence before the jury, have injured the defendants.

We have not overlooked the fact that in this case the defendants did not manage their mill in person, and did not personally employ plaintiff, or have any communication with him personally. If their superintendent, or other foreman, was negligent in putting the plaintiff to work without proper instructions, such negligence is in law that of the defendants, and they are liable for it.

The defendants have appealed from the order of the superior court made April 30, 1888, denying their motion for a new trial, and upon the argument of this case suggested a diminution of the record, and asked leave to file as an "additional record" the previous order of that court made in this action January 30, 1888, granting a new trial thereof, and the subsequent order vacating and setting this aside, and reinstating the motion for a new trial. It is claimed by the appellants that the power of the court was exhausted when it granted the motion for a new trial, and that its subsequent orders vacating this and denying their motion for a new trial were absolutely void. This additional record is not embodied in any bill of exceptions, and we do not think it forms any part of the record on this appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

MURRAY v. HOME BENEFIT LIFE ASS'N.
(No. 13,356.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1891.)

MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—WAIVER OF FORFEITURE.

An insurance policy provided for six assessments per annum, and that no claim could be made thereunder if payment was not made within 30 days from the date of notice that an assessment was due. The assessments of June 1st and August 1st were unpaid on September 1st, and the company wrote the assured: "According to the conditions of your certificate of membership No. 8,361, an assessment amounting to $29.40 will be due and payable at this office on the 1st of October, 1886. The assured died September 30th. Held, that the letter waived the right to declare the policy forfeited for non-payment, when due, of the June and August assessments.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Action by Murray against Home Benefit Life Association, to recover on an insurance policy. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

L. T. Heugstler and J. Alva Watt, for appellant. Van Ness & Roche, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff is the beneficiary named in an insurance policy upon the life of one Lemuel T. Murray, the policy being a certificate of membership, issued by defendant to said Murray, upon accepting him as a member of said Home Benefit Life Association. By the terms of the certificate, the holder was to pay to the defendant six assessments per annum, at stated times and in stated amounts, and it was also provided that no claim was to be made thereunder "should the member neglect or omit to pay the last assessment that may have been levied on the certificate within thirty days from the date of the notice thereof." Upon September 1, 1886, the assessments which had fallen due on June 1st and August 1st of that year were still unpaid, and the defendant on that day addressed a note to said Murray, calling his attention thereto, with a request that he remit the amount due. At or about the same day it also addressed to him this letter: "According to the conditions of your certificate of membership No. 8,361, an assessment amounting to $29.40 will be due and payable at this office on the 1st of October, 1886. Remittances should always be made payable to Home Benefit Life Association, San Francisco, Cal. Return this notice, with remittance." On September 22, 1886, the said Murray, unable from sickness to make the payment in person, sent to the defendant the amount due on assessments for June and August of that year, which the defendant declined to receive, its president saying that he could not, under the circumstances, "but would be only too happy to do so" when Murray should come and tender it himself. Murray died on September 30, 1886. The plaintiff was nonsuited, and the only question before us is whether, upon the foregoing facts, the certificate or policy was in force at the date of Murray's death.

There can be no doubt that the failure of the deceased to pay the assessments of June and August within 30 days after notice thereof, released the defendant from all further liability upon the certificate held by him, if the defendant company had so elected; but conditions like that before quoted from this certificate, which in effect provide for a forfeiture of all rights thereunder unless payment of assessments is made within the time specified, may always be waived by the party for whose benefit they are inserted in the contract, and the rule is firmly established in this class of cases that if the insurance company, after knowledge of any default for which it might terminate the contract, enters into negotiations or transactions with the assured which recognize the continued validity of the policy, and treat it as still in force, the right to claim a forfeiture for such previous default is waived. Viele v. Insurance Co., 26 Iowa, 9; Insurance Co. v. Young, 86 Ala. 424, 5 South. Rep. 116; Titus v. Insurance Co., 81 N. Y.

419. Imposing or collecting an assessment by a mutual insurance company, after the company has knowledge of facts entitling it to consider the policy no longer binding upon it, without its assent, is upon this principle held to be a waiver of the right to claim the forfeiture, which otherwise it might have insisted upon. The cases are numerous which hold that the acceptance of a premium, after the time when it should have been paid, is a waiver of the forfeiture which might have been enforced because it was not paid when due, and precisely the same effect is given to an agreement to accept, at a future time, such overdue premium, and a tender in pursuance of such agreement. In speaking of acts showing an election to continue the existence of the policy of insurance, and to waive a forfeiture incurred, the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Insurance Co. v. Norton, 96 U. S. 234, say: "It is conceded that the acceptance of payment has this effect; and we do not see why an agreement to accept and a tender of payment according to the agreement should not have the same effect. Both are acts equally demonstrative of the election of the company to waive the forfeiture of the policy." The respondent, while not disputing the general rule that a forfeiture may be waived at the option of the person entitled to enforce it, insists that the letters of the defendant, above referred to, show only an offer by it to waive the previous default in the payment of the June and August assessments, upon condition that such past-due assessments were immediately paid, and while the insured continued in the same state of health. There are no such conditions expressed in these letters, and we do not think any such arise therefrom by legal implication. The first, calling attention to the assessments already due, and requesting payment, specified no time within which such requested payment was to be made. A tender, therefore, within a reasonable time, would have been sufficient to satisfy the requirements of this letter; and it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the tender made was not within such time. But the letter notifying the insured that an assessment would be due and payable on October 1st, and in substance requesting payment, of itself constituted a waiver of the previous default, and must be construed as an unconditional offer to accept payment of that assessment on or before the date named. It was, in effect, an assertion that the certificate was still in force, and, notwithstanding previous defaults known to the defendant, would remain in force until the date therein named for such payment. As already stated, this notice was sent after full knowledge by defendant of the non-payment of the previous assessments; and if it was the intention to make the acceptance of the amount to become due on this assessment conditional upon the payment of such prior assessments, immediately upon the receipt of the other letter, it should have so stated; but, not having done so, we think the legal effect of this letter was to waive the previous forfeiture, and continue the certificate in force until October 1st; and this being so, the insured had the right at any time after receiving it, and before October 1st, to make payment of all assessments accruing prior thereto, and necessary to be made in order to give the certificate continued existence.

Forfeitures are not favored, and it necessarily follows, from the rule that a forfeiture will not be enforced unless specifically and definitely provided for in the contract that a waiver thereof will be treated as unconditional unless it clearly appears that it was otherwise understood by the parties. The supreme court of the United States in Insurance Co. v. Norton, supra, say: "It is true, we held in Stat-ham's Case, 93 U. S. 24, that in life insurance time of payment is material, and cannot be extended by the courts against the assent of the company. But where such assent is given the courts should be liberal in construing the transaction in favor of avoiding the forfeiture." And there is nothing unjust in this rule, as the party entitled to claim a forfeiture need not waive it, but may stand upon his contract as written, or, if he desires to waive his strict right only upon condition, the condition can be specified so as to leave no doubt of the real intention. In giving further time for the payment of the assessments of June and August, by its letter of September 1st, the defendant could, if it had so desired, prevented all controversy by fixing the time within which they must be paid, or by requiring immediate payment, as was done by the insurance company in Servoss v. Society, 67 Iowa, 86, 24 N. W. Rep. 604, a case cited and relied upon by respondent. The fact that no tender of payment was made by the insured until his last illness was upon him, and near his death, we do not regard as material. If the certificate was then in force, and we hold that it was, he had a right to pay what was then due. It was not made a condition of defendant's offer to receive said assessments that he must be in good health at the time of payment. As the case must be remanded for a new trial, it is proper to add that the questions asked on the cross-examination of the plaintiff, relating to the policy held by the deceased in another company, and the payment of premiums therein, are not relevant to any issue in this case. Judgment and order reversed.

HOME OF CARE OF INEBRIATES v. REIS,
Treasurer. (No. 13,741.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 6, 1891.)

MANDAMUS — PRACTICE — SETTING ASIDE SUBMISSION.

Where, on an application for a writ of mandate against a city treasurer, the supreme court, after the cause is submitted, concludes that the constitutionality of certain acts must be determined, which questions have not been argued, the submission will be set aside, and an opportunity for argument thereof will be afforded.

In bank.

Application for writ of mandate by the Home of the Care of the Inebriates against Reis, as treasurer of the city of San Francisco.

Tilden & Tilden, for petitioner. John H. Dwist and George Flournoy, Jr., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This cause was submitted upon an argument which raised but a single question, viz., whether the act of the legislature, approved March 17, 1876, was repealed by the act of 1889. Upon mature consideration, the court has concluded that a writ of mandate cannot be awarded without determining other questions, viz.: The constitutionality of the acts of April 7, 1870, and March 17, 1876; and whether the treasurer of San Francisco, in view of the provisions of section 82 of the consolidation act, can be compelled to pay any unaudited claim. These questions ought not to be decided without argument, and the submission of the cause is therefore set aside, in order that such argument may be had.

MILLS v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES. (No. 14,035.)*(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1891.)ADVERSE POSSESSION—LAND IN STREET—APPEAL.

1. In an action to quiet title to a strip of land lying in a street, it appeared that plaintiff's grantor took possession of a tract of land in Los Angeles in 1842, while the present city was a pueblo, and built a house thereon. The official survey of 1849 showed that the house extended across the street. In 1855 the city bought a portion of the tract shown to be in the street. The land in controversy was continuously inclosed and occupied from 1842 to 1887. A patent was issued to the city for the pueblo lands in 1876. Plaintiff shows no grant from the pueblo or the city. Held, that plaintiff could not recover, as the land in controversy was in the street as shown by the official map of 1849, and the fact that plaintiff's grantor maintained an obstruction in the street did not affect the dedication, or give him title by adverse possession.

2. The fact that the city purchased a part of the tract of land lying in the street is not sufficient to show that the city recognized a right to the street in plaintiff's grantor.

3. The exclusion of proper evidence is not prejudicial error, where it appears that, if admitted, it would not have benefited the party offering the evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Howard W. Mills against the city of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland and Chapman & Hendricks, for appellant. Chas. McFarland, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and order refusing a new trial. The action is to quiet title to a strip of land in Los Angeles 16 feet wide, extending westerly from Main street along Second street, and constituting a portion of Second street, as now laid out and used. The answer denies the title of plaintiff, avers title in defendant, and dedication of the land as a public street. It is admitted that Los Angeles was a Mexican pueblo, and continued to be such until its organization under the laws of the state in 1850, and that the land was a portion of the pueblo lands. In 1842 Tomas Urquidez took possession of a tract of land which included the land in controversy, and erected an adobe building which extended entirely across what is now Second street, near the junction of Main and Second; and the strip claimed by plaintiff, who derives title from Urquidez, was continuously inclosed and occupied up to 1887. A patent was issued to the city of Los Angeles for the pueblo lands in 1875, and another in 1876. Plaintiff shows no grant for the lands from the pueblo or the city, or any other source, except from Urquidez and those who succeeded him as grantees. But he claims that possession is evidence of title. Possession is sufficient evidence of title as against a mere trespasser without right, but is of no value as against the patent to the city, unless it constitutes a bar under the statute of limitations. It seems immaterial to this inquiry whether prior to the patent the pueblo had an inchoate title to the lands, or only a limited authority within defined limits over public lands which had been assigned for the use of the public. By the patent all the lands included in it passed to the city, except such as were held under grant from the pueblo or city, or under grant from Mexican authorities. Under the stipulation, prima facie, the title is in the city, and the plaintiff who seeks a judgment adjudging him to be the owner must show, by competent proofs, title in himself. He has not attempted to show, and does not claim to have, a title from Mexico. Has he then acquired title from the pueblo or city, or by adverse holding barred her right? It may be assumed that the statute did not begin to run against the city until the patent was issued, in 1875. There is no evidence of an approved survey of the pueblo lands, under the act of congress of June 14, 1860.

Plaintiff claims that the city has recognized his right, and, although his briefs do not make it very clear in what way such recognition can confer title, he seems to argue that in some way the city is estopped from denying his title, or the acts referred to raise the presumption of a grant from the city or pueblo. Where there is a question as to whether one holds in subordination to another, or whether he holds adversely, the fact that the title has been recognized is important, but evidently mere recognition cannot confer title. There must be something in the nature of an estoppel. In 1849 the pueblo adopted a map and survey as official. On this map Second street appears as now located and used. But at the intersection of Second and Main streets it shows Second street was occupied by the buildings of plaintiff's predecessor. In other words, that it was not an opened street, and could not be, until the buildings were removed. Occupants of the land claiming under Urquidez have had the land assessed to them, and the city has collected the taxes upon it. In 1855 one Dryden, claimant of a portion of the property, sold a portion of Second street to the city, which paid him $1,000 therefor, and took his deed. Dryden's deed covered the balance of the street adjoining plaintiff's claim, and the calls of the deed bound it upon Anderson's land. Plaintiff derives title from Anderson. In 1872 the council referred the matter of the obstruction in Second street to a committee, which reported that Anderson stood upon his rights. In 1884 the council passed an ordinance directing proceedings for the condemnation of this strip, and in 1885 another in reference to compensation for the strip. In all this we see nothing that can estop the city, or tends to raise a presumption of a grant, and the latter is completely disproved by the fact that Anderson petitioned the council for a grant to this and other land on the Urquidez tract. There is no evidence that any claimant under Urquidez ever pretended that there was a grant from the city or the pueblo to Urquidez. So far as the record shows, all disclaimed such grant, and asked for and received, after the controversy arose, deeds from the city. But the plaintiff claims that the strip is included in a deed from the city to Anderson, upon his petition dated August 6, 1855. He petitioned for the land fronting 18 yards on Main street. Previously, February 17, 1855, he had presented a petition showing that he had purchased property which extended five feet "in a street that is intended to be opened as soon as required; I therefore wish to exchange that same quantity of land for the same quantity on the other side of my lot," etc. The petition of August 6th for a deed was referred to a committee, which reported in favor of granting it on condition that Second street be made his southern boundary, and the council ordered "that title be given to the petitioner on the conditions mentioned in the report." The mayor's report shows that a deed was given to Anderson, which described the land as beginning at the corner of Main and Second streets.

The deed itself was offered in evidence, and excluded on the objection of defendant. This ruling is assigned as error. The offered deed also described the land as bounded on Second street, which it says constitutes the southern boundary. If the plaintiff, in connection with the offer of the deed, proposed to show that it included the land,—and he claims that is shown,—the deed should have been admitted, and then a finding, founded upon proper and legal evidence, would have been conclusive here. But now, if we can see that the deed if admitted would have been of no advantage to appellant, it is not prejudicial error. As the land granted is bounded upon the line of Second street, and the description commences with the call for the corner of Second and Main streets, it would seem that the deed does by express language exclude the land in controversy; and this, no doubt, is the reason why the court ruled it out. But it is contended that the corner of Second and Main streets, and the call for Second street as the southern boundary of the land conveyed to Anderson, refers to that street as opened by the purchase from Dryden, which is bounded upon the land of Anderson. The Dryden purchase was for 66 feet of Second street, and plaintiff contends that, when Anderson asked to exchange 5 feet in the street for 5 feet on the other side of his lot, he was claiming 5 feet of the ground conveyed by Dryden, and by that conveyance made a part of Second street. But this reasoning seems forced and far-fetched. We have not been able to find in the record any evidence that Second street was then open to the public. The deed from Dryden to the city bears date August 15, 1855. It appears that he was not to give possession for two months after the conveyance. Anderson's petition, in which he offers to exchange, bears date February 17, 1855, nearly six months prior to the conveyance. He must, therefore, have referred to the street as marked out on the official map. Anderson's petition for a deed is dated August 6, 1855, and the order allowing him a deed on condition that he accept it with the boundary on Second street was made August 30, 1855. The city had not then taken possession. Anderson filed still another petition, September 18, 1855, which also shows that the street had not yet been opened. And then the fact that Anderson's petition was granted only on condition that he would accept it with the boundary on Second street shows that they did not give him the land asked for, but required him to give up his claim to the land on Second street. But the presumption would be that the point called for is the corner of the streets as fixed on the official map, and the circumstances would be required to show very clearly that something different was intended to justify a different conclusion. But the record does not show that Second street had been opened to use, or was defined in any way save by the official map. Appellant contends that the confirmation of the title of the city inures to his benefit under section 14 of the act of congress passed March 3, 1851. But that section is for the benefit of those who but for it could, and to prevent forfeiture must, have presented their claims individually. Neither Urquidez, nor any of those claiming under him, have shown a claim which could have been so presented. To have the confirmation and patent inure to his benefit, he must show a grant from the pueblo or city. Plaintiff has not expressly claimed that he acquired title under the statute of limitations, but perhaps that claim is involved in his contention. The Ord map, made in 1849, being the official map of the city, is evidence that as early as 1849 the premises were declared a public street. That it was occupied by a trespasser would not affect the dedication. Such obstruction would not manifest an intention on the part of the city or pueblo to withhold that part of the street from public use, but only that there was an obstruction to be removed. There was no necessity for an acceptance by the public by using the proposed street to complete the dedication. The city was not only proprietor, but the political authority to lay out, establish, and to accept streets which were offered to the public by ways of dedication. In City of Eureka v. Armstrong, 83 Cal. 623, 22 Pac. Rep. 328, and 23 Pac. Rep. 1085, it was said: "The common council must be the proper body to accept a dedication. If not, who is there that can give a formal acceptance?" The pueblo was, or represented, the proprietor. Its authorities also represented the public, and were authorized to lay out streets. In fact, to accomplish the purpose for which pueblos were formed and lands assigned to them, they must do so. Lots cannot be sold or villages built up without streets. At first streets would naturally exist only on paper. But they were necessary to designate the lots and the different classes of land belonging to a pueblo. Whether they had been accepted and used by the public, so that they could not have been changed or otherwise disposed of by the municipal authorities, is not material to this inquiry. That question seems to have been considered important in San Francisco v. Calderwood, 31 Cal. 585, and San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 555. In the last case it was said: "Until accepted, the dedication, whether made by deed or otherwise, may be revoked by the owner of the land;" and this was applied to a supposed dedication by ordinance of a public park. But it does not follow, because the city might revoke the dedication until it had been used, that therefore, before such revocation, it should not be considered as a park. Of course no adverse rights could be acquired in this property after it had become a public street. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

EMERIO et al. v. ALVARADO et al. (No. 13,276.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1891.)

TENANCY IN COMMON—DEED OF CO-TENANT—DESCRIPTION—ACKNOWLEDGMENT—TAX TITLES—ASSESSMENT—PRIORITY OF MORTGAGE—ESTOPPEL—ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—AMENDMENTS TO ANSWER—DELAY IN FILING.

1. Where a co-tenant conveys a specific tract, which is less than his undivided interest in the common land, by deed of bargain and sale, describing the tract by metes and bounds, or other sufficient description, and purporting to convey the whole title to such tract in severalty, such tract should be allotted in partition to the grantee in severalty, whenever it can be done without material injury to other co-tenants not joining in the deed; and the tract so conveyed should be charged, in proportion to its value, against the interest of the grantor, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 764, providing that, whenever it shall appear in an action for partition of lands that one or more of the tenants in common, being the owner of an undivided interest in the lands sought to be partitioned, has sold to another a specific tract by metes and bounds out of the common land, and executed a deed of conveyance purporting to convey the whole title to such tract in fee-simple and in severalty, such tract shall be allotted and set apart in partition to such purchaser, his heirs and assigns, or in such other manner as shall make such deed effectual as a conveyance of the whole title to such segregated parcel, if such tract can be so allotted without material injury to the rights of other co-tenants not joining in such conveyance; and, such statute being merely declaratory of the existing law, the rule therein prescribed applies to conveyances executed prior to its enactment.

2. A deed by a co-tenant, conveying a specific part of the common land, is not void.

3. Where a co-tenant sells a fractional undivided interest in a specific tract of the common land, and executes a quitclaim deed purporting to convey his interest in such specific tract in fee, the grantee should be allotted in partition such fractional interest only.

4. A conveyance by a co-tenant and his wife described the premises as "all our right, title, and interest in and to all the land inherited by us, or either of us, from one C., the father of" the co-tenant. The father had devised to the co-tenant a certain undivided share of "all my property, rights, and actions, together with all the land of my Rancho San Pablo." The father had applied to the Mexican government for a grant of three leagues, and, after his death, one of his sons renewed this application, and afterwards made another for four leagues, on which the grant was finally made to the heirs of the original applicant. A vendee of the co-tenant's grantee claimed a specific tract of the common land under his deed, but it did not appear that such specific tract was within the grant applied for by the father. Held, that the description in the deed from the co-tenant was insufficient to pass title to such specific tract. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

5. A certificate of acknowledgment of a deed taken by a justice of the peace, which fails to show of what county he was a justice, or whether he was a justice of any county, or in what county or state the acknowledgment was taken, is fatally defective.

6. Error in excluding evidence offered by one party cannot be assigned by another party, who did not except.

7. One co-tenant cannot acquire a tax-title to the premises to the prejudice of the others.

8. Revenue Act May 15, 1854, § 90, (St. Cal. 1854, p. 88,) providing that the tax-deed shall be prima facie evidence of certain matters, was repealed by Revenue Act April 29, 1857, § 55, (St. Cal. 1857, p. 344;) and the introduction of a tax-deed under the former statute, without proof of the preliminary steps necessary to vest the power of sale, does not show a prima facie title.

9. Where, under Revenue Act Cal. May 15, 1854, an assessment of lands owned by "Castro" was made in the name of "Castero," the assessment and the tax-deed, describing the lands as having been assessed to "Castro," are void; the rule of idem sonans not applying to assessments for taxes.

10. Where there is no dollar-mark or other character in the assessment and duplicate rolls, showing what was meant by the figures in the columns headed "Value" and "Taxes," the assessment, and tax-deed based thereon, are invalid.

11. A deed purported to convey "all the right, title, and interest" of the grantor, being an undivided interest in a specific tract of lands held in common. The grantee executed a deed purporting to grant, bargain, and sell the specific tract, and reciting that it was the same land thus conveyed to him. At that time the grantor in the second deed had no general interest in the common land, as his grantee knew, but he subsequently acquired one. Held, that the grantee in the second deed took only an undivided interest in the specific tract. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

12. Under the California statutes in force in April, 1853, which provided that every conveyance of real estate, which shall not be duly recorded, shall be void against a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee for value in good faith whose conveyance or mortgage shall be first duly recorded, a mortgage, executed after a deed to another person, but recorded before it, has priority.

13. The grantee in such deed, being junior to the mortgage, is a proper party to the foreclosure, and is concluded by decree therein against him.

14. A finding that the mortgagee had no notice of the grantee's rights is conclusive on appeal, when the evidence is not brought up, and such finding is not affected by a finding that the grantee's tenant was in possession when the mortgage was given, since possession is not notice, but only evidence of it.

15. One whose interest in lands held in common had been exhausted, conveyed a specific tract of 300 acres thereof in consideration of a reconveyance of a specific tract of 27 acres out of the 300. The grantee in the first deed subsequently acquired an undivided interest in the common lands from other co-tenants. Held, that such subsequently acquired interest should not be applied in partition to effectuating the grant of the 27-acre tract under the rule prescribed in Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 764.

16. A notary public of the county of C. took an acknowledgment of a deed therein. His certificate was as follows: "State of California, city and county of S. On this day * * * before me, H. I. Tillotson, a notary public in and for said city and county, appeared," etc.; and it was signed, "H. I. Tillotson, Notary Public." The certificate stated that he had "affixed his official seal," which contained the words "Notary Public, C. County." He was not a notary for the city and county of S. Held, that the acknowledgment was fatally defective, under Civil Code Cal. §§ 1188, 1189, requiring the name and quality of officers taking acknowledgments to be in the certificate, and section 1193, requiring that they must authenticate their certificates by affixing their signatures followed by their names and seals of office. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

17. The record of a deed so acknowledged does not impart constructive notice, under Civil Code Cal. § 1161, providing that, before it can be recorded, an instrument must be acknowledged, and the acknowledgment certified, as required by law. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

18. One claiming title under a void tax-deed of the share of certain co-tenants allotted them in partition, executed a deed of bargain and sale purporting to convey the whole title to a specific tract. The deed described the premises as "being a portion of lands allotted in partition to" the co-tenants, and covenanted that neither the grantor nor the co-tenants had done, or suffered to be done, anything whereby the premises, or any part thereof, are, or hereafter may be, impeached, charged, or incumbered in any manner. The grantee, afterwards acquiring an undivided interest in the common land, conveyed all his right, title, and interest therein to his grantor, reserving the specific tract previously conveyed. Held that, as it was the intention of the first grantor to convey a perfect title to the specific tract, he was estopped to impeach it.

19. Where a contract between an attorney and his client provided that, in consideration of professional services to be rendered in an action for partition, the attorney should receive a share of the interest of the client when the partition suit should be determined, and it does not appear that any services were rendered or performance thereof waived, such contract confers no legal or equitable right in the land, and titles based thereon are void.

20. The original answers in a cause were filed in 1868, and judgment rendered in 1878. After reversal on appeal, the cause came on for trial in January, 1885. In December, 1885, counsel asked leave to file amendments to the answer, and the amendments were then drawn and verified. The court, after repeatedly urging counsel to present them, and after granting one continuance for that purpose, peremptorily ordered them to be filed October 1, 1886; but they were not presented until January, 1887, after the case had been declared substantially closed. There was no excuse offered for the delay. Held, that the court properly refused to receive them.

21. Notice by the purchaser to the owner or occupant of lands sold for taxes is essential to the validity of the tax-deed, under Pol. Code Cal. § 3785, providing that the purchaser must, 30 days prior to the expiration of redemption, or 30 days prior to application for a deed, serve on the owner or occupant a written notice stating the sale, its date and amount, and the time of expiration of redemption, or when application for deed will be made.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Action for partition by Joseph Emeric and others against Alvarado and others. Trial to the court, and decrees rendered, from which different parties appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. Matthews, Wm. Leviston, Wm. Mirzner, Garber & Bishop, Stanley, Stoney & Hayes, W. H. L. Barnes, E. Kirkpatrick E. J. & J. H. Moore, Flournoy & Mhoon, E. J. Pringle, Taylor & Haight, Geo. E. Lawrence, Henry E. Highton, and A. H. Loughborough, for appellants. Theodore H. Hittell, William C. Belcher, and W. H. H. Hart, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action for the partition of a tract of land called the "San Pablo Ranch," containing 17,938.59 acres. It is situated in what is now Contra Costa county, and was granted by the Mexican government, and afterwards patented by the United States to the successors of Francisco Maria Castro, who died on the 5th day of November, 1831. The action was commenced on November 19, 1867, in the district court of the fifteenth judicial district in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and an interlocutory decree was rendered in that court on July 15, 1878. Several appeals were taken, and the judgment and order denying a new trial were reversed by this court, because the findings as to two or three issues were deemed defective; and furthermore, and mainly, because the decree determined rights, interests, and shares in the land only as they existed in the hands of the original tenants in common, and did not determine the present rights, interests, and shares of all the parties to the suit as they existed at the time the action was commenced. Most of the findings of the district court were approved, and the cause was remanded to the superior court, (successor to said district court,) with instructions to find on certain issues mentioned; and "upon the findings heretofore made and herein approved, and those hereafter to be made under the directions of this court," to proceed and specify in its interlocutory decree the "rights and interests of all parties to the action," and adjudge partition between them according to such rights and interests. Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 627, 2 Pac. Rep. 418. It was established by the first decree, and the decision of this court, that the persons denominated "original tenants in common," and the shares belonging to each, were as follows: Martina Castro de Alvarado, fifteen equal twenty-second parts of said rancho; Antonio Castro, Joaquin I. Castro, Juan Jose Castro, Gabriel V. Castro, Victor Castro, and Jesus Maria Castro, each one equal twenty-second part; and Luisa Moraga de Briones, Maria de los Angeles Moraga de Briones, Jose Moraga, Guadalupe Moraga de Martinez, and Francisca Moraga, each one equal one-fifth of one equal twenty-second part of said rancho. (The seven persons first above named were children of Francisco Maria Castro, and the five persons last named were children of Francisco Castro de Moraga, a deceased daughter of said Francisco Maria Castro.) After the cause went back to the superior court, further findings were had; and that court—Judge JAMES G. MAGUIRE presiding—with great care, and in a systematic method that must have cost great labor and thought, found, determined, and stated the interests and shares, not only of the said original co-defendants, but of all persons holding or claiming under them, and being parties to this action; and entered an interlocutory decree adjudging partition among the parties in accordance with the findings. The case now comes here the second time upon numerous appeals from the interlocutory decree, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. There are several hundred parties to the action. The interests of many of the parties to the appeals are friendly as to some matters and hostile as to others, so that they are appellants as to some points and respondents as to others, thus presenting different and contradictory claims upon the same transcript. The findings of fact of the superior court number 274, many of them having numerous subdivisions, and they were all necessary to the disposition of the case. These findings, with the conclusions of law, the original findings of the district court, and the last interlocutory decree occupy 752 pages of the printed transcript No. 13,276, while there is much additional matter in the other transcripts. It is apparent, therefore, that the labor of the court below must have been very great; and that it would be impossible to give here a full statement of the whole case in detail without exceeding all reasonable limits of an opinion. As, however, the opinion of this court delivered on the former appeal contains quite an extensive history of the case, and as the points arising on the present appeals may be grouped into a few general classes, we think that the case can be disposed of without much detailed statement of facts. There are five separate transcripts,—Nos. 13,276, 13,275, 13,871, 13,984, and 14,006. In the present opinion, rendered in No. 13,276, we will consider and determine all the points made in all the appeals, and judgments will be rendered in the appeals based upon the other transcripts

according to the conclusions declared in this opinion. (The references here made to the transcript refer to transcript 13,276, unless otherwise stated.)

I. Specific Tracts. At various times individual tenants in common, owning large undivided interests in the ranch, undertook by grant, bargain, and sale deeds, to convey the whole of particular parts of the ranch described by metes and bounds, or other sufficient description, as though the grantor owned in severalty the particular part conveyed. The lands described in these conveyances are called "specific tracts." There are more than a hundred of such tracts, and they are designated in the findings by numbers. The court below found that these specific tracts, conveyed by deeds purporting to convey the whole title, "should be allotted and set apart in partition as a portion of the shares and interests of such co-tenants, and in such manner as to make such deeds effectual as conveyances of the whole title to such segregated parcels, if the same can be done without material injury to the rights and interests of other co-tenants who did not join in such conveyances, or those claiming under such other co-tenants, or any of them; and the tracts so conveyed are to be charged in proportion to their value to the interests in said rancho of the said grantors." This finding is attacked as erroneous by some of the appellants, who contend—First, that such a conveyance is void; and, second, that, if not void, the grantee under it of a specific tract should take, on partition, only such a share as is equal to the undivided interest which the granting co-tenant had in such specific tract. Upon this subject it is declared in section 764 of the Code of Civil Procedure as follows: "Whenever it shall appear, in an action for partition of lands, that one or more of the tenants in common, being the owner of an undivided interest in the tract of land sought to be partitioned, has sold to another person a specific tract by metes and bounds out of the common land, and executed to the purchaser a deed of conveyance purporting to convey the whole title to such specific tract to the purchaser in fee-simple and in severalty, the land described in such deed shall be allotted and set apart in partition to such purchaser, his heirs and assigns, or in such other manner as shall make such deed effectual as a conveyance of the whole title to such segregated parcel, if such tract or tracts of land can be so allotted or set apart without material injury to the rights and interests of the other co-tenants who may not have joined in such conveyance." If this section of the Code controls in the case at bar, then the question under discussion must be answered adversely to the contention of appellants. But the part of the section above quoted was not enacted until 1876; and, as the conveyances here involved were made prior to that time, it is contended by appellants that the said provision of the Code is not applicable to this case. Of course, if this amendment to the section was an entirely new provision, and completely changed the old law upon the subject, it would not be retroactive, and could not destroy or seriously disturb prior vested rights. But, in our opinion, the law was substantially the same before the amendment as after it. From a general statutory enactment not expressing a design to change the law there arises no necessary presumption that the law was different before the enactment. It was said at a very early date in the history of our jurisprudence that "to know what the common law was before the making of a statute, whereby it may be known whether the statute be introductory of a new law or only affirmatory of the common law, is the very lock and key to set open the windows of a statute," and that "in all general matters the law presumes the act did not intend to make any alteration." These rules were approved by our predecessors, the learned Justice FIELD delivering the opinion of the court, in Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 95, 96. Statutes are frequently intended to remove all doubt and uncertainty as to some principle of law, and to state, in apt, distinct, and explicit language, what the law is upon a particular subject; and we think that such was the effect of the amendment which we are now considering. In the same amendment it was also enacted, for the first time, that, when a co-tenant had made improvements on a part of the common land, that part should be allotted to him, on partition, without considering the value of such improvements, if the same could be done without material injury to the other co-tenants; but it is not contended that such was not the law before the amendment. In Seale v. Soto, 35 Cal. 102, (decided in 1868,) the lower court had ordered in its interlocutory decree "that there be set off to the said several parties such portions of said premises as will include their respective improvements, provided, always, that the rights or interests of neither of the other parties be prejudiced thereby;" and this court held, on appeal, that the order was "equitable, just, and proper," and "cannot be successfully assailed."

The decision of this court on the former appeal, if not declaring, as the law of the case, that the rule laid down in section 764 should govern, is at least strong authority to that point. Mr. Justice THORNTON, who delivered the leading opinion in the case, when giving reasons for the proposition that an interlocutory decree should determine the rights of all the parties, urges, as an argument, the consideration that otherwise the provisions of section 764 could not be carried out. He quotes the section in full, and says: "We cannot see how these provisions can be carried out by the referees unless the interest of each party is ascertained by the court and stated specifically in the decree. And when the decree for partition is made, as it is in this case, the court must determine under which of the original co-tenants each party claims, and state it in the decree, so that the referees can perceive clearly and be enabled to execute the provisions in section 764 when inserted in the decree." None of the other justices dissent from this part of the opinion, although Mr. Justice Ross holds that it was sufficient, in the first instance, to determine the shares and interests of the original co-tenants. The concurring opinion of Mr. Justice McKEE merely fortifies the opinion of Justice THORNTON as to the proper character of the interlocutory decree, and says, among other things, as follows: "The next step in order is to ascertain and determine the respective rights and interests of each of the tenants in common in the mode prescribed by sections 763, 765, and 769 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and adjudge partition between them according to their respective rights." Moreover, in the findings of the district court which were then under the review of this court, there was a finding on the subject of specific tracts to the precise effect, and in the identical language, of the finding of the superior court which we are now considering, and the superior court was directed to "proceed upon the findings heretofore made and herein approved." Therefore, whether or not the decision can be taken as a direct adjudication of this point, it is evident that, in the judgment of the court at that time, the true rule on the subject is that declared in section 764. And we are satisfied, upon principle and authority, that such is the correct rule.

It is clear that a deed made by one co-tenant conveying a specific part of the land of the co-tenancy is not void. That was definitely settled in Stark v. Barrett, 15 Cal. 362. In that case one of the co-tenants (Vaca) had undertaken to convey all his right, title, and interest in and to a tract containing 1,500 acres, being a part of the common land; and it was argued, and authorities cited to the point, that the conveyance was void because it destroyed the unity of possession, because it impaired the right of the other co-tenants to partition, and imposed additional burdens on them when seeking partition, etc. But the court, after reviewing the authorities, held definitely that such a conveyance was not void, although, as against the other co-tenants, the grantee might lose his rights on partition. And, of course, where, as in the case at bar, a co-tenant undertakes to convey the whole title to a specific tract, his conveyance, under well-settled principles, operates as an alienation of, at least, all the right and interest which the grantor had in the specific tract; so that he comes within the rule that his conveyance is not void, as established in Stark v. Barrett. Freem. Co-Tenancy, § 204 et seq. Furthermore, when a co-tenant undertakes by a bargain and sale deed to grant a specific tract in severalty, although his deed will not convey the interests of his co-tenants, he is estopped under well-settled rules from denying, as against his grantee, that he owned a less interest than his deed purports to convey. And, under equally well-settled rules, if he afterwards acquires the title of his co-tenants in the specific tract, such title will inure to the benefit of his grantee; and if, upon partition, such specific tract be allotted to him, then it happens that he does acquire his co-tenants' title, and it passes to his grantee.

But a suit in partition under our Code is, in its nature and essence, equitable, (Emery v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 619, 2 Pac. Rep. 418; Gates v. Salmon, 35 Cal. 593;) and the court in its decree, proceeding to do what is "equitable, just, and proper," will not only allot to a co-tenant that part of the common land upon which he has valuable improvements, but will also set apart a specific tract to the share of a co-partner who has undertaken to convey the title in fee to such tract in severalty, so that the grantee may have that which is justly his, when such disposition of the land can be made "without material injury to the rights and interests of the other co-tenants." See 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 656c; Freem. Co-Tenancy, §§ 202-205; McKee v. Barley, 11 Grat. 340; Campau v. Godfrey, 18 Mich. 27; Holcomb v. Coryell, 11 N. J. Eq. 548; Nichols v. Smith, 22 Pick. 319.

There are no decisions in this state which assert a different rule. Gates v. Salmon (reported in 35 and also in 46 Cal.) is cited on both sides. In the case as reported in 35 Cal., the only point decided is that, in a suit for partition, grantees of specific tracts are necessary parties to the action; and the views expressed in the opinion on the general subject are in harmony with the conclusion above stated. In the case as reported in 46 Cal., it is stated that the grantees of specific tracts, under certain deeds, acquired the interests which their grantors had at the time of the execution of the deeds; but the character of such deeds does not appear, nor, in the confused state of the pleadings and issues and parties in that case, does it appear against whom the statement is intended to apply, or between what parties the question was raised. Of course, one tenant in common cannot, as against his co-tenants, absolutely convey away the interests of the latter in any part of the common land. In Pfeiffer v. Regents, 74 Cal. 156, 15 Pac. Rep. 622, a tenant in common had undertaken to grant to a stranger the right to perpetually divert water from the common land upon the several land of the grantee; and in support of that grant the respondent had cited Stark v. Barrett and Gates v. Salmon and other cases in which the rule applicable to conveyances of specific tracts was discussed, and had sought to invoke that doctrine in behalf of the asserted water-right. And it was in that connection that the court said that the former decisions on the subject should not be pushed further; that is, that they should not be so extended as to embrace the asserted right of one tenant in common to create an easement on the common land. The case, however, recognizes the rule as hereinbefore stated. (It may be remarked, as was said in that case, that it appears, from many cases in the California Reports, to have been a common custom among the owners of large Mexican grants in California for individual co-tenants to convey specific parcels of the common land. The custom probably grew out of the fact that during the long periods of time necessary to complete titles, to obtain patents, and to make partitions there could be but little beneficial use of the land, unless it were segregated into parcels by the co-tenants and their grantees.) Our conclusion on this point is that the court below was right in holding that specific tracts embraced in deeds purporting to convey the whole title should be allotted in severalty to the grantees therein, and charged, respectively, to the shares and interests of the granting co-tenants, where it could be done without material injury to the rights of the co-tenants not joining in such deeds, in manner asset forth in the findings and decree.

2. There were also quitclaim deeds of interest in specific tracts; and with respect to them the court found as follows: "And it further appearing that various of said co-tenants sold fractional undivided interests in specific tracts out of the common land of said rancho, and executed to the purchasers deeds of conveyance purporting to convey interests in such specific tracts to the purchasers in fee, the interests described in such deeds should be allotted and set apart in partition to such purchasers, or their grantees, respectively, in such manner as to make such deeds effectual as conveyances of such interests, if the same can be done without material injury to the rights and interests of other co-tenants who did not join in such conveyances, or those claiming under such other co-tenants, or any of them; and the interests so conveyed, and hereinafter designated as fractional interests of specific tracts, are to be charged in proportion to their value to the interests in said rancho of the same grantors." We see no error in this finding. The grantee in such a deed cannot expect, or legally claim, more than the deed purports to convey, which is merely the share of the grantor in the tract. The contention of some of the appellants that such a deed should be filled by an allotment of the whole tract in severalty cannot be maintained, and where there is a covenant of warranty in such a deed it attaches merely to the interest which the deed purports to convey. Kimball v. Semple, 25 Cal. 441; Gee v. Moore, 14 Cal. 472; Morrison v. Wilson, 30 Cal. 344; San Francisco v. Lawton, 18 Cal. 465; Barrett v. Birge, 50 Cal. 655; Brannock v. Monroe, 65 Cal. 491, 4 Pac. Rep. 488.

II. Appeals of Maraschi et al., on Transcript 13,275. The views and conclusions above expressed on the subject of specific tracts, and the distinction between a deed purporting to convey the whole tract in severalty and a deed purporting to convey only the grantor's interest in the tract, are determinative, against the appellants, of the appeals taken from the interlocutory decree by appellants Maraschi, Ruth Ann Boyd, administratrix, Boorman, administrator, et al., and by appellants Pitman, Gill and Mayhew; all founded on transcript No. 13,275. We have carefully examined the able brief of counsel for those appellants, in which it is argued that the grantees in certain deeds which do not purport to convey more than the interests of the grantors in certain specific tracts should have allotted to them the whole of said tracts; but we do not think it necessary to discuss that question any further. In addition to what we have before said, it is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the law is correctly stated in section 764 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

2. And such views are also determinative against the appellants of the appeals taken by the appellants William Meyer, Richard O'Neil, et al., whose contention on this point has been very ably presented by their counsel.

3. The appeal of Pitman, Gill, et al., from an order denying them a new trial, based on the record in transcript No. 13,984, presents no point not raised by their appeal from the interlocutory decree.

III. Specific Tract No. 41. The court found that specific tract No. 41 should be allotted to John Davis; and appellant Emily S. Tewksbury contends that the part of the decree so allotting said tract is erroneous. John Davis derails title to said specific tract No. 41 through a deed from James T. Dean; and the title of Dean came through a deed to him from Gabriel Castro and his wife, Marcelina Castro, made on August 20, 1853. This latter deed was duly executed in every respect, except this: the notary who took the acknowledgment failed to certify that the wife acknowledged it "on examination apart from and without the hearing of her husband." Therefore, if, at the date of the deed, the title to said tract No. 41 was in the wife, Marcelina, it did not pass to Dean; but if the title was then in the husband, Gabriel, it did pass to Dean. Appellant contends that the title was then in the wife, because on November 15, 1851, Gabriel Castro (under whom both parties claim) and his wife made a deed to one Jesus Acosta, which, as is contended, embraced said tract No. 41, and on the same day said Acosta executed a deed to the said wife, Marcelina, which, as is contended, also embraced said tract. These two last deeds were without consideration, and were intended to consummate a gift from the husband to the wife. These deeds were recorded; but the court finds that Dean purchased in good faith, for a valuable consideration, and without notice of said deeds.

We think that said deed from Gabriel Castro and his wife to Acosta did not convey said specific tract No. 41. In the first place there was no description in said deed which embraced said tract. The only description, or attempted description, of land in said deed is as follows: "All our right, title, and interest in and to all the land inherited by us, or either of us, from Francisco Maria Castro, the father of said Gabriel Castro." There is no reference to the San Pablo rancho, nor is there any description by metes and bounds, or by common name, or by any sort of designation by which real property is usually described. There is no mention of any county, state, or nation. The whole of the force, point, and virtue of the alleged description rests solely on the word "inherited." But Gabriel Castro, son of Francisco Maria Castro, did not really inherit any part of the San Pablo rancho from his father. If any interest in the ranch passed to the son from the father, it passed by the will of the latter, in which there was the following clause.

"I order, and it is my will, to leave, as in fact I do leave and give, all my property, rights, and actions, together with all the land of my Rancho San Pablo, to my wife one-half, and the remaining half equally between my legitimate sons and daughters, each being owner of his equal part or share of the effects." 64 Cal. 549, 2 Pac. Rep. 426. But one who gets property by will does not inherit; he takes by purchase, and not by descent. We are well aware that, in construing deeds and other contracts, the strict legal meaning of a word will not be adhered to where the context fairly shows that a different meaning was intended; but where there is no such context, and the word alone is relied on, it is difficult to see why it should be given any other than its legal meaning. Moreover, the grant for which Francisco Maria Castro made several applications in his life-time included only three square leagues. (It is not necessary here to linger over the question whether any grant was ever made of any land to said Francisco. The facts are stated in the original findings, and may be found in 64 Cal., commencing at page 543, and 2 Pac. Rep. 421. The real grant upon which title vested was made after his death to his wife and children, upon application of his son Joaquin I. Castro.) After the death of Francisco, his son Joaquin renewed his father's application for the three leagues; but, before any final action on that application, he made another application for four leagues. It was upon this final application that the only grant ever consummated was made, and there is no showing that specific tract No. 41 was within the land applied for by Francisco.

Again, we think that the certificate of acknowledgment of the deed from Gabriel Castro and wife to Acosta is fatally defective. It commences as follows: "Be it remembered that on the fifteenth day of November, A. D. 1851, before me, Gustavus Harper, one of the justices of the peace in and for said ———, came the above-named," etc.; and it is signed, "Gustavus Harper, J. P." This certificate shows neither venue nor jurisdiction. It does not appear from it of what county Harper was a justice, or whether he was a justice of any county, or in what county or state the acknowledgment was taken. The fact that the name of a certain state and county were written at the commencement of the deed has no more significance than the appearance of those names in the body of the deed, where they usually appear, would have had. Defects in certificates of acknowledgment should be usually overlooked as much as possible in furtherance of justice; but in this case the defect is radical, and, so far as we can see, to condone it would not be in the interest of justice. We do not think that the allotment of specific tract No. 41 to John Davis was erroneous.

IV. Title of Ann Wilson to Specific Tract No. 42. The court allotted this tract to Ann R. Wilson; and with respect to that matter appellant Emily Tewksbury, on her appeal from the order denying her motion for a new trial, contends that the court erred in excluding from evidence a paper claimed to be a certified copy of a deed from Juan Jose Castro to his wife, Petra Bernal Castro, dated July 15, 1852, and recorded November 1st of the same year. But appellant Tewksbury is in no position to present that point. The deed was offered in evidence by defendant Gutierrez through her attorney, George E. Lawrence, and was objected to on various grounds by the defendant Mary E. Wakeman, and also by some other parties. When the objection was sustained, an exception was taken by said Gutierrez alone, through her said attorney, Lawrence. On a subsequent day the defendant William Leviston asked in his name to have the benefit of the exception taken by Gutierrez, and his request was allowed. The proceedings with respect to the point are to be found in transcript No. 14,006, from folio 8,235 to 8,248; and there is nothing there to show that appellant Tewksbury excepted or took any step in the matter. Neither Gutierrez nor Leviston moved for a new trial. The point, therefore, does not arise on Tewksbury's appeal from the order denying a new trial, and her counsel have probably come to take that view, for in their reply brief they make no answer to the position as above stated, taken by Hittell and Belcher, counsel for respondents. It is not necessary, therefore, to discuss the objections made to the introduction of said deed; but we may say that, if the question were before us, we would be strongly inclined to hold that there was no error in excluding the deed.

V. Tewksbury Tax-Deeds. At the first trial the district court found that several tax-deeds upon which Jacob M. Tewksbury relied for title to various parts of, and interest in, the ranch, were invalid; but this court held, on the former appeal, that the findings of fact as to those tax-titles were insufficient. At the trial in the superior court the facts were fully found, and the said deeds were again found to be of no value. Appellant Emily Tewksbury now attacks the findings as to two of those deeds, viz., the deed as to C. T. Pollard of one-eighth of the rancho, dated August 25, 1856, and the deed to J. M. Tewksbury of a specific tract of 213 acres, dated October 5, 1860. With respect to these deeds it may be sufficient to say, in support of the judgment, that the court found as follows: "At the said several times that the said Jacob M. Tewksbury acquired or pretended to acquire interests in the said San Pablo ranch, or any part thereof, as hereinbefore stated, (under the tax-sales,) he became or was a tenant in common in the whole of said rancho with said Martina Castro de Alvarado, and others;" and that there was evidence to support this finding. Tewksbury, therefore, being an owner, and being under "a legal or moral obligation to pay the taxes, he could not, by neglecting to pay the same and allowing the land to be sold in consequence of such neglect, add to or strengthen his title by purchasing at the sale himself, or by buying from a stranger who purchased at the sale." Moss v. Shear, 25 Cal. 45.

There are other reasons why the tax-sales were not valid, which we notice briefly.

1. The deed to Pollard was made under the revenue act of May 15, 1854, (St. 1854, p. 88.) Appellant merely introduced the tax-deed, relying upon it as making a prima facie case, and introduced no other evidence. Section 90 of the said act of 1854 provided that the deed should be prima facie evidence of certain things, but section 55 of the revenue act of April 29, 1857, expressly repealed said section 90 of the act of 1854. St. 1857, p. 344. And in the absence of the effect given to the deed as evidence by the statute, proof of the preliminary steps necessary to vest the power of sale was essential. Keane v. Cannovan, 21 Cal. 291. In the case of Moss v. Shear, supra, cited by appellant, the point that the tax-deed was not prima facie evidence was not made by counsel or noticed by the court. The other cases cited were under the act of 1857.

Furthermore, the assessment was invalid because the owner was Castro, and the assessment was made to "Castero." People v. Whipple, 47 Cal. 591; Crawford v. Schmidt, Id. 617; Kelsey v. Abbott, 13 Cal. 609; Smith v. Davis, 30 Cal. 537. Lake Co. v. Mining Co., 66 Cal. 17, 4 Pac. Rep. 876, is also to the same point; for while the tax-sale involved there was governed by the subsequent amendment to the revenue law, which provided that a mistake in the name of the owner of real property should not invalidate the assessment, (Pol. Code, § 3628.) the court applied the rule to the assessment of personal property; and held that a mistake in the name of the owner, less important than the one in the case at bar, was fatal, saying that "in making the assessment the provisions of the statute under which it is to be made must be observed with particularity." It is contended by appellant that "Castero" sounds like "Castro," and by respondents that in pronouncing the former name the accent should be on the second syllable, thus making the sound entirely different; but it is not a case to which the rule of idem sonans applies. Tax proceedings are in invitum, and, to be valid, must closely follow the statute; and idem sonans applies to cases of pleas of misnomer and issues of identity, where the question is whether the change of letters alters the sound, not to assessments, and other cases of description, where the written name is material. "Different letters will make different names, though the sound be the same." Com. v. Gillespie, 7 Serg. & R. 478. The deed to Pollard described the land sold as having been assessed to "Castro," and does not purport to be made in pursuance of an assessment to "Castero." The assessment was invalid because on the original assessment roll there was nothing to show what valuation had been put on the land and improvement attempted to be assessed to Castero; and on the duplicate roll referred to in the deed there is nothing whatever to show what was meant or intended by the figures in any of the columns headed "value" or "taxes." The exhibits there referred to are to be found in the original of transcript 13,276. The duplicate roll is the tax collector's warrant. Act 1854, §§ 85, 88. There are other objections to the assessment and deed not necessary to be here noticed.

2. The tax-deed to Tewksbury of the specific tract of 213 acres, founded on proceedings under the revenue act of 1857, was also valueless, because the assessment upon which it was based was invalid. With respect to this assessment the court finds—both as to the original assessment, and the duplicate roll—that "there is no dollar mark, word, abbreviation, or other character or thing in said book, or any page thereof, to show what was meant or intended by the figures in the columns headed 'Value' or 'Tax.' That such a defect is fatal to an assessment has been too long the established law to be now questioned: it has become a rule of property. Hurlbutt v. Butenop, 27 Cal. 57; Brady v. Seamen, 30 Cal. 611; People v. Savings Union, 31 Cal. 132; People v. Hastings, 34 Cal. 571; People v. Hollister, 47 Cal. 408. We think, also, that the attempted description of the property sought to be assessed was fatally defective; but we do not deem it necessary to discuss that question here.

VI. Specific Tract No. 30. On June 1, 1859, Joseph Boyd and wife executed a deed to J. M. Tewksbury, describing a certain part of the ranch, containing 99 acres, which was afterwards designated as "Specific Tract No. 30." The court held that this deed carried only the undivided interest which Boyd then had; and appellant contends that the court erred in not holding that it carried the whole tract in severalty. This point is very meagerly argued. The general counsel for respondents say that it "specially concerns respondent Boyd, and will be very fully and ably argued by her counsel;" but we do not find it to be fully argued anywhere. The finding of the court represents that the deed contained some words purporting to grant, bargain, and sell the described tract; but it also contained these words: "Being the same land derived to the said party of the first part by a deed from Martina Perez, dated September 6, 1858." And the said deed from Martina Perez to Boyd only purports to convey "all the right, title, and interest"—being an undivided interest—in said specific tract No. 30. At the time of the deed from Boyd to Tewksbury, Boyd did not own any interest as a co-tenant in the San Pablo rancho. The only interest which he owned was the undivided interest in said specific tract No. 30, which he had obtained under said deed from Martina Perez, although several years afterwards he did acquire a similar undivided interest in the rancho, equal to 100 acres. He was therefore not in the position of one to whom the rule as stated in section 764 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies; that is, he was not one who, "being the owner of an undivided interest in the tract of land sought to be partitioned, has sold to another person a specific tract by metes and bounds out of the common land." Moreover, on the same day on which said deed was made by Boyd to Tewksbury, the latter made a deed to Boyd of all his (Tewksbury's) interest in another specific tract of the rancho, and there is reason to believe, as contended by respondent, that the transaction between the parties was merely one of exchange. Tewksbury knew that the only interest which Boyd had in tract 30 was that which he had derived from Martina Perez, as stated in the deed itself; Boyd had no general interest in the rancho which he could concentrate upon the particular tract; and, as there is no evidence before us showing what circumstances there were to indicate the understanding and intention of the parties, we do not see how we can hold that the court erred in determining that the said deed was only intended to convey, and did only convey, Boyd's undivided interest in said specific tract No. 30.

VII. The Dall Claim to Specific Tract No. 115. Appellant George W. Haight contends that this tract passed from the original co-tenant, Victor Castro, to John H. Dall, (and through Dall to said appellant,) and that the court erred in not so holding. The court held that the interest claimed by Dall passed to Ephraim Leonard by virtue of the foreclosure of a mortgage made to him by said Victor Castro, and we think that the court was right. On April 21, 1853, the said Victor Castro executed and delivered to said Leonard a mortgage, with covenants of warranty, of all Castro's right, title, and interest, in law or in equity, in the rancho, and all his improvements on the same, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note of even date given by Castro to Leonard; which mortgage was duly recorded April 21, 1853. But five days prior thereto, viz., on April 16, 1853, said Castro had executed to said Dall a deed purporting to convey said tract No. 115. This deed, however, was not recorded until June 9, 1853; and, at the time of the execution, delivery, and recording of said mortgage to Leonard, the latter "had no knowledge of said previously mentioned deed of said Victor Castro to said John H. Dall." There are also these other facts: In November, 1852, Castro and Dall entered into a written contract by which Dall was to build a second story on the dwelling-house of Castro on the ranch, and Castro was to pay Dall $2,000, and to convey to him 100 acres of land, situated on the ranch; the 100 acres, however, not being described or located. In pursuance of this contract Castro, before April 1, 1853, paid Dall the $2,000, and put him in possession of a tract of land on the ranch which was afterwards designated as "Specific Tract No. 115." Before April 1, 1853, Dall leased said land to Charles H. H. Cook and E. W. Hiller. "Said Cook had, prior to the making of said contract between said Victor Castro and said Dall, and prior to and up to the making of said lease, lived and resided on said San Pablo rancho, acting as the servant and looking after the interest of said Victor Castro." Cook and Hiller were in the actual occupation of said tract of land at the time of the making of the said note and mortgage to Leonard. On the 16th day of April, 1853, one Smiley, who was the authorized agent of Dall, surrendered the said contract of purchase to Castro; and Castro on the same day executed and delivered to Smiley, for Dall, the deed before mentioned. On May 13, 1856, Leonard commenced an action to foreclose his mortgage, making Dall a party defendant, with the usual averment that Dall claimed some interest, etc., in the premises, and that such interest, if any he had, was subsequent, etc., to the mortgage. Dall answered, setting up his said contract of purchase of 1852, his possession, and his said deed of April 16, 1853, his alleged priority under the same, and averring that plaintiff had notice of his title. The court, in due course, rendered judgment for plaintiff, adjudging and decreeing, among other things, that plaintiff had no notice of Dall's asserted title, and barring and foreclosing all the latter's right, title, interest, and equity of redemption in and to the mortgaged premises, and every part thereof. Under this judgment the premises were duly sold, and Leonard, becoming the purchaser, received in due course a sheriff's deed thereof. So far as appellant stands upon his unrecorded deed alone, the question is, we think, of easy solution. There is considerable abstruse learning to be found in the books on the question, who are proper parties in a foreclosure suit, and whose titles or interests can be adjudicated in such suit? In McComb v. Spangler, 71 Cal. 418, 12 Pac. Rep. 347, the rule was laid down that "the only proper parties are the mortgagor and mortgagee, and those who have acquired rights under them subsequent to the mortgage." In that case the wife alone had executed a mortgage on community property; the husband was made a party defendant to the foreclosure suit, and made default; and it was held that he was not estopped by the decree, because his claim to the land was "adverse and paramount to that of the mortgagor." But to apply that rule to the case of a prior unrecorded deed of the mortgagor would be to entirely ignore the statutes about recodation, and destroy the protection which they give, and upon which a purchaser may securely rely. Those statutes, at that time, provided that "every conveyance of real estate within the state hereafter made, which shall not be recorded as provided in this act, shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, of the same real estate, or any portion thereof, when his own conveyance shall be first duly recorded;" and that "the term 'conveyance,' as used in this act, shall be construed to embrace" a mortgage. Dall's deed, therefore, as against Leonard's mortgage, was void. As against Leonard it had no existence before its recodation in June following; and whatever right he could then assert under it was "subsequent to the mortgage," and could properly be subjected to the foreclosure suit.

2. It is contended, however, that because Dall's tenants, Cook and Hiller, were in possession, therefore Leonard must be held to have had notice of Dall's claim under his contract and deed. But the court finds that Leonard had no notice of such contract or deed; and, as there was no motion for a new trial, that finding is conclusive." The force of the finding of this ultimate fact is not broken by the finding about the possession. It is to be observed that the statute makes no exception in favor of a party in possession, and the courts had to exercise some liberality of construction to make such exception. The philosophy upon which it was founded was this: That where a third party was in the open and conspicuous possession of the land conveyed, with nothing to indicate that he was not holding adversely to the grantor, the grantee, although a purchaser "for a valuable consideration," should not, in view of such pronounced hostile possession, be deemed to be a purchaser "in good faith." But the authorities on the subject in this state—many of which are cited in the briefs—go only this far: that such possession is evidence of notice, and puts the purchaser on inquiry. It is not, ipso facto, notice, but merely evidence tending to show notice. The first thorough discussion of the subject in this state is to be found in Hunter v. Watson, 12 Cal. 363. In that case the learned Justice BALDWIN, in delivering the opinion of the court, says that the question is "full of embarrassment," and comes to a conclusion with great hesitancy. He suggests "whether the statutes of registration should not be thoroughly revised, so as to secure uniform and certain rules for the disposition and protection of real estate in the future." After reviewing the authorities, he says that "some of the cases hold that mere possession is actual notice, and will not suffer any proof to be made to the contrary; other, and perhaps the greater number, hold that it is only a presumption of notice which may be rebutted; and others, again, hold that the possession is not so much notice of the title of the holder as a circumstance which should put the purchaser on inquiry;" and the utmost conclusion to which he comes is that "open, notorious possession of real estate, by one having an unrecorded deed for it, is evidence of notice to a subsequent purchaser of the first vendee's title;" and that "the possession must exist at the time of the acquisition of title or deed of the subsequent vendee." The rule, however, was modified and more fully explained in subsequent cases. Fair v. Stevenot, 29 Cal. 489, is a leading case on the subject. In that case Mr. Justice RHODES, delivering the opinion of the court, discusses the question very thoroughly, and says, among other things, as follows: "The fact of possession is only evidence tending to prove notice. Neither the recorded deed in the one case, nor the possession of the grantee of the unrecorded deed in the other, is the ultimate fact, but notice is the ultimate fact to be established by the evidence. Upon proof being made of the record of the deed, the notice necessarily results by operation of law; but not so upon proof of the possession, for the possession may be taken and held in such various modes, and accompanied by so many qualified circumstances, that each case must depend upon its own peculiar features, and therefore proof of possession is not decisive, without regard to the other facts of the case." In Pico v. Gallar-

do, 52 Cal. 206, [the court cites Fair v. Stevenot, and says: "The court below found that, at the date of the sale and conveyance to plaintiff, the defendants were in possession of the demanded premises. Such possession was not notice of the defendants' equities, but only evidence tending to prove notice." Smith v. Yule, 31 Cal. 180, is also to the same point, and the opinion in that case is very full and instructive. See, also, Thompson v. Pioche, 44 Cal. 516. The above cases state the true rule, and a close examination of the other California cases will disclose nothing in conflict therewith, although there is a dictum to the contrary in Talbert v. Singleton, 42 Cal. 395.

Of course, where it is claimed that the circumstances of possession in a particular case are sufficient to show notice, and that the court or jury erred in finding otherwise, such finding can be reviewed on a statement or bill of exceptions which brings up the evidence; but in the case at bar there was no motion for a new trial, (as to this matter,) and there is no evidence before us. It does appear that prior to and almost up to the very time of the execution of the mortgage, Cook, who was in possession, "resided on said San Pablo rancho, acting as the servant and looking after the interest of said Victor Castro;" and it may have appeared that Leonard had the right to suppose that the servant was acting for the master, and that, therefore, there was no such want of "good faith" as would make an exception to the statutory rule. In Smith v. Yule, supra, a case quite similar to the one at bar, the court say that "inquiry does not become a duty where the apparent possession is consistent with the title appearing of record," and that "the subsequent purchaser is not justly chargeable with fraud in failing to make inquiry for a prior unrecorded conveyance, unless there is some fact or circumstance, apparent to his observation, calculated to excite the suspicion of a prudent man, dealing with the property, that a prior conveyance had been made." At all events, in the case at bar, the court found as an ultimate fact that there was no notice; and, the evidence upon which the finding was based not being before us, the finding cannot be disturbed. Moreover, we think that Dall's claim of possession and notice to Leonard was conclusively adjudicated against him in the foreclosure suit. Having set up said notice in his answer, and the court having found and decreed against him, he was, in our opinion, notwithstanding some confusion of authorities on the general subject,—concluded.

VIII. Specific Tract No. 78. Specific tract No. 78 is a small tract containing 30.47 acres, and appellant Leviston contends that the court should have allotted 27 acres of said tract to him, as successor of Martina Castro, and should have charged the same to the interest and share of respondent Maria L. Velasco, and that the court erred in not so doing. The facts on this point, are, briefly, these: In July, 1873, said Martina Castro and Petra Bernal de Castro (Martina being the daughter, and Petra being the wife, of Juan Jose Castro, one of the original tenants in common) made a mortgage of all their interest in the rancho to said respondent Velasco. At the date of this mortgage, neither Martina nor Petra had any interest in the rancho, their interest having been exhausted prior to that time. (This last statement seems to be verified by the findings on the Juan Jose share and interest; at all events, the statement is made by counsel for respondent, and is not controverted by counsel for appellant.) In 1878, Mrs. Velasco commenced an action to foreclose the mortgage; but while the action was pending she dismissed it as against said Martina Castro upon an agreement that Martina should convey to Velasco a specific parcel of 300 acres, and that Velasco should reconvey to Martina, out of this parcel, a certain specific piece of 27 acres,—the said 27 acres being the tract here now in controversy. In pursuance of this agreement, deeds were interchanged between the parties at the same time, and as one transaction, no money consideration being paid by either. Velasco got nothing through her deed from Martina of the 300 acres, and, of course, conveyed back no title to the 27 of that 300 acres. The whole transaction was practically a nullity. Velasco proceeded with her foreclosure suit against said Petra, and, obtaining a decree, had all Petra's interest in the rancho sold under it. Velasco became the purchaser at the sheriff's sale, and under the sheriff's deed she got possession of a small piece of land, not being a part of the 300 acres or of the 27 acres mentioned in the said deeds between said Velasco and said Martina. Upon this small piece of land, obtained under said sheriff's deed as aforesaid, Velasco made valuable improvements. Several years after the above occurrences, viz., on September 7, 1885, Velasco purchased from the holders of an entirely different share, viz., the Alvarado share, an undivided 80-acre interest in the rancho. (This purchase was in all probability made in order that she might have some title to concentrate upon the small tract which she took possession of under the sheriff's deed, and upon which she made her improvements, as she got no title thereto under said deed.) And now appellant contends that under the general principle applied to sales of specific tracts by co-tenants of the whole rancho, as stated in section 764 of the Code of Civil Procedure, this 80 acres undivided interest thus afterwards acquired by Mrs. Velasco, in 1885, should be applied to making good and filling the said deed for 27 acres made by her to Martina, in 1879. It is evident, however, (1) that this contention of appellant does not bring him within the rule as stated in section 764; and (2) that it is entirely outside the equitable considerations upon which the principle contended for is founded. As Martina could not satisfy any part of her deed to Velasco for the 300 acres, she (and her grantee) cannot be heard to demand satisfaction of the deed of a part of said 300 acres which she, at the same time, received back from Velasco. It was the evident intention of the parties to the transaction that the one interest should be satisfied out of the other, and that the title which Velasco conveyed back to Martina was no other or greater than the title which Martina conveyed to Velasco; and it is the intent of the parties which controls a court of equity in working out fair and just results. To hold that, under these circumstances, Velasco, while getting nothing from the deed for 300 acres, should be compelled to make good her return deed to Martina of a part of that 300 acres, would be to hold just the reverse of that which is "equitable, just, and proper." If the doctrine of estoppel be invoked, then each party would be estopped by her own deed, and the one estoppel would neutralize the other. Carpenter v. Thompson, 3 N. H. 204; Kimball v. Schoff, 40 N. H. 190. Our conclusion is that the court below did not err in its disposition of said 27 acres of specific tract 78. (The court did give a small fractional part of said 27 acres to appellant; but, as Velasco does not appeal from this part of the decree, the correctness of that ruling of the court is not before us.)

IX. Appeal of E. Kirkpatrick. This appeal rests on the contention that the court erred in holding that the attempted record of a deed from James B. and Henry V. Alvarado to A. B. Patrick, dated December 6, 1879, did not impart constructive notice to McLaughlin, the grantor of respondents, who purchased the same land from the same grantors a few months later. McLaughlin purchased for a stated sum of money, which was the "full value" of the land; and at the time he purchased and recorded his deed he had "no actual notice or knowledge, or notice or knowledge in fact," of the said deed to Patrick, "or of any fact, matter, or thing which might, could, would or should put him on inquiry concerning the same," but was "wholly ignorant of said deed of conveyance." No equities are shown in favor of said Patrick, and the only question is whether his attempted record of his deed must be held to be conclusive constructive notice to McLaughlin. We think that the court was right in holding that it did not impart such notice, on account of the insufficiency of the certificate of acknowledgment. Section 1213 of the Civil Code provides that a conveyance of real property shall be constructive notice of its contents to subsequent purchasers when it is acknowledged, or proved, "and certified and recorded, as prescribed by law." Section 1170 provides that "an instrument is deemed to be recorded, when, being duly acknowledged or proved, and certified, it is deposited in the recorder's office with the proper officer for record." Section 1161 provides: "Before an instrument can be recorded, * * * its execution must be acknowledged by the person executing it, * * * or proved by a subscribing witness, * * * and the acknowledgment or proof certified in the manner prescribed by article 3 of this chapter." In said article 3 it is provided that an acknowledgment may be made "within the city, city and county, county, or district for which the officer was elected or appointed," before either of several officers, including a notary public. Section 1181. Said article also provides a form of a certificate of acknowledgment, which must be substantially followed, and indorsed on or attached to the instrument, and which requires that "the name and quality of the officer" taking the acknowledgment must be in the certificate. Sections 1188, 1189. It is also provided that "officers taking and certifying acknowledgments * * * must authenticate their certificates by affixing thereto their signatures, followed by the names of their offices; also their seals of office," if they are required to have seals. Section 1193. Now, the certificate of acknowledgment to the said deed to Patrick commences as follows: "State of California, city and county of San Francisco—ss.: On this eighth day of December, A. D. eighteen hundred and seventy-nine, before me, H. I. Tillotson, a notary public in and for said city and county." It is signed, "H. I. Tillotson, Notary Public." At the end of the certificate he says that he has hereunto "affixed my official seal," and he attaches a seal as follows: "[Seal.] H. I. Tillotson, Notary Public, Contra Costa County." The court finds that said Tillotson was not a notary public in and for said city and county of San Francisco, but was a notary in and for Contra Costa county, and that said grantors appeared before him in said last-named county, and there acknowledged said deed. It is evident that the material statements in the certificate are not true. The acknowledgment was not taken in the county of San Francisco, and the notary was not a notary of that county. The "name and quality of the officer taking the acknowledgment" was not "in the certificate," as provided by sections 1188, 1189, Civil Code; nor was the name of his office given, as required by section 1193. A notary is an officer of the county for which he has been appointed, and his proper official name is "notary public in and for" said county. Willard v. Cramer, 36 Iowa, 22. And if it be contended that a certificate, good on its face, is sufficient, although its material statements are false,—a dangerous doctrine,—still it is evident that the certificate in this case is not sufficient on its face. It states that the acknowledgment was taken in the county of San Francisco before a notary public of that county who certifies that he attaches to it his notarial seal, while the seal, and the only seal, that is attached to it is the seal of a notary public of the county of Contra Costa,—a direct failure to comply with section 1193. And so a view from any stand-point shows that the ruling of the trial court should not be disturbed. There is nothing to induce a leaning against the correctness of that ruling.

X. Specific Tract No. 90. It is contended by appellant Tewksbury that the court erred in allotting specific tract No. 90 to the grantees of William B. Fleming. On January 5, 1857, J. M. Tewksbury and Martina Perez executed a bargain and sale deed to said Fleming, purporting to convey to the latter the whole of said tract No. 90 in fee; but it is contended that said deed should be held valueless, because at its date said Tewksbury and Perez had no interests in the rancho, although they acquired such interests soon afterwards. It is contended by said appellant—at this particular point of her appeals—that J. M. Tewksbury acquired his earliest interest in the rancho on March 7th of the same year, through a deed to him made by said Fleming. It is to be noticed, however, that, at the date of said deed to Fleming, Tewksbury had an apparent title, and claimed to have the legal title, to the Antonio Castro interest in the rancho through the tax-deed to C. P. Pollard, heretofore noticed in this opinion; and that at said date said Martina Perez claimed to own the Joaquin Castro interest through the foreclosure of a mortgage and a sheriff's sale thereunder made to her March 11, 1856. In the deed, the land—afterwards designated as "Specific Tract No. 90"—is described as "being a portion of land set apart and allotted to certain parties named as the sixth part in the partition proceedings of 1856, hereinbefore mentioned;" and the principal parties of the sixth part were Joaquin Castro and his wife, Trinidad Pacheco de Castro. The deed contains the following covenant: "And the said parties of the first part, for themselves, heirs, executors, and administrators, do hereby also covenant, promise, and agree, to and with the said party of the second part, his heirs, and assigns, that neither they nor Joaquin Castro, nor Trinidad Pacheco, his wife, certain parties named as parties of the sixth part in the above-mentioned deed of partition, have made, done, constituted, executed, or suffered any act or acts, thing or things, whatever, whereby, or by means whereof, the above mentioned and described premises, or any part or parcel thereof, now are, or at any time hereafter shall or may be, impeached, charged, or incumbered in any manner or in any way whatever." Shortly afterwards, viz., on March 13, 1857, the said Fleming (having in the mean time become the owner of a certain undivided interest in the whole rancho, through a conveyance from Marcilla B. Bradley) executed and delivered to said J. M. Tewksbury, who accepted the same, a deed conveying to Tewksbury all Fleming's title and interest in the rancho, "excepting and reserving from the operation of this deed all that lot of land in said rancho known and designated on said Gray's map of said rancho as 'Lot A, Subdivision No. 109,' containing 214 acres of land;" being the said specific tract No. 90. It is quite clear that the intent was to convey a perfect title to said specific tract No. 90 to said Fleming, and to insure the same; and, in view of the circumstances, the appellant Tewksbury cannot now be heard to impeach said title. We see no error, therefore, in the disposition which the court below made of said specific tract No. 90.

XI. Appeals of Frank Webber et al. These appeals are from the interlocutory decree, and from an order denying a new trial, and rest, partly, upon the record in transcript No. 13,871. Appellants base their alleged rights in the rancho upon what is known as the "lawyers' title," which was connected with, and to some extent arose out of, an attempt at a partition of the rancho made in 1856. But said attempted partition, and said lawyers' title, were at full issue at the first trial in the district court. Evidence was introduced on the issues, and the court fully and clearly found and decided against the validity of both the partition and the said lawyers' title; and that "all subsequent acts and claims thereunder, or based thereon, were and are invalid and ineffective." On the appeal these questions were elaborately argued by counsel, and this court considered them at great length in its opinion, and affirmed the decision of the lower court. It did this, not only in express terms when discussing these very questions, but also when adjudicating what had been "correctly determined" by the district court. (The findings of the district court were full on this point, and they are set forth in detail in 64 Cal., from page 569 to page 584, and 2 Pac. Rep. 441-453.) We therefore consider the question raised by these appeals and about said "lawyers' title" as having been definitely settled on the former appeal, and shall not again discuss them. Counsel for appellants suggests the point that the opinion of Mr. Justice THORNTON, delivered on the former appeal, was not the decision of the court on these questions, because, as is contended, it was not concurred in by a majority of the justices; but the point is not tenable. That opinion was expressly concurred in, as a whole, by Chief Justice MORRISON and Justice MYRICK; and Justice ROSS also concurred, except as to the two questions upon which the opinion reverses the judgment. Justice THORNTON's opinion reverses the judgment for two reasons: (1) Because the findings as to certain taxes and judgments were deemed insufficient; and (2) because, under section 760 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the court below should have determined the interests of all the parties to the action, as well as those of the original co-tenants. Justice ROSS dissented upon these two points, and upon these alone; and held that the entire judgment of the court below should have been affirmed. He says: "I dissent from the judgment, and am of the opinion that the interlocutory decree appealed from should be affirmed, except with respect to the construction of section 760 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and to the findings in relation to taxes and judgments for taxes. I agree with the conclusions reached, and in much that is said in support of them, in the opinion of Mr. Justice THORNTON. I do not agree with the conclusions reached in the opinion in regard to the findings just alluded to, nor am I able to agree with my associates in their construction of section 760 of the Code of Civil Procedure." 64 Cal. 631, 2 Pac. Rep. 488. There are therefore four justices expressly concurring in the "conclusions reached" as to the partition of 1856 and the "lawyers' title." Moreover, Mr. Justice SHARPSTEIN concurs generally in the judgment, and in the conclusion "that the findings of the court below, with the exceptions specified by Mr. Justice THORNTON, ought not to be disturbed;" and Mr. Justice McKEE, in a separate opinion, concurs in the judgment, and makes additional arguments to the point that the interlocutory decree should have determined the rights of all the parties, but does not dissent from any conclusion stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice THORNTON.

2. These appellants contend, on their appeal from the order denying a new trial, that the court erred in refusing to allow appellants to file amendments to their answers. One of the grounds upon which the motion to make the amendments was resisted was unreasonable delay in presenting them; and we think that ground alone is abundantly sufficient to sustain the ruling of the court. The refusal of a trial court to allow an amendment to a pleading is not per se error. Such matters are within the discretion of the lower court, and this court will not interfere when such discretion has not been clearly abused. We see no such abuse of discretion here. The facts in relation to this point are to be found in transcript 13,871 from folio 373 to 441. The original answers of these appellants were filed in 1863, and the judgment of the district court was rendered in 1878. After the decision of this court on appeal from said judgment of the district court, and the filing of the remittitur in the superior court, the cause came regularly on for trial on January 26, 1885. The proposed amendments to the answers were not presented until January 5, 1887. It appears in the statement on motion for a new trial, as a fact stated, that in December, 1885, counsel for said appellants "suggested to the court that he desired to file amendments to the answer of said defendants, and was thereupon, and several times afterwards, urged by the court and opposing counsel to present such amendments to said answers seasonably, but did not present said amendments until the 5th day of January, 1887." Moreover, it appears from the uncontradicted affidavit of Theodore H. Hittell, of counsel for respondents, which was filed in opposition to the motion to amend, that for more than six months last past he had made strenuous efforts to induce the said attorney for appellants to present their amendments; that said appellants "made application after application for delay and continuance, and thereby put off the final closing of the case much longer than it would have otherwise been put off;" that, after several such continuances, the attorney for appellants appeared in court on September 23, 1886, and asked for a further continuance, stating again that he desired to file amendments to the answers; that the amendments were already drawn, and that he would serve and present the same for filing on or before October 1, 1886; that "thereupon the court made an order, which was understood at the time to be peremptory and final as to such amendments, that they must and should be served and presented to the court on or before October 1, 1886." The amendments, however, were not presented on said October 1st, nor until the next January, when, as stated in said affidavit of Hittell, the case "had been declared substantially closed." It appears, also, upon the face of the amendments themselves, that they had been prepared, subscribed by the attorney, and verified by the appellants, on December 12, 1885; and there is no intimation of an excuse for the delay in presenting them. Under these circumstances, we cannot see upon what ground this court can be expected to hold that the court below abused its discretion by refusing to allow the amendments. The foregoing is determinate of the point against the appellants; but we also think the other objections made by counsel for respondents to the proposed amendments were good, namely, that "the points raised by the proposed amendments had been already passed upon by the supreme court of this state upon the appeal hereinbefore taken," and that "said proposed amendments were not material amendments, and set up nothing not covered by the old pleadings."

3. We also think that the court did not err in its rulings on the William Rehnert tax-deeds. There was no sufficient proof introduced or offered to show that said Rehnert, as purchaser of property sold for delinquent taxes, gave notice to the owner or occupier of the property so purchased, as provided by section 3785 of the Political Code.¹ Moreover, Rehnert was, at the time, a tenant in common of the rancho.

XII. Alleged Insufficiency of Findings and Decree. There is some slight contention that the findings of fact and law and the interlocutory decree do not conclusively dispose of the issues of ownership, and that too much is left for the determination of the referees. We see no just ground for this criticism. The findings and decree are remarkably full. They dispose of all questions of title and ownership; and the referees are simply to determine values, and make partition among the owners, as declared and directed by the court. Of course, in this case, owing to the multitude of owners, the referees will have an arduous work to perform; but their powers are not beyond those contemplated by the Code, and are necessary to a practicable consummation of the partition.

Conclusion. There are a few respondents, and, perhaps, one or two appellants, who have not been expressly mentioned in this opinion; but their contentions are involved in, and determined by, the views and conclusions hereinbefore stated. It is our opinion that the interlocutory decree, as an entirety, and all orders denying a new trial, should be affirmed. It is ordered that in this present case, No. 13,276, the judgment and interlocutory decree, and every part thereof, be, and the same hereby are, affirmed; and with respect to the other cases, viz., Emeric v. Alvarado et al., No. 13,275; Flood v. Alvarado, No. 13,871; Flood v. Alvarado et al., No. 13,984; and Flood v. Alvarado et al., No. 14,006, —it is hereby directed that an order be entered in each of said cases affirming the judgment and interlocutory decree, and every part thereof, and also affirming the order denying a new trial in each case in which there is an appeal from such order.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.; DE HAVEN, J.

HARRISON, J., being disqualified, did not participate.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment upon all points decided, except two: First. I think the certificate of acknowledgment to the deed of the Alvarados to A. B. Patrick was sufficient to make its record constructive notice to subsequent purchasers, and consequently that the decree of the superior court should have been modified in accordance with the contention of E. Kirkpatrick and the other appellants who claim under the Patrick deed. Second. With respect to specific tract No. 30, I think the decree should have been modified in favor of the appellant Tewksbury. I also concur in the reasoning and conclusions of the principal opinion except in a few particulars. With respect to specific tract No. 41, I concur in the conclusion reached, upon the ground that the certificate of acknowledgment of the deed from Gabriel Castro and wife to Acosta was so fatally defective that its record did not impart constructive notice to subsequent purchasers from Gabriel. But I differ with the court as to the supposed insufficiency of the description in the deed of the interest conveyed. With respect to the various tax-titles, I come to the same conclusion as to their invalidity, but do not agree with some of the grounds of that conclusion stated in the principal opinion.

WELCOME v. HESS et al. (No. 14,245.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 12, 1891.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT — SURRENDER — ACCEPTANCE — IMPROVEMENTS.

1. A landlord leased a building for five years, and after the tenants had occupied the premises for about a year they abandoned the same, and sent the keys to the landlord. About two months later the landlord painted the front of the building, obliterated the tenants' signs, and made repairs. Soon afterwards he relet the premises at a less rent, for a period of five years, without notifying the tenants that he did it on their account. Held, that he thereby accepted the surrender.

2. Where a landlord builds for his tenant a store-room which does not add to the value of the premises, and which is to be paid for by rents reserved in the lease, if the landlord accepts a surrender of the premises he cannot recover for building such store-room.

Commissioners' decision. Department I. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by A. P. Welcome against Will J. Hess et al. for the recovery of damages.

¹ Pol. Code Cal. § 3785, provides that the purchaser of property sold for taxes must, 30 days prior to the expiration of the time for redemption, or 30 days before he applies for a deed, serve upon the owner or occupant of the property a written notice, stating that the property has been sold for taxes, the date of sale, amount of property sold, amount for which it sold, the time when redemption will expire, or when the purchaser will apply for a deed, etc.

Judgment for the defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. C. Hester and Judson, Hester & Wood, for appellant. Enoch Knight and Brouseau & Hatch, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiff appeals from an order refusing new trial. This action is by a landlord to recover damages from his tenants. He avers that in October, 1887, he owned the demised premises, and was carrying on there a lucrative bakery business, which business added largely to the value of the premises; that defendants proposed to hire the premises, bakery, and business for five years, and to purchase his horses and wagons, and the equipments of the establishment, and falsely and fraudulently represented that they would enlarge the establishment and business, and would operate the same for five years, when they would surrender the establishment and business to the plaintiff, while, in fact, they had no such intention, but their real design was to get control of the establishment and business, and to remove the same to some other locality in the city; that, believing the representations, plaintiff did execute a lease to them wherein defendants agreed to pay plaintiff for the term of five years from October 19, 1887, the sum of $4,330, in monthly installments, $65 per month for the first and second years, $75 per month for the third and fourth years, and $85 per month for the fifth year, and to surrender the premises at the end of that term in good condition; that they took possession, occupied and paid rent, until June 30, 1888, when they abandoned the premises, removed therefrom the bakery business, and since that time have been carrying on the business at another point in the city of Pasadena; that, by reason of the abandonment, plaintiff was compelled to, and did, on the 1st of September, 1888, take possession of the premises, and relet them for the term of five years, at $40 per month, which was the best rental he could obtain. He charges that by reason of the abandonment of the premises and the diversion of the business he has been damaged in the sum of $3,000. Plaintiff also claims to recover for the cost of adding a store-room for the defendants, which he avers added nothing to the value of the premises, and also for their failure to surrender the premises in good condition. The answer admits the lease, and that defendants moved out of the premises June 30, 1888. It avers that plaintiff had not kept his part of the agreement; that he did not give them the use of a certain outbuilding which he had agreed to furnish, and that he neglected and refused to place the premises in an inhabitable condition; that in consequence the defendants were compelled to, and did, on the 30th day of June, 1888, surrender the demised premises to plaintiff, who accepted the same, and took possession of the whole thereof. The other allegations of the complaint are denied. A jury having been waived, the case was tried by the court.

It appears that defendants removed from the premises June 30, 1888, and sent the keys to plaintiff, claiming that plaintiff had not complied with his contract. Plaintiff did not at once re-enter, but on August 3d commenced an action to recover rent for the months of July and August. September 1st, while that suit was pending, he called upon the defendants, and requested them to return and occupy the premises, which they refused to do. He then took possession, had the front painted in order to obliterate the defendants' sign, made necessary repairs, and tried to find a new tenant, and finally rented them to Guan Kee for a laundry, for five years from October 1st, at $40 per month, which he says was the very best he could do. The new lease extended nearly one year beyond the term of defendants' lease. So far as appears, nothing was said or done by plaintiff, other than as above stated, to qualify his acts in taking possession and reletting. He did not inform defendants that he did not accept the offered surrender, or that he would relet on their account. This suit was commenced December 3, 1888. Do these facts show a surrender of the term? A surrender is the yielding up of an estate for life or years to the reversioner or remainder-man. Under the statute of frauds, it can be done only by express consent of the parties in writing, or by operation of law, when the parties do something which implies that both have consented. These acts are such as the parties would be estopped from disputing, and which would not be valid unless the term were ended; as, for instance, a new lease accepted by the tenant, or the resumption of possession by the landlord, if the tenant acquiesces, or the giving of a lease to another. And any act which will amount to eviction will estop the landlord, and make a formal surrender unnecessary. And, while it is said that a surrender by operation of law is by acts which imply mutual consent, it is quite evident that such result is independent of the intention of the parties that their acts shall have that effect. It is by way of estoppel. It was held in Auer v. Penn, 99 Pa. St. 370,—and many cases are to the same effect,—that "the landlord may accept the keys, take possession, put a bill on the house for rent, and at the same time apprise the tenant that he still holds him liable for the rent. All this, as was said in Marseilles v. Kerr, 6 Whart. 500, is for the benefit of the tenant, and is not intended, nor can it have the effect, to put an end to the contract, and discharge him from rent." In that case the trial court had instructed the jury, in effect, that, if the tenant gives up the demised premises, the landlord may re-enter and relet, and that it is for the advantage of the tenant that he should do so, and, being for the mutual advantage of the parties, it raises no presumption that the landlord has accepted a surrender. Of this instruction the court said: "We see no error in this. It is good sense as well as good law." In that case the landlord expressly refused to accept a surrender, and notified the defendant that he would hold him for the rent. While there are many cases which hold to this view, the weight of authority and the better reason is the other way. Ladd v. Smith, 6 Or. 316. The term is an estate in lands. The tenant, subject to the covenants of his lease, is the owner for the term. If he leaves the demised premises vacant, and avows his intention not to be bound by his lease, his title still continues, unless the landlord has accepted the offer of surrender. The landlord has no more right to the possession or to lease than a stranger. Admit that he may take such care of the property as will prevent waste, still he must not interfere with the right of the tenant to the absolute dominion and control. If he does so interfere, it is an eviction, and the tenant will be released. The tenant cannot abandon his title; and notwithstanding he has gone out, unless the surrender is accepted, that continues. It is his right to resume possession at any time during his term. If he bring ejectment against the new tenant, what defense can the new tenant have, except that plaintiff's right has ceased? How has it ended, unless by surrender? The assertion that the reletting is for the interest of the tenant is gratuitous and unwarrantable, though, if it were true, how would that fact tend to show authority in the landlord to dispose of the tenant's property? Any person might assume authority on the same ground. The premises might be a rival business stand which the tenant desires to have kept vacant. The complaint in this case substantially avers such fact. Perhaps if the tenant finally ascertains that his landlord will not accept the offered surrender, and could continue to collect his rents, he would elect to return. It is said that defendants abandoned the premises at a time of great business depression at Pasadena. It may be that on the revival of business at the end of a few months they would have been glad to resume business there, and would have done so with profit, if the landlord had not relet. Under such circumstances, shall they continue to pay rent? If the surrender has not been accepted, have they not been evicted? But this case hardly comes up to the authorities which we have criticised. In taking possession, the landlord did not announce his intention to continue to hold the tenants. He relet without notifying the defendants that he should do so on their account. He relet for a period longer than the remainder of their term, thus showing plainly that he was acting in his own right, and not as their self-constituted agent. Under such circumstances, he cannot say that he did not accept the surrender.

The plaintiff also claims damages for the expense in building the store-room for defendants, which he avers adds nothing to the value of the premises. His own statement being taken as true, it must be admitted that he has been hardly used, and if possible, consistent with legal principles, the courts should afford him relief. It is true that a lease is not only a grant or conveyance of an interest in land, but is also a contract between the parties, and upon a breach of any promise contained in it the injured party has his action as upon other contracts; but the trouble is that, by the terms of the contract, compensation to the landlord, for this improvement, was to be made by the rents reserved in the lease. When, therefore, he elected to release the tenants from the remainder of the term, he gave up his stipulated mode of compensation. In other words, his acts, which estop him from claiming rent, have deprived him of his remedy. The case of Respini v. Porta, recently decided by this court, (26 Pac. Rep. 967,) does not really militate against these views. It was the case of the lease—if it may be called such—of a dairy of cows, the necessary buildings, fixtures, and utensils, and pasturage for the cows. The right to the land was subordinate to the business, the stock in which belonged to the lessor. It partook more of the nature of an ordinary contract than a grant of a term. The landlord in such a case, when the tenant abandons, cannot refuse to take possession, for otherwise his property would perish. An examination of the record in the case shows that the point was conceded. The only question was as to the rule of damages. As to the other claims for damage, the findings are against the plaintiff on the facts, and the evidence sustains the findings. It follows that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

BRYMER v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 14,332.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1891.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—DEFECTIVE MACHINERY—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action by a servant against the master for injuries caused by the breaking of a chain, it was error to refuse an instruction that the master was not an insurer of the servant, and was not bound to provide machinery or appliances which were absolutely safe; that he was bound to use only reasonable and ordinary skill and diligence in procuring safe machinery; and that the mere fact that an accident occurred did not raise the presumption that the master was at fault in providing such machinery or appliances.

Department 1. Appeal from the superior court of Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by Brymer against the Southern Pacific Company for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff. Order granting new trial. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frederic Stanford, for appellant. John D. Bicknell, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. Appellant received bodily injuries while engaged with others in the employ of defendant, under the directions of a superintendent, in raising a derailed and wrecked car. He alleged that the injury occurred through the use of inadequate, inappropriate, insecure, and defective appliances furnished by defendant without proper care and caution in the selection thereof, and through the negligence and unskillfulness of the superintendent, who was engaged in directing the work on behalf of defendant. The defendant asked the court to give the following instruction, which was refused: "As respects the duty of a master or employer towards his servant or employe in his service, the court instructs the jury, as a matter of law, that the master or employer is not bound to provide machinery or appliances which are absolutely safe. The law imposes on the master or employer only the obligation to use reasonable and ordinary care, skill, and diligence in procuring and furnishing suitable and safe machinery and appliances for the servant to perform the duties for which he is engaged. The master does not stand in the relation of an insurer to the servant against injury, and can only be held chargeable when negligence can be properly imputed to him. The mere fact that an accident occurred, by which the plaintiff was injured, does not fix the liability, or even raise a presumption that the defendant was at fault in providing machinery or appliances for the labor in which the plaintiff was engaged." The defendant moved for a new trial, and the motion was granted, on the ground that the court had erred in refusing to give the instruction above quoted. We think the instruction ought to have been given. When the employer exercises all the care and caution which a prudent man would ordinarily take for the safety and protection of his own person under the same circumstances, he cannot be held liable for the consequences of a defect in the machinery or appliances used. This is the sense in which the expression, "reasonable and ordinary care, skill, and diligence in procuring and furnishing suitable and safe machinery and appliances," was used in the instruction asked, as we understand it; and is equivalent to the rule, as stated in many of the authorities, viz., that the employer is liable only when he had knowledge of the defect, or failed to exercise reasonable diligence in procuring suitable machinery, or in the inspection of it to discover any defect that might exist. Bajus v. Railroad Co., 103 N. Y. 312, 8 N. E. Rep. 529; Railroad Co. v. McCormick, 74 Ind. 440; Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470; Payne v. Reese, 100 Pa. St. 301; Hobbs v. Stauer, 62 Wis. 108, 22 N. W. Rep. 153; Provision Co. v. Hightower, 92 Ill. 139; Railroad Co. v. Ledbetter, 34 Kan. 326, 8 Pac. Rep. 411; Cagney v. Railroad Co., 69 Mo. 416; Smoot v. Railroad Co., 67 Ala. 13; Railroad Co. v. Duffey, 35 Ark. 602. And our Code establishes the same rule: "An employer must in all cases indemnify his employe for losses caused by the former's want of ordinary care." Civil Code, § 1971. The use of the word "accident" in the instruction is not obnoxious to the criticism put upon it by appellant. The court meant to say simply that the mere fact that the chain broke would not authorize the inference that the defendant had failed to exercise reasonable care in the selection of the appliances used. Such is the fair import of the word as used, and the jury must have so understood it. It is claimed that no prejudice could have resulted from the refusal of the court to give the instruction, inasmuch as there was no evidence on the question as to whether the appliances used were defective. We cannot say, however, that there was no evidence on the subject; and there is nothing in the record to show whether the jury believed the injury was due to defects in the machinery used, or to the negligence of the superintendent. The plaintiff tendered both issues, neither was withdrawn, and it was proper to instruct the jury as to the law applicable to each of them. The views expressed render it unnecessary for us to consider the effect of the statement found in the order of the court granting a new trial, that "no other grounds assigned by defendant for the granting of a new trial are well taken." The order is affirmed.

BALLERINO v. BIGELOW. (No. 14,181.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1891.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—JURISDICTION.

Under Const. Cal. art. 6, § 11, which provides that justices' courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the superior courts, in actions of forcible entry and detainer, where the rental value of the property detained does not exceed $25 per month, and the whole amount of damages claimed does not exceed $200, the allegation of a complaint that the rental value does not exceed $25 is not conclusive of the justice's jurisdiction, but the same must be determined by the evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Action of forcible entry and detainer by B. Ballerino against L. M. Bigelow. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wells, Guthrie & Lee, for appellant. H. Allen and H. Bell, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. Ballerino brought this action against Mrs. Bigelow, claiming that she had forcibly deprived him of the possession of certain premises, and in pursuance of such forcible entry unlawfully detains the same from him. The damages claimed was the sum of $200, and it is also alleged in the complaint that the rental value of the premises did not exceed $25 per month. The cause was originally brought in a justice's court, and judgment being rendered for the plaintiff, an appeal was taken upon the law and facts to the superior court of the proper county. There a trial was had de novo, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff that he recover the premises and $510 as damages, that being treble the amount of the damages sustained, which judgment for damages was awarded in accordance with the provisions of section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From this judgment, and an order denying a new trial, this appeal is taken. There are several points made for the reversal of the judgment and order, but it becomes necessary to determine but one, which, as we think, is conclusive of the matter. While the complaint only alleges that the rental value did not exceed, as a fact, the sum of $25 a month, the overwhelming weight of the evidence is that the rental value exceeded that sum. The court below disregarded the weight of evidence, not upon the idea that there was a conflict, in which it believed the plaintiff's evidence upon the point, but upon the theory that it was legally concluded by the allegations of the complaint as determining the question of the jurisdiction of the justice's court to try and render judgment in the cause, and that it was not bound to determine the question of jurisdiction in accordance with the evidence. This was clearly error. Says the judge below: "Concerning the value of the rents, if it had not been for the allegations of the complaint I should have found in this case, where the defendant herself is evidently anxious that the value should be put above the amount claimed, that it is more. But I think the same rule of pleading governs in this case as in any other; that the plaintiff cannot recover any more than he alleges, although the defendant seems perfectly willing that the plaintiff should consider the rental value to be greater than the amount claimed." In other words, it seems that the view of the trial court was that if a complaint states that property in San Francisco is worth not to exceed $25 a month, and the proof shows that the rental value is $1,000 a month or more, still the justice's court, upon a showing of facts like that here as to forcible entry, could render judgment for the possession of such valuable property. Not so do we understand the law to declare. Our view is that the damages claimed and proved is all that the defendant can recover, but the rental value is not confined to what is alleged, but extends to what is proved; and no recovery can be had where the proof shows that the court has not jurisdiction to render judgment for the possession of the premises.

It will be perceived, upon examination of the constitution of the state, (article 6, § 11,) that, after declaring the legislature shall determine the number of justices of the peace to be elected in townships, incorporated cities, and towns, or cities and counties, and shall fix by law "the powers, duties, and responsibilities of justices of the peace," it is further provided: "Such powers shall not in any case trench upon the jurisdiction of the several courts of record, except that said justices shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the superior courts in cases of forcible entry and detainer, where the rental value does not exceed twenty-five dollars per month, and where the whole amount of damages claimed does not exceed two hundred dollars," etc. Following this constitutional provision, the legislature enacted section 113 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which contains the same limit as to concurrent jurisdiction of justices with superior courts in this class of actions. Thus, the measure of the jurisdiction of justice's courts in these matters is fixed and determined by law. The appeal from the justice's to the superior court does not enlarge the jurisdiction as to such cases. It is plainly evident that the constitution and the statute, so far as concerns this case, apply two tests as to jurisdiction, both of which must be met: The plaintiff must not claim more than $200 damages in all, nor can he recover more; and the rental value of the property involved must not exceed the sum of $25 a month as a matter of fact, to be determined by the evidence. If it had been intended that the test of jurisdiction, as to the matter of rental value, was what was claimed in the complaint, and in no wise dependent upon proof of such fact, it would have been expressed as plainly as it is with reference to the damages claimed. But the word "claimed," as applied to the question of damages, is omitted from that of the matter of rental value, and instead the words used are, "and where the rental value does not exceed twenty-five dollars a month." It was said in Newman v. Duane, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 66: "The plaintiff herein, by simply framing his complaint in a particular way, could not deprive the defendant of a jury trial of the issues raised by his answer." By parity of reasoning, it may be properly said that, by framing his complaint in a certain way, the plaintiff cannot confer jurisdiction denied by the constitution and the statute to a justice's court, and force the defendant to submit the right of her possession to property to the determination of a tribunal which has no right so to do; thus depriving her of the privilege guaranteed to her to have such a case tried originally in the superior court. We are therefore of opinion that the judgment is coram non iudice, and void, and that it and the order denying a new trial should be reversed, and the cause dismissed in the court below for the want of jurisdiction.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and cause dismissed in the lower court for want of jurisdiction.

90 Cal. 515

O'CONNELL et al. v. MAIN & TENTH STS. HOTEL CO. (No. 14,244.)

(Supreme Court of California, Aug. 12, 1891.)

CONTRACTS—DAMAGES FOR BREACH—APPEAL.

1. In an action to recover for a breach of contract, it appeared that plaintiffs were to furnish certain iron-work required in the construction of a building, and had made patterns, flasks, etc., for the purpose of carrying out the contract, and furnished a part of the material, when defendant refused to proceed further with the building, or receive material. Held, that plaintiffs could recover for loss of profits by reason of the breach of the contract, and the amount expended in preparing patterns which thereafter became useless.

2. Where plaintiffs employed another to furnish a portion of the material called for in the contract, the fact that they paid him for work done and damages sustained for failure to continue the work, after suit was brought, does not bar a right of recovery for the amount so paid, especially where it appears that the settlement was advantageous to defendant.

3. The admissibility of evidence under the pleadings cannot be raised for the first time in the supreme court.

4. A notice in a cause that defendant "intends to and will move this court to set aside the decision and judgment heretofore entered and made in said cause," (setting out the grounds,) and that the motion will be made upon a state ment of the case, is a sufficient notice that a new trial will be asked for, and it will be taken as so understood, when it appears that opposing counsel stipulated to extend the time within which to prepare and serve a statement on motion for a new trial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by Martin O'Connell and others against Main & Tenth Streets Hotel Company, to recover for breach of contract and for material furnished. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stephen M. White, for appellant. Finlayson & Finlayson, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This action is based upon two contracts, and the complaint contains two counts or causes of action. The first is upon an account stated for materials furnished, and as to it no question is raised. The second cause of action arises upon a contract by which plaintiffs agreed to perform certain work, according to the plans and specifications, and furnish certain materials for the construction of an hotel which defendant was then building at Los Angeles, and for which defendant agreed to pay $40,000. Plaintiffs were to manufacture and deliver at the building all the iron-work required above the basement. After plaintiffs had furnished a small portion of the material contracted for, defendant became embarrassed and asked for delays, and finally failed to resume work upon the proposed hotel, or to receive any further material from plaintiffs. Plaintiffs, at the request of defendant, suspended work, and now sue for damages resulting from a breach of the contract. Plaintiffs recovered judgment, and the defendant moved for a new trial. It is objected that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the motion, because, as plaintiffs claim, no notice of intention to move for a new trial was given. The notice given was that defendant "intends to and will move this court to set aside the decision and judgment heretofore rendered, entered, and made in said cause upon the following grounds, to-wit." Then follow three of the grounds set out in section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to-wit: Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings and decision herein, and that they were against law; errors in law, and newly-discovered evidence. It also states that the motion will be made upon a statement of the case, bill of exceptions and affidavits, as defendant may be advised. A motion for a new trial is a special proceeding within the case, and I agree with respondent that the court has no jurisdiction to entertain the motion, unless the notice of intention is given substantially as prescribed. The objection to this notice is that it does not formally give notice that a new trial will be asked for. But if it does distinctly and unmistakably give that information it must be held sufficient, and I think it does. Notice is given that defendant will move to set aside the decision. I do not think of any case in which such motion is mentioned in the practice act except for the purpose of a new trial. There might be a motion to vacate a judgment upon various grounds, but could any attorney imagine such a motion, based upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, or errors at law occurring at the trial, or for newly-discovered evidence, and made upon a statement of the case, unless it were a motion for a new trial under the statute authorizing and requiring these things? And respondents' attorneys were not misled, since they stipulated giving further time to defendant "within which to prepare and serve its statement on motion for a new trial." The objection cannot be sustained.

In their second cause of action plaintiffs claim, not only general damages for the breach of the contract, i. e., the profits they would have made by performance, but certain special damages which they aver they have suffered in consequence of the breach. These are: (1) For iron base-plates delivered, $381.50; (2) for expense in making patterns, flasks, and other iron-work, to enable them to perform their contract, $1,500; and (3) for money paid one Isaacs, who had been employed to make certain wrought-iron girders, and had commenced their manufacture, as damages, $1,500.

As to the first item there is no controversy. The expense incurred for patterns, flasks, and other iron-work, was found by the court to be certain patterns, flasks, and an oven, which were necessary to enable plaintiffs to perform their contract; that they cost $1,600; and are worth to the plaintiffs not to exceed $150, damage of plaintiffs of $1,450. It is objected that the finding does not correspond with the pleadings; the oven is not mentioned in the complaint. The phrase, "other iron-work," is undoubtedly too general and indefinite, but it cannot be said that it would not include the oven. In the connection in which this phrase is used, it does not imply that the other iron-work referred to must necessarily be composed of iron. The patterns are not of iron, nor are the flasks, which are the wooden frames in which the moulds are made. If that be the sense, there would be nothing to justify the use of the word "other." The evidence as to the cost of the oven came in without objection. Had an objection been interposed, there probably would have been an amendment. It does not seem fair to allow the objection, when interposed now for the first time. Appellant, however, contends that in no case can plaintiffs recover for expenditures made in preparing to do their work. It contends that it is a breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property; that the detriment upon the breach of such contract is prescribed by section 3311, Civil Code, and is the excess of the amount due from the buyer over the value to the seller, with the expense of carrying to market. But this is unnecessary liberality on the part of the defendant. This rule would give plaintiffs $40,000, less the value of the material as scrap-iron at Los Angeles. If this rule be supplemented by section 3358, Id., we have just the rule adopted by the court. But the case is not that of a seller of personal property, either on hand or to be manufactured. Upon receiving notice that defendant would not proceed with the contract, plaintiffs stopped the manufacture of the articles contracted for. They have not the material on hand therefor, and their detriment is not estimated under section 3311, Id. Plaintiffs do not gain more than they would had the contract been fully performed. In such case they would have received the cost of production and profits. They have received such costs as they have actually incurred and the profits they would have made.

The item of $1,500 paid Isaacs is objected to because it was paid after suit brought, and because defendant had no contract with Isaacs, and was not consulted as to the settlement. The testimony showed that Isaacs had commenced the manufacture of the wrought-iron girders called for in the contract, and, when defendant declined to go on with the work, was notified by plaintiffs to stop work. He did so, but demanded compensation for work done. This was arranged at $1,500, but was paid after suit brought. The evidence shows that the compromise was a reasonable one, and that, had Isaacs insisted upon going on with the work, defendant would have been chargeable with some $10,000 worth of material, which, as it turned out, it did not want. The settlement was advantageous to defendant. The greatest difficulty in mastering the facts of this case here comes from the assumption of the parties and the court below that by the contract a value was placed upon specific portions of the materials contracted for. The contract is for a lump sum, and if there was any mode by which it could be ascertained what the contract price of the base-plates was, or of the wrought-iron or steel, or the cast-iron, or what profits plaintiffs would have made upon any specific portion of the work, the basis is studiously kept out of the record. The complaint does not state the value of the base-plates furnished, or the cost of production, but states that $981.50 is the contract price. Apparently there was no contract price for them. In the evidence it appears that this price included a profit of $270. Their cost, therefore, was $981.50, less $270. The same assumption that the profits were capable of being apportioned is carried into the computations showing the cost of performance and the profits. The allegation is only as to the cost of performing that part of the contract which they were precluded from performing, and the profits which they would have made upon full performance of that part of the contract which they were prevented from performing. Apparently there was not, and could not have been, any possible mode of ascertaining the profits so as to determine what profits they would have made upon such performance. But the evidence does show what would probably have been their profits upon full performance of the whole contract, and the amount recovered seems less than they would have been entitled to. The contract and its breach are sufficiently alleged. The trouble, if any, arises from adopting a wrong construction of the contract in setting out in detail the source of their damages, but, as no objection is urged here upon this ground, the parties may have had some means, with which we are not furnished, of understanding the process. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

CLARK v. GUNN. (No. 14,299.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1891.)

SUMMONS—NOTICE OF RELIEF.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 407, provides that the summons must be directed to defendant, and must contain a notice that, unless defendant appears and answers, plaintiff will apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint. Held that, where a copy of the complaint was served with the summons, a notice, "You are notified that if you fail to appear and answer plaintiff will take judgment against you for the relief demanded in his complaint," is sufficient, though it does not state that plaintiff will apply to the court for the relief demanded.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Action by R. G. Clark against Eliza M. Palmer, Douglas Gunn, and C. E. Johnson, to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Gunn appeals. Affirmed.

Works, Gibson & Titus, for appellant. Collier & Haines, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This action was brought in the county of San Diego by Clark against Eliza M. Palmer, Douglas Gunn, and C. E. Johnson, to foreclose a mortgage executed by Eliza M. Palmer to secure the payment of her promissory note to the plaintiff for the sum of $5,000 and interest. The ground upon which Gunn and Johnson were made parties defendant is expressed in the complaint, as follows: "That Douglas Gunn and Charles Edward Johnson have, or claim to have, some interest in or claim upon said premises, as mortgagees or otherwise, which claims or interest were acquired by them subsequent to the mortgage of plaintiff." No relief is asked affecting Gunn and Johnson, except that plaintiff's mortgage be first satisfied from the proceeds of a sale of the mortgaged property. The summons, with a copy of the complaint, was served on Gunn in said county. The summons contained the following notice: "And you are hereby notified that, if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint as above required, said plaintiff will take judgment against you for the relief demanded in his complaint." The summons also contained a specific statement of the nature of the action, and of Gunn's interest in it as subsequent mortgagee. The defendant Gunn failing to appear within the time required by law, his default was regularly entered, and thereupon a decree of foreclosure, in the usual form, was rendered by the court on the 31st day of December, 1889. On the 23d day of December, 1890, the defendant Gunn filed his notice of this appeal from the judgment of foreclosure. The only point made by the appellant is that the notice in the summons does not comply with subdivision 5 of section 407 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, in a case of this kind, requires a notice that "the plaintiff will apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint." The Code of Civil Procedure (section 4) enacts that "its provisions, and all proceedings under it, are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice;" and the courts have emphatically sanctioned the application of this rule of construction to section 405 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and to a similar section in the Code of New York. Bewick v. Muir, 83 Cal. 368, 23 Pac. Rep. 389; King v. Blood, 41 Cal. 315; McCoun v. Railroad Co., 50 N. Y. 176. So construed, I think the notice that plaintiff would "take judgment * * * for the relief demanded in his complaint" was, in substance, a notice that he would "apply to the court" for that relief. That being the only lawful mode by which he could take it, (Code Civil Proc. § 585.) the notice, as expressed, implies that he intended to take it in that mode, and not in any unlawful manner. As the record shows that the plaintiff did apply to the court for his relief, that the court did grant such relief as was given, and that the relief given did not differ from or exceed that demanded in the complaint, it seems inconceivable that the defendant could have been misled or injured by the variance of the summons from the form of words prescribed by the Code. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

HICKS v. THOMAS. (No. 13,761.)

On rehearing. For former report, see 27 Pac. Rep. 208.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing in this cause is denied, but the judgment heretofore rendered is modified so as to read as follows: The order denying a new trial is affirmed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the superior court to modify its judgment, so as to require the plaintiff to repay to the defendant the amount of money received by her, with legal interest to the date of tender, and the judgment as so modified is affirmed, the appellant to pay costs of appeal.

DOW v. ROSS. (No. 14,312.)

COSTS—SERVING MEMORANDUM—EXCUSABLE NEGLECT.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1033, which provides that "the party in whose favor judgment is rendered, and who claims his costs, must deliver to the clerk, and serve upon the adverse party, within five days after the verdict or notice of the decision of the court, * * * a memorandum of the items of his costs and necessary disbursements in the action or proceeding," etc., where a judgment was rendered for defendant on October 5th, his attorney having actual notice at the time, though no written notice was served on him, and he failed to file his memorandum of costs until the 11th of the same month, such filing was too late, and he was not entitled to costs.

2. An affidavit by the attorney does not show "excusable neglect," under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 473, when it sets out that he had notice of the judgment on October 5th, but was too busy to make the memorandum; that the 6th was Sunday; that the 7th he was unable to obtain the items; that on the 8th he partly prepared it, and then forgot about it until the 11th, when it came to his attention, and he immediately prepared, served, and filed the same.

Action by H. G. Dow against A. L. Ross. Order striking out defendant's costs, from which he appeals. Affirmed.

Sprigg & Barber, for appellant. A. E. Cochran, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The judgment in this case was that the plaintiff take nothing, and that defendant recover his costs, "adjusted at the sum of $50.50." The findings on which the judgment was based were filed October 5, 1889. Six days later, on October 11th, one of the attorneys for defendant prepared, verified, served, and filed a memorandum of defendant's costs, and the amount thereof was afterwards inserted by the clerk in a blank left in the judgment for the purpose. In due time thereafter the plaintiff moved the court to strike out the costs from the judgment, on the ground that the memorandum was not served and filed in time, and hence the insertion thereof in the judgment was inadvertently and illegally made. The court granted the motion, and from that order this appeal is prosecuted. The Code provides: "The party in whose favor judgment is rendered, and who claims his costs, must deliver to the clerk and serve upon the adverse party, within five days after the verdict or notice of the decision of the court, * * * a memorandum of the items of his costs and necessary disbursements in the action or proceeding," etc. Section 1033, Code Civil Proc. It is claimed for appellant that his memorandum was filed in time, because—First, he had received no written notice of the decision of the court, and hence the five-days limitation had not commenced to run; and, second, his delay was excusable, under the circumstances shown.

It is a settled rule in this state that, if a party entitled to costs neglects to serve and file his memorandum thereof till more than five days have elapsed after he has knowledge of the decision of the court, though no notice of it has been served upon him, the filing will be too late, and the costs will be stricken out on motion. O'Neil v. Donahue, 57 Cal. 226; Mullally v. Society, 69 Cal. 559, 11 Pac. Rep. 215. Here it appears from the affidavit of the attorney who served and filed the memorandum that he had actual knowledge of the decision on the day the findings were filed. The case in this respect is therefore brought clearly within the rule above stated. As an excuse for the delay, the attorney states in his affidavit that during the remainder of October 5th he was extremely busy in preparing, serving, and filing papers in another case, and attending to other pressing engagements; that on October 6th he attended to no business, as it was Sunday; that on October 7th he attempted to prepare the bill of costs, and intended to immediately serve and file the same, but was unable to obtain all the items; that on October 8th he prepared a bill of costs, so far as he was able, and laid the same on his desk, in order that it might not escape his attention; that, "in press of business, and some confusion consequent thereon, said bill of costs became covered over with papers in other cases, and neither that nor the subject of said costs again came to affiant's mind until about three or four o'clock in the afternoon of October 11th, when the matter of said costs was brought to his attention by something said as to costs by an attorney in argument, that being motion day, during which affiant was engaged in court; affiant at once examined the Code, got excused from court, consulted defendant, prepared a new bill of costs on another blank, so far as he could, and immediately served and filed the same, with the admission of service by plaintiff's attorney; * * * that owing to said stress of work, and the constant calls made upon his time during said week, affiant could not give said matter of costs the attention required under the circumstances to insure against errors and lapse of memory. Wherefore affiant prays for an order relieving defendant from said mistake, inadvertence, and neglect, and that said judgment may stand as entered." Conceding, without deciding, that, under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relief in a matter of this kind might be granted by the court upon a proper showing, still we are satisfied that the showing here made was altogether insufficient to authorize the relief asked for. It results, in our opinion, that the order appealed from was proper, and should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

LORD v. THOMAS. (No. 14,336.,

Supreme Court of California. Aug. 1, 1891.)

SUPERIOR COURT — JURISDICTION — SEPARATE CAUSES OF ACTION.

In an action by a landlord against his tenant for $183 rent due under a lease, and, as a second cause of action, for the restitution of the same premises, which were alleged to have been unlawfully detained after the expiration of a subsequent lease thereof, with damages for such unlawful detention, judgment was rendered for the rent demanded, ($183,) but restitution of the premises was denied. Held, that the superior court had jurisdiction to render the judgment in question, though it was for less than the jurisdictional amount ($300) of such court, since the relief demanded in prayer of judgment was within the jurisdiction of the court. Following Bailey v. Sloan, 65 Cal. 387, 4 Pac. Rep. 349.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; WILLIAM O. MINOR, Judge.

Action by William J. Lord against Stephen Thomas for unlawful detainer and for rent. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff for $183, but restitution of the premises was denied. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The complaint alleged for a first cause of action that "on or about the 11th day of May, 1887, plaintiff's predecessor of the lands and premises hereinafter described had leased, demised, and let the same unto said defendant at the monthly rental of $9 per month, for each and every month, to be paid monthly; under which lease said defendant was holding said premises when this plaintiff became the owner of and seised in fee of the same on the 28th day of April, 1888, when said lease, by the mutual consent of plaintiff and defendant, was continued from month to month at the said rental up to the 20th day of January, A. D. 1890. That there is now due plaintiff from defendant, on account of said lease, the sum of one hundred and eighty-three dollars. That defendant has not paid the same. That the land and premises herein referred to are situate in the county of Stanislaus, state of California, and described as follows, to-wit: Commencing at the N. W. corner of the N. E. quarter of sec. No. 33, T. No. 3 S., R. No. 10 E., Mt. D. M.; thence east 417½ feet; thence at right angles south 208½ feet; thence at right angles west 417½ feet; thence at right angles north 208½ feet, to place of beginning,—containing two acres of land." For another and separate cause of action against defendant, and in favor of plaintiff, the complaint alleged that "on or about the 20th day of January, A. D. 1890, the said plaintiff, by written lease made on or about the said day at the said county of Stanislaus, leased, demised, and let to the said Stephen Thomas, of the said county of Stanislaus, the premises situate, lying, and being in the said county of Stanislaus, state of California, and described as follows, to-wit: Commencing at the N. W. corner of the N. E. quarter of section No. 33, township No. 3 south, range No. 10 east, Mt. D. M.; thence east 417½ feet; thence at right angles south 208½ feet; thence at right angles west 417½ feet; thence at right angles north 208½ feet, to place of beginning,—containing two acres of land. To have and to hold the said premises to the defendant for the term of three months from the 20th day of January, A. D. 1890, at the monthly rent of ten dollars, payable in equal monthly installments in advance. That by virtue of said lease said defendant Stephen Thomas went into possession of said premises, and still continues to hold and occupy the same. That the term for which said premises were demised as aforesaid terminated on the 20th day of April, 1890, and that the said defendant holds over and continues in possession of said demised premises without the permission of the said plaintiff, and contrary to the terms of said lease. That the said plaintiff since the expiration of the term for which said premises were demised, to-wit, on the 22d day of April, 1890, made demand in writing of the said defendant to deliver up and surrender to him or his agent, Joseph Lord, the possession of said premises. That more than thirty days have elapsed since the making of said demand, and the defendant has refused and neglected for the period of thirty days after said demand to quit the possession of said demanded premises, and still does refuse. That the monthly value of the rents and profits of the said premises is the sum of ten dollars." The prayer of the complaint was as follows: "Wherefore the said plaintiff prays judgment for the sum of $183 for the restitution of said premises, and for damages for the rents and profits of said premises, and that such damages may be trebled as damages for the occupation and unlawful detention and holding over of the same, amounting to the sum of ten dollars per month, besides costs of suit." Judgment by default for the relief asked was set aside on defendant's motion, with leave to defendant to file an answer, and, after trial by the court, judgment was rendered as above stated.

P. J. Hazen, for appellant. T. A. Caldwell and Stonesifer & Minor, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This case cannot be distinguished in principle from that of Bailey v. Sloan, 65 Cal. 387, 4 Pac. Rep. 349, and on the authority of that case the judgment must be affirmed.

CARUTHERS v. HENSLEY et al. (No. 14,176.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1891.)

APPEAL ON JUDGMENT ROLL—PRESUMPTIONS—REPLEVIN.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 627, authorizes the jury in an action for the recovery of specific personal property, in case the verdict is for plaintiff, to find the value, "if the property has not been delivered to plaintiff;" and section 667 authorizes a judgment for possession, "or the value thereof in case a delivery cannot be had." Held that, when the jury find that plaintiff is entitled to possession, they are not required to find the value of the property if it has been delivered to him; and on appeal from a judgment "that the plaintiff have and recover from the defendant the said property, and the sum of $280 damages for the detention thereof," where the appeal is on the judgment roll alone, it will be presumed that it appeared at the trial that plaintiff had already obtained possession.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action for the recovery of personal property by Caruthers against Hensley and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Church & Cory and H. H. Welsh, for appellants. P. Meux, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This action, for the recovery of certain personal property, was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the possession of a portion of the property sued for, and assessed the damages for the detention thereof. Judgment "that the plaintiff have and recover from the defendants the said property, and the sum of $280 damages for the detention thereof," was thereupon entered by the court. From this judgment the defendants have appealed upon the judgment roll alone, and ask a reversal upon the sole ground that the judgment is not in the alternative, as required by section 667, Code Civil Proc. When an appeal to this court is to be determined upon the judgment roll alone, all intendments will be made in support of the judgment, and all proceedings necessary to its validity will be presumed to have been regularly taken. If the error relied on to destroy such presumption consists in matters dehors the record, such matters must be brought to this court by bill of exceptions or other appropriate method. If any matters could have been presented to the court below which would have authorized the entry of this judgment, it will be presumed on this appeal, in support of the judgment, that such matters were so presented, and that the judgment was entered in accordance therewith. Section 627, Code Civil Proc., authorizes the jury in an action for the recovery of specific personal property, in case their verdict is in favor of the plaintiff, to find the value of the property, "if the property has not been delivered to the plaintiff;" and section 667, Code Civil Proc., authorizes a judgment for the plaintiff for the possession, "or the value thereof in case a delivery cannot be had." When the jury find that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession, they are not required to find the value of the property, if it has been delivered to the plaintiff, and, unless the value has been found, there is no basis upon which to render the alternative judgment for its value. For the purpose, therefore, of sustaining a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff for the possession of personal property, without the alternative for its value "in case delivery cannot be had," it can be presumed, in the absence of any bill of exceptions or other showing of error, that it appeared at the trial that the plaintiff had already obtained the possession of the property sued for. In Brown v. Johnson, 45 Cal. 76, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the value of the property, and damages for the wrongful taking, but without any judgment for its return. Upon an appeal by the defendant on the judgment roll alone, upon the ground that the judgment was not in the alternative, the court said: "If, at the trial of this action, it had distinctly appeared that the personal property in controversy had been hopelessly lost or had been destroyed, so that a judgment for its delivery would be necessarily unavailing, a failure to render judgment for its possession would, at most, be but a technical error or omission, and one for which we would not reverse the judgment; and in support of such judgment, where, as here, the record discloses nothing on the point, we will intend that the facts actually appearing below were such as to warrant its rendition." In Claudius v. Aguirre, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 1077, it was held that when it appeared, by the findings of the court, that the property had been delivered to the plaintiff prior to the trial of the cause, a judgment for the possession, without the alternative for its value, was not erroneous. Applying the principles of these cases to the present case, as the record shows nothing to the contrary, we will intend, for the purpose of supporting the judgment, that at the trial it was shown to the court below that after the commencement of the action the plaintiff had obtained the possession of the property awarded to her by the judgment. The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte CLANCY. (No. 20,873.)

CONTEMPT—RIGHT OF APPEAL—APPEAL-BOND—INSOLVENCY.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 943, provides that, when an order appealed from directs the delivery of personal property, the order cannot be stayed by appeal, unless the thing required to be delivered be placed in the custody of the officer, or unless an undertaking be entered into on the part of appellant, with at least two sureties, and in such amount as the court may direct, to the effect that appellant will obey the order of the appellate court. Held that, where one appealed from an order adjudging him guilty of contempt for disobeying an order to turn over to his receiver in insolvency proceedings property value at $4,000, a bond to the effect that he would pay all damages on appeal or dismissal thereof, not exceeding $300, will not stay the order of commitment.

2. Insolvent Act Cal. § 64, which provides that an appeal shall be allowed from any order adjudging a person guilty of contempt, being in conflict with Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1222, which provides that all orders and judgments of the court or judge made in cases of contempt are final and conclusive, the Code must prevail, as a contrary construction would prevent the uniform operation of a general law, contrary to Const. Cal. art. 1, § 11.

In bank. Petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied, and petitioner remanded.

A. D. Splivalo and E. N. Duprey, for petitioner.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The petitioner alleges that he is imprisoned by the sheriff of San Francisco, and that such imprisonment is illegal, for the following reasons: On the 2d day of July, 1891, petitioner, upon the petition of certain of his creditors, was adjudged by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco an insolvent debtor, and ordered to file and did file his schedules in said matter of insolvency. On the 16th day of July, 1891, petitioner, in compliance with an order of said court, appeared therein, and was examined concerning his property and estate, and thereupon said court ordered petitioner to turn over or pay to the receiver in said insolvency proceeding $4,000 in assets, to-wit, goods, wares, and merchandise, or its avails. Petitioner did not comply with that order, and was by the court adjudged guilty of a contempt of court for not complying therewith, and committed to the custody of the sheriff, there to remain until he (petitioner) should comply with said order. Petitioner, on the 25th day of July, 1891, duly served and filed a notice of appeal to this court from said order adjudging him guilty of contempt, and within five days thereafter filed an undertaking on appeal with sufficient sureties, to the effect that appellant would pay all damages and costs that might be awarded against him on the appeal, or on the dismissal thereof, not exceeding $300. No other undertaking has been filed, and the sheriff refuses to release petitioner from imprisonment. The contention of counsel for petitioner is that the appeal from the order adjudging him guilty of a contempt stayed all further proceedings upon said order pending such appeal. Section 64 of the insolvent act of 1880 provides that "all sections of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, relating to contempts, are hereby made applicable to all proceedings under this act. An appeal shall be allowed to the supreme court from any order adjudging any person guilty of a contempt of court." The Code of Civil Procedure makes no provision for an appeal from an order or judgment adjudging any person guilty of a contempt, but does provide that "the judgment and orders of a court or judge, made in cases of contempt, are final and conclusive." Code Civil Proc. § 1222.

Conceding, however, that an appeal does lie from an order or judgment in a case of contempt arising under the insolvent act, we must determine whether the undertaking, on appeal in this case, was sufficient to stay the execution of the judgment or order appealed from. If it be a case not provided for in sections 942-945, Code Civil Proc., the undertaking filed is sufficient to stay execution of the judgment or order appealed from. But we think it is a case provided for by section 943. As we construe it, the judgment or order appealed from does direct the delivery of personal property, by the petitioner to the receiver, and that the execution of such "judgment or order cannot be stayed unless the things required to be delivered be placed in the custody of the officer or receiver appointed by the court, or an undertaking be entered into on the part of the appellant, with at least two sureties, and in such amount as the court or judge thereof may direct, to the effect that the appellant will obey the order of the appellate court upon the appeal." We think the undertaking filed in this case was insufficient to stay the execution of the judgment or order appealed from, and therefore the petitioner must be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco. Petitioner remanded.

McFARLAND, J. I concur.

HARRISON, J. I concur in the judgment. The petitioner, by not questioning, concedes that the order of the superior court directing him to "turn over or pay to the receiver, at its cost, $4,000 in assets, goods, wares, or merchandise, or its avails," found by the court to have been in his possession or under his control at the date of his adjudication in insolvency, was an order which the court had jurisdiction to make, and that it was made after a hearing upon due notice to him thereof, and on an application therefor. His only attack upon this order is that the finding of the court was not in accordance with the evidence. This, however, was but error, and, no appeal having been taken from the order, it is conclusive upon the petitioner. Being a lawful order of the court, the disobedience thereof by the petitioner was a contempt of the authority of the court, (Code Civil Proc. § 1209, subd. 5;) and the court having, under proper proceedings therefor, determined that he was guilty of the contempt charged, was authorized, under section 1219, to direct him to be imprisoned until he complied with the order. This judgment and order of the court was by section 1222 "final and conclusive," and from it no appeal is permitted. Tyler v. Connolly, 65 Cal. 28; ¹ Ex parte Vance, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 118. By the constitution the superior court is vested with original jurisdiction of proceedings in insolvency, but in all matters pertaining to procedure in the exercise of such jurisdiction the court is governed by statutory provisions. The court does not, however, in the exercise of this jurisdiction, become merely a special tribunal for carrying into effect the provisions of the statute, but the proceedings authorized by the statute are taken in it as the superior court, and when acting thereon it has the functions and powers of the superior court in all matters pertaining to its actions as a court. As such court, it has the power to determine and punish all contempts of its authority, even without the provisions found in the insolvent act giving it such authority. "Contempt" is not only made a special title in the Code of Civil Procedure, wherein specific instances thereof are enumerated, and the mode and limit of punishment therefor are defined, (sections 1209-1222;) but the right of protecting itself against contempts of its authority, and enforcing punishment therefor, is essentially inherent in every court of general jurisdiction; and any definition of acts constituting contempt, or limitation upon the mode or extent of punishment therefor, has its appropriate place in a statute relating to the jurisdiction and procedure of the court. The insolvent act is a special statute adopted for a particular object. Its title is "an act for the relief of insolvent debtors, for the protection of creditors, and for the punishment of fraudulent debtors." It does not purport to prescribe the jurisdiction or limit the power of the superior court, but is merely a system of procedure in that court for accomplishing the objects specified in the title of the act. The incorporation in section 64 of this act of certain provisions concerning the power of the superior court relating to contempts, cannot be construed as any limitation upon the power conferred by the Code of Civil Procedure, or as being a grant of such power to the court for the purpose of exercising its authority under that act. If there be any conflict between the two, the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, which professes to define the powers of courts, and the effect of their judgments for contempt, must prevail over the provisions of the insolvent act, and the provisions of that act must be limited to the purposes defined in its title. The contempt consists in the disobedience of a lawful order of the court. It is the dignity of the court, or the majesty of the state as represented by the court, against which the offense is committed. The character of the offense is the same whether it be committed by disobeying an order made in proceedings in insolvency, or one made in probate, or in any civil action. Any law for the punishment of this offense is necessarily of a general nature, and must have a uniform operation. It was not competent for the legislature to provide a different procedure for contempts of the superior court committed while in the exercise of its jurisdiction in proceedings for insolvency from that which is provided for those committed while it is exercising its jurisdiction in any other matter. The clause of section 64 of the insolvent act, which provides, "An appeal shall be allowed to the supreme court from any order adjudging any person guilty of contempt," is in conflict with the provisions of section 1222, Code Civil Proc., which declares: "The judgment and orders of the court or judge, made in cases of contempt, are final and conclusive." To give effect to this provision of the insolvent act is to permit an appeal from judgments of contempt in one class of cases, which, under the general law applicable to contempts, is denied to all other judgments for the same offense. Such construction would except cases arising in insolvency from the uniform operation of this general law, and thereby destroy its uniformity, and violate the provisions of section 11, art. 1, of the constitution. French v. Teschemaker, 24 Cal. 544; Railroad Co. v. Baldwin, 57 Cal. 160; Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 142, 8 Pac. Rep. 813; People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 445, 18 Pac. Rep. 413.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the views expressed in the foregoing opinion of Mr. Justice HARRISON.

PEOPLE v. CLENDENNIN. (No. 20,727.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 3, 1891.)

CRIMINAL LAW — INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

Where a defense of insanity was interposed on a trial for assault with intent to kill, and the court charged that defendant was not responsible unless he was conscious of his act at the time it was committed, it was not error to refuse to charge that, although defendant may have felt an impulse to do the act while conscious, if such consciousness did not exist up to and at the time the act was committed, the jury should acquit.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Indictment of W. S. Clendennin for an assault with intent to commit murder. Verdict of guilty. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Alexander Campbell and Hunsaker & Britt, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

TEMPLE, C. The defendant was convicted of an assault with the intent to commit murder, and appeals from the judgment, without a statement or bill of exceptions. He objects to the refusal of the court to give certain instructions. As the evidence is not brought up, it would be enough to say that we cannot see that the instructions refused were applicable to any matter before the jury; but it is not necessary to rest the decision upon that ground, for it is evident that there was no error. The instructions asked read as follows: "While the law does not recognize as a defense an irresistible impulse to do an act of a criminal nature when the party doing the act is conscious of the nature and character of the act, and that it is wrongful and unlawful, yet though the person accused may have felt an impulse to do the act while such consciousness existed, it is for the jury to determine whether such consciousness existed up to and at the time of the commission of the act, and if it did not so continue, it is their duty to acquit. You are further instructed that insanity, as hereinbefore defined, is a complete defense to all criminal acts committed while under its influence, whether such insanity be permanent or temporary." Assuming for the purpose of this decision, although we really have no warrant in so doing, that there was evidence tending to show the existence of an irresistible impulse before the commission of the criminal act, it is evident that such circumstance was entirely immaterial unless the jury found that the defendant was conscious at the time of the commission of the act; and having been told, as common sense would have taught them without instruction, that defendant was not responsible unless he was at the time conscious, there was no intelligible purpose to be served by such an instruction. It was confusing rather than instructive. It might impress them with the idea that previous mental states could affect the question of responsibility, the very reverse of what defendant desired. They had been told that it must appear that at the time of the alleged assault the defendant was capable of knowing and did know the nature and character of the act and its wrongfulness, and the very last instruction given was: "You are to determine what the condition of the defendant's mind was at the precise time of the alleged assault. Its condition before or afterwards is only to be considered for the purpose of throwing light upon its state at the time of the commission of the act." If, under these instructions, the jury could misunderstand the point made in the proposed instruction, they were incapable of enlightenment. It would have appeared to them, as it was in fact, utterly immaterial whether there was or was not an irresistible impulse before that time, if they found that he then was not conscious of his act. The same reasoning answers the proposition as to the instruction concerning temporary insanity. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

WIXOM et al. v. GOODCELL et al. (No. 14,349.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 2, 1891.)

REVOKING PROBATE OF WILL — CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESS.

Where the probate of a will is sought to be revoked on the ground of mental incapacity of the testatrix, and a witness testifies that he was the attending physician of the testatrix during the winter before the will was executed; that during the time he attended her she was in litigation with her sons over property she had conveyed to them; that witness acted as her agent during the litigation; and that he saw no evidence of failing mind or memory,—the witness may be asked, on cross-examination, whether he had not asked one Mrs. S. to testify, in the controversy between mother and son, that the testatrix was not of sound mind; if he had not said to Mrs. S. at that time that the testatrix was not in her right mind; and if he had not intended to testify in that case that the testatrix was not in her right mind.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Proceeding to revoke the probate of a will by Charles Wixom and others against Henry Goodcell, Jr., and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Rolie & Freeman and Harris & Gregg, for appellants. Paris & Fox and Goodsell & Leonard, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, C. Appeal from an order of the superior court of San Bernardino county denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial. This proceeding was instituted under section 1327 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to revoke the probate of the will of Betsey E. Cole, deceased, on the ground of incompetency by reason of mental incapacity at the time of its alleged execution. The plaintiffs are the children of the deceased children of testatrix, and as such claim an interest in her estate. The defendants, with the exception of the executors, are the children of testatrix, and legatees and devisees under the will. The only issue submitted by the court to the jury was as to the mental capacity of the testatrix, and the finding of the jury thereon was as follows: "Was the deceased, Mrs. Betsey E. Cole, on the 7th day of May, 1887, the time of the execution of the alleged will, of sound and disposing mind? Answer. Yes." Plaintiffs then moved the court to set aside the verdict, and grant a new trial, on the following grounds: "(1) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and that it is against law. (2) Errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by plaintiffs,"—which motion was denied by the court. This appeal is taken by plaintiffs from the order denying their motion for a new trial. The facts necessary for a proper understanding of the points upon which the order herein must be reversed are as follows: In 1886 the testatrix conveyed to her sons, Wallace and Jasper Wixom, all of her property, with the understanding, says Willard in his deposition read at the trial, "that she would make a will and we would execute it." He further testified "that, when she heard that Jasper was not going to do as agreed, she brought suit to recover it. It was finally arranged during the winter of 1886-87. We deeded her part of the property back, and kept part for our share. I got $21,000 for the part I had, a short time afterwards." The ground upon which the action was brought for the recovery of this property from her sons is not shown by the record, but it does appear that while that case was pending she employed, as her agent to look after her interests in connection with that litigation, one Dr. A. Thompson, who was then, and for a long time at and before the making of the will had been, her attending physician. The case was settled by compromise in the winter of 1886-87, and, on the 7th day of May following, she, being then 76 years of age, executed the will in question, by the express terms of which her entire estate was devised to those of her children who are defendants in this action. She intentionally omitted to provide therein for plaintiffs for the reason stated in the will "that each and all of them [meaning her deceased children, of whom plaintiffs are the issue] have received in my life-time all the provision intended for them." On this point one of the attorneys for the defendants testified as follows: "That she [testatrix] came to the office on the 7th day of May, 1887, to have her will drawn; that he told her she must make a just will as between her children; that she told him that was what she wanted to do; that she had given some of them their portions, and she wanted to leave what property she had to those that had had nothing." The will was signed "with her mark." The proof is clear, as we think, that her estate was not disposed of by the will upon the fair and equitable basis indicated by the expressions used by her in this conversation. But, as the order herein must be reversed on other grounds, we do not feel called upon to consider this subject further than is necessary to elucidate the points upon which we have based our decision.

At the trial, the Dr. A. Thompson referred to was sworn as a witness in behalf of defendants, and testified as follows: "That he was a physician of many years' experience; that he was acquainted with Mrs. Betsey E. Cole, formerly Mrs. Wixom; that during the winter of 1886-87, and the spring of 1887, he was her attending physician; that during that time she was in litigation with her sons, Jasper and Willard, over her property, which she had conveyed to them, and witness acted as her agent, having been employed by her, in that litigation; that he saw her a great many times during that winter and spring, and he saw no evidence of failing mind or memory, and, in his opinion, both were good; she was entirely competent to attend to business and make a will; that he frequently conversed with her on business matters, and his opinion was based upon such conversations, and as a physician." Cross-examination: "Question. When Mrs. Cole had her trouble with her two sons, you acted in part for her, did you not? Answer. I did. Q. You were employed for that purpose? A. I will say so; yes, sir. Q. Did you not go to Mrs. Schyffe during that trouble, and ask her to testify that Mrs. Cole was not in her right mind? Mr. Paris: Objected to as irrelevant, immaterial, and not responsive to the direct examination. The Court: Objection sustained. (Plaintiffs except.) Q. During the spring of 1887, did you not, in the employ of Mrs. Cole, go to Mrs. Schyffe, and say to her that Mrs. Cole was not in her right mind? Mr. Paris: Same objection as before. The Court: Sustained. Q. Did you not at that time, and during the time that you have testified that Mrs. Cole was in her right mind in this case, did you not intend to go upon the stand in the case between herself and her two sons, and testify that she was not in her right mind? Mr. Paris: The same objection as before. The Court: Same ruling." Plaintiffs excepted to each of these rulings, and they are assigned as error.

From this it will be seen that the professional and business relations which this witness sustained towards the testatrix at and for a long time before the pretended execution of the will, and during the existence of the "trouble" with her sons, was of such a close and intimate character as to afford him greater facilities for forming a correct opinion as to her mental condition than was possessed by any other witness in the case. As a witness, he assumed to speak from personal acquaintance, business intercourse, and professional or scientific knowledge, and his opinion as to her mental capacity at the time of the alleged execution of the will was founded thereon. The questions propounded to this witness on his cross-examination were clearly competent. They were strictly responsive to matters testified to in the direct examination, and should have been allowed for the purpose of testing the value of his testimony upon the subject in relation to which he testified in his examination in chief. And it is fair to presume that if he had been permitted to answer these questions, and had answered them in the affirmative, without giving a satisfactory explanation, his credibility as a witness might have been very seriously impaired. The jury was entitled to all the knowledge possessed by the witness on this subject; and if shortly before the making of the will, that is, during the time of her trouble with her sons, he was then of the opinion that she was not of sound and disposing mind, they had a right to know what it was that caused so radical a change in his opinion in so short a period of time as to her mental condition. We are clearly of the opinion that the rulings of the court in sustaining the objection to these questions was a prejudicial error, for which the order should be reversed, and a new trial granted, and we so advise.

WE CONCUR: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PHELPS v. BROWN et al. (No. 13,277.)¹
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1891.)

RESCISSION OF CONTRACT—REFUNDING PURCHASE DEPOSIT—MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED.

Plaintiff agreed with one N. and wife to exchange lands, and advanced $500 of the purchase price. N. gave a receipt for the money, and indorsed thereon: "Trade to be finished within two weeks from this date, or this deposit to be forfeited without recourse. Title to prove good, or no sale, and this deposit to be returned." An attachment against plaintiff's husband had been levied on her property, which she refused to procure discharged. N. abandoned the trade, and returned the money to defendants, who had negotiated the exchange of lands for N. Held, that the deposit remained in the hands of defendants as money had and received to plaintiff's use.

S. G. Phelps sued J. E. Brown and others to recover money had and received for plaintiff's use. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. H. Laine and Laine & Hatch, for appellant. Crandall & Biddle, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. It appears from the findings in this case that in June, 1887, one Norton and wife owned a tract of land in Santa Clara county, which was incumbered by a mortgage for $9,000, and the plaintiff, a married woman, owned a house and lot in the city of San José. The Nortons wished to exchange their land for the lot of plaintiff, and to negotiate the exchange they employed the defendants, who were real-estate agents doing business in San José as partners under the firm name of Brown & Ensign, and orally agreed to pay them $500 as a commission if the exchange should be made. The proposition of the Nortons was that they would convey their land to the plaintiff for $20,000, and in payment thereof she should assume and pay the mortgage on the land, and should convey her lot to them for $6,500, and pay to them the balance of $4,500 in cash when the deeds should be executed. This proposition was put in writing, and given to the defendants, and they delivered it to the plaintiff. She was willing to accept the proposition and make the trade if she could realize $6,750 for her lot, and not otherwise. The defendants then agreed to pay her $250 out of their commissions when the trade should be consummated. This arrangement was satisfactory, and she thereupon drew her check on a local bank for $500 payable to the Nortons, and handed the same to the defendants as a deposit or first payment. The defendants on the same day gave the check to the Nortons, who executed a receipt therefor, closing with the words: "Trade to be finished within two weeks from date, or this deposit to be forfeited, without recourse. Title to prove good, or no sale, and this deposit to be returned." A few days later the defendants handed back to the plaintiff her check, and she thereupon gave to them in place of the check $500 in money, which they at once paid over to the Nortons. Subsequently it appeared from the abstract of title furnished by the plaintiff that an attachment, issued in an action against her husband, had been levied on her property; and on learning this the Nortons refused to accept her deed, or to carry out the proposed exchange, unless she would have the attachment removed. She offered to give him a warranty deed, but refused to procure the discharge of the attachment. The Nortons were ready and willing to complete the trade, and tendered a deed of their property to the plaintiff, but she never offered to convey to them an unincum-bered title to her property, and never tendered or offered to pay the balance of the purchase money. Thereupon the Nortons abandoned the trade; and without the knowledge of plaintiff, and without any directions as to the disposition to be made of the money, returned the $500 to the defendants, and the latter returned to them their receipt, with an indorsement thereon in these words: "Money returned and their receipt is canceled. BROWN & ENSIGN. July 25, 1887. We agree to release the signers of this receipt from any expense, legal or otherwise. BROWN & ENSIGN." There are further findings as follows: "That when the trade was finally abandoned by the Nortons they were no longer entitled to retain the $500 as part of the purchase money. That the defendants, on receiving the $500 from the Nortons, took their place as to the money, and assumed all liabilities as to the plaintiff that the Nortons had incurred. That the oral agreement on the part of the plaintiff to forfeit the $500 paid, on failure to comply with the terms of the oral agreement to purchase of the Nortons, was valid, and she was not entitled to recover it back when she refused to complete the purchase." Judgment was entered that the plaintiff take nothing by her action, and that the defendants recover their costs. From that judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The action was brought to recover the $500 paid to the defendants, as above stated, as money had and received by them to the plaintiff's use. The respondents contend that the judgment was right and should be affirmed, because, as the plaintiff paid the money as a forfeit, and then failed to complete the trade by offering to convey an unincumbered title to her property, and to pay the balance of the purchase money, she could not have recovered the money back from the Nortons, and hence had no cause of action against them. This contention cannot, in our opinion, be sustained. The plaintiff could have maintained an action against the Nortons to recover the money; and their only defense, if any they had, would have been a counter-claim for damages. Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280; Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. Rep. 749. And the liability of the defendants is shown by the finding that, when they received back the $500, they took the place of the Nortons as to the money, and assumed all their liabilities to the plaintiff. This finding is not questioned, and its correctness seems to be admitted. It follows, therefore, we think, that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain this action against the defendants, and that the judgment was improperly entered against her. We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

GOW v. MARSHALL et al. (No. 13,896.)¹

ATTACHMENT OF DEBTS AND CREDITS.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 542-545, concerning attachments, provides that debts owing to the defendant, or any credits or other personal property belonging to the defendant, under control of a third person, may be attached. Section 546 provides that the sheriff must make a full inventory of the property attached, and he must request, at the time of serving the writ, the party owing the debt or having the credit to give him a memorandum, stating the amount and description of each. Held, that an attachment of "certain credits belonging to the defendant" does not give the attaching creditor a lien on or right to a debt owing to the defendant by the party served with the writ.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

Action by N. W. Gow against H. B. Marshall and the Centinela-Inglewood Land Company to recover credits attached. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals.

Enoch Pepper and Wells, Guthrie & Lee, for appellant. Albert M. Stephens, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an action by an attaching creditor against a garnishee, based on section 720 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is alleged in the complaint that, on the 13th day of March, 1888, the plaintiff, N. W. Gow, commenced an action against H. B. Marshall to recover the sum of $1,686.78 for work and labor performed and money paid; that a summons was duly issued and served on the defendant; that a writ of attachment was also duly issued and delivered to the sheriff of the county, and the plaintiff then gave to the sheriff information in writing that the Centinela-Inglewood Land Company, a corporation, "had in its possession, or under its control, certain credits belonging to the defendant;" that the sheriff served the writ upon the said corporation by delivering to its president a copy thereof, "together with a notice that said credits were attached under and in pursuance of said writ," and that no reply to the notice was made; that thereafter such proceedings were had in the action that on the 29th of March, 1888, judgment "was duly rendered and entered" therein, in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, for the sum prayed for and costs, making in all the sum of $1,705.53; that thereafter the corporation, by an order of the court, was required to and did, by its president, attend before the court to be examined, and the president was then and there examined respecting the property in its possession and credits and other personal property belonging to the defendant; that upon such examination the president denied that anything was due from the company to the defendant, and thereupon the court made an order permitting the plaintiff to institute a suit against the corporation garnishee for the recovery of such interest or debt due the defendant Marshall, and in the mean time forbade a transfer or other disposition of such interest or debt until such action could be commenced and prosecuted. It is then further alleged that the Centinela-Inglewood Land Company was and still is a corporation, duly organized and doing business under the laws of this state, and that, at the time the writ of attachment was served upon it, it was and still is indebted to the defendant Marshall in the sum of $1,976.70; and that by virtue of the proceedings in attachment the plaintiff had become subrogated to the rights of Marshall against the corporation to the extent of his said judgment. Whereupon judgment was asked against the Centinela-Inglewood Land Company for the sum of $1,705.53, and costs of suit.

The defendant corporation demurred to the complaint, and its demurrer was overruled. It then answered, denying that it was indebted to Marshall in the sum alleged in the complaint, or in any sum whatever; and denying that, by virtue of the proceedings in attachment set out, the plaintiff became subrogated to the rights of Marshall, or to any rights of any kind or nature, or to any sum of money whatever. The case was tried, and the court found that the defendant corporation was indebted to Marshall in the sum of $553, and no more, at the time the writ of attachment was served upon it, and was still so indebted. It further found as follows: "That the plaintiff has not, by virtue of the proceedings in attachment set out in the complaint on file herein, or in any other manner, become subrogated to the rights of the defendant Marshall to the extent of the said claim of plaintiff against the said Marshall, to-wit, in the sum of one thousand seven hundred and five and fifty-three one-hundredths dollars, or to any sum or amount whatever, or has become subrogated to the rights of said Marshall to any extent, by virtue of said proceedings or otherwise;" and, as a conclusion of law, that the defendant Centinela-Inglewood Land Company was entitled to judgment for its costs. Judgment was accordingly so entered, and from that judgment the plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll.

It is well settled that proceedings by attachment are statutory and special, and the provisions of the statute must be strictly followed or no rights will be acquired thereunder. Roberts v. Landecker, 9 Cal. 262; Hisler v. Carr, 34 Cal. 641; Wade, Attachm. § 333. The Code of Civil Procedure provides: "Debts and credits, and other personal property, not capable of manual delivery, must be attached by leaving with the person owing such debts, or having in his possession or under his control such credits and other personal property, * * * a copy of the writ, and a notice that the debts owing by him to the defendant, or the credits or other personal property in his possession, or under his control, belonging to the defendant, are attached in pursuance of such writ." Section 542, subd. 5. "Upon receiving information in writing from the plaintiff or his attorney that any person has in his possession or under his control any credits or other personal property belonging to the defendant, or is owing any debt to the defendant, the sheriff must serve upon such person a copy of the writ, and a notice that such credits or other property, or debts, as the case may be, are attached in pursuance of such writ." Section 543. "All persons having in their possession or under their control any credits or other personal property belonging to the defendant, or owing any debts to the defendant, at the time of the service upon them of a copy of the writ and notice, * * * shall be, unless such property be delivered up or transferred, or such debts be paid to the sheriff, liable to the plaintiff for the amount of such credits, property, or debts," etc. Section 544. "Any person owing debts to the defendant, or having in his possession or under his control any credits or other personal property belonging to the defendant, may be required to attend before the court." Section 545. "The sheriff must make a full inventory of the property attached, and return the same with the writ. To enable him to make such return as to debts and credits attached, he must request, at the time of service, the party owing the debt or having the credit to give him a memorandum, stating the amount and description of each," etc. Section 546. It is evident that by these provisions debts and credits are treated as separate and distinct things. A debt is money owing by the garnishee to the defendant which may be paid over to the sheriff, while credits are something belonging to the defendant, but in the possession and under the control of the garnishee, like promissory notes or other evidences of indebtedness of third parties, which may be delivered up or transferred to the sheriff. Robinson v. Tevis, 38 Cal. 614. It appears from the complaint that the only attachment in this case was of "certain credits belonging to the defendant," which the Centinela-Inglewood Land Company had in its possession or under its control. This was not an attachment of the debt due from the company to the defendant, and the plaintiff, therefore, acquired no lien upon or right to such debt by the service of his writ. This being so, it is clear that the action cannot be maintained. Other points are discussed by counsel, but they need not be considered. In our opinion, the proper judgment was entered in the court below, and we advise that it be affirmed.

WE CONCUR: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

HEWITT v. DEAN et al. (No. 14,011.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 2, 1891.)

MORTGAGES—NON-PAYMENT OF INTEREST—WHOLE DEBT DUE—WAIVER OF ELECTION—PAYMENT OF MORTGAGE TAX—NOTICE OF FORECLOSURE.

1. A provision of a mortgage note that, upon default in the payment of interest, the whole sum of principal and interest shall immediately become due and payable, at the holder's election, is an absolute agreement of the makers, depending solely upon such election, and does not require the giving of notice before suit to foreclose. Dean v. Applegarth, 65 Cal. 391, 4 Pac. Rep. 375, distinguished.

2. In foreclosing a mortgage given to secure such a note, it appeared that, a short time before the interest fell due, the mortgagors requested a few days' extension; that about 20 days after the interest fell due they asked the mortgagee if he would accept all of the principal and interest, to which he replied that he wanted the money; and that the mortgagors were several times urged to carry out their proposition. Held not a waiver of the default, or of the mortgagee's right to make election within a reasonable time whether he would consider the principal and interest immediately due.

3. An instrument executed with a note and mortgage, and as part of the transaction, agreeing to credit the mortgagors with a certain per cent. of the interest, if they should produce each year "the proper official receipts showing the payment of all taxes against the property," is not a "contract" on their part, by which they are "obligated" to pay any tax upon the mortgage, but a contract solely of the mortgagee; and, as such, is not in contravention of Const. Cal. art. 13, § 5, providing that every contract by which a debtor is so obligated "shall as to any interest specified therein, and as to such tax or assessment, be null and void."

4. Whether the words "all taxes" in such an instrument include the mortgage tax is to be determined by the court, and not by the testimony of witnesses as to the intention of the parties.

5. A mortgage note providing "for an additional sum of 5 per cent. on principal as attorneys' fees," if suit be brought to enforce payment, limits in amount "the reasonable counsel fee" provided for in the mortgage.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. TOWNER, Judge.

Action by R. E. Hewitt against Cornelia R. Dean and G. L. Dean for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon real property. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed. For motion before one department to set aside sale, see 26 Pac. Rep. 1101.

Victor Montgomery, for appellants.
Ray Billingsley, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This is an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon real property, executed by the defendants to the plaintiff. The note to secure which the mortgage was given is as follows: "$2,500. Santa Ana, Cala., Oct. 29, 1887. Three years after date, for value received, we promise to pay R. E. Hewitt or order, at the Commercial Bank of Santa Ana, the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, with interest at the rate of 12½ per cent. per annum from date until paid. Interest payable annually, and, if not so paid, to be compounded annually, and bear the same rate of interest as the principal; and, should the interest not be paid when due, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable, at the option of the holder of this note. Should suit be commenced to enforce the payment of this note, we agree to pay an additional sum of five per cent. on principal as attorney's fees in such suit. Principal and interest payable in gold coin of the United States. MRS. CORNELIA R. DEAN. G. L. DEAN." The mortgage contained the following clause: "And the mortgagors promise to pay said note according to the terms and conditions thereof, and, in case of default in payment of the same or of any installment of the interest thereon when due, the mortgagee may foreclose this mortgage, and may include in such foreclosure a reasonable counsel fee, to be fixed by the court." The complaint herein was filed January 18, 1889. It alleges "that no part of the principal sum, nor of the interest mentioned in said note, has been paid," and contains also the following averment: "That because of said interest not having been paid when due, and upon the provision with reference thereto contained in said note, the plaintiff elects to consider and declare the whole sum of principal and interest of said note now due and payable." The plaintiff gave no notice to the defendants prior to the commencement of the action of this election, nor did he make any demand upon them for payment. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and from this judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendants have appealed.

1. It was not necessary that the plaintiff should give to the defendants any notice of his election to consider the whole principal sum due upon their failure to pay the interest when it matured, or to make any demand upon them for payment prior to commencing the action. Whitcher v. Webb, 44 Cal. 127; Leonard v. Tyler, 60 Cal. 299; Buchanan v. Insurance Co., 96 Ind. 510; Trust Co. v. Munson, 60 Ill. 371; Cundiff v. Brokaw, 7 Ill. App. 147; Johnson v. Van Velsor, 43 Mich. 208, 5 N. W. Rep. 265. The provision of the note that upon such default the whole sum of principal and interest should become immediately due and payable, at the option of the holder thereof, was an absolute agreement on the part of the defendants depending solely upon the option of the plaintiff, and did not require any notice from him that he elected or intended to exercise such option in order to make this agreement binding upon the defendants. The fact of their default was peculiarly within their own knowledge, and they also knew that by the provisions of the note they had agreed that upon such default the plaintiff might, within a reasonable time thereafter, consider the principal sum named in the note as due, and institute proceedings for the foreclosure of the mortgage. It was competent for them to include in their note or mortgage a provision requiring notice of such election as a condition precedent to instituting the suit, but instead thereof they have agreed that upon the mere fact of the default the plaintiff may, at his option, treat the whole amount as due, and foreclose the mortgage. To add to this agreement the requirement that the plaintiff should give notice of his election would be for the court to add to the agreement of the parties a condition which they have not themselves chosen to make. In Buchanan v. Insurance Co., supra, the court said: "Such a notice might have been contracted for and made a condition precedent, but it was not. Appellant was bound to know that by his default the obligee had the right to regard and treat the whole sum as due and collectible, and that nothing was required of him except the exercise of his own will. Upon making default, it was the duty of appellant to seek the creditor. It clearly was not the duty of the creditor to seek him, and notify him of the results of his own laches." The case of Dean v. Applegarth, 65 Cal. 391,¹ differed from the present in the fact that in that case it was provided that, in case of default, the rate of interest upon the note should be increased at the option of the holder, and the court held that this option must have been exercised and manifested in some way by the plaintiff before it could have effect; that the burden of the increased interest could not be imposed upon the defendant by any undisclosed intention of the plaintiff, or by a mere secret unmanifested intention in the mind of the mortgagee or holder of the note. In that case, however, the court held that the notice of the election could be sufficiently given to the maker of the note by merely bringing an action to foreclose the mortgage. The plaintiff was not required to exercise this option immediately upon the failure of the defendants to pay the interest. He could not know in advance that they would make default, and he would therefore be allowed a reasonable time within which thereafter to determine whether he would exercise his right of option. This provision was inserted for his benefit, and he was not compelled to exercise the option immediately upon the default under the penalty of losing all right to exercise it, but was to be allowed a reasonable time for enabling him to determine whether its exercise was necessary for his protection or advantage. "Immediately due at the option of the holder," means immediately upon or after his election, and not immediately upon default, providing he immediately elects." Manufacturing Co. v. Howard, 28 Fed. Rep. 741. At the trial certain evidence was presented to the effect that, a "few days" before the interest fell due, one of the defendants, in an interview with the plaintiff, requested of him an extension of a few days within which to pay the interest, and was told by the plaintiff that he could get along for a few days, and under the circumstances he would not push him. The defendants, however, did not pay the interest within the "few days," or take any steps in reference thereto, except that about the 20th of November one of them asked the plaintiff if he would accept all of the principal and interest, to which the plaintiff replied that he wanted the money, and expected it. The defendants, however, did not make any payments to the plaintiff, although several times urged by him to carry out their proposition, and, upon their failure to do so, he commenced this action. These acts and sayings of the plaintiff indicate no act of waiver on his part, or failure to make his election within a reasonable time after the default. Although the plaintiff might have dealt with the defendants in such a way that he would be estopped from asserting his right of option, or by some act of his waive such right, yet mere forbearance or inaction would not cause such waiver. His leniency towards the defendants by forbearing to make an election within a reasonable time could not impair his right, or be regarded by them as a waiver thereof. Defendants, moreover, do not allege in their answer any waiver by the plaintiff of their default, or any act on his part waiving his right to make the election. Neither do they in their answer, nor did they at the trial, assert any equity in their behalf, or, by offering to pay the plaintiff the interest which they admit had matured, seek to relieve themselves from the consequences of their default.

2. At the same time with the execution of the note and mortgage, and as a part of the same transaction, the plaintiff executed to the defendants the following instrument: "For valuable consideration I hereby promise and agree to give credit for two and one-half (2½) per cent. of the twelve and a-half (12½) per cent. interest on the mortgage note signed 'Mrs. Cornelia R. Dean' and 'G. L. Dean,' in my favor, dated October 29, 1887, provided said Mrs. Cornelia R. Dean and G. L. Dean shall on or before the 15th day of December of any year after the present, during continuance of said note unpaid, present to me proper official receipts showing the payment of all taxes against the property covered by the mortgage securing payment of said note for that year, respectively. R. E. HEWITT."

At the trial the defendants offered to show that the words "all taxes" were intended to cover and include the mortgage tax. The court excluded the evidence, and its ruling in this respect is assigned as error. The court did not err in this ruling. There was no ambiguity in the words themselves. If the "mortgage tax" is a tax "against the property" described in the mortgage, it is clearly included in the term "all taxes," and if it is not a tax against the property, it is quite as clearly excluded from the term. In either case the agreement was to be construed by the court, and not to be determined upon the testimony of witnesses as to the intention of the parties. The defendants contended that this instrument is a contract in violation of section 5, art. 13, of the constitution, and that thereby they are released from all obligation to pay any interest upon the note secured by the mortgage. Section 5 of article 13 of the constitution provides that "every contract hereafter made, by which a debtor is obligated to pay any tax or assessment on money loaned, or on any mortgage, deed of trust, or other lien, shall, as to any interest specified therein, and as to such tax or assessment, be null and void." Section 4 of the same article provides that "a mortgage * * * by which a debt is secured shall, for the purposes of assessment and taxation, be deemed and treated as an interest in the property affected thereby. * * * The value of the property affected by such mortgage, * * * less the value of such security, shall be assessed and taxed to the owner of the property, and the value of such security shall be assessed and taxed to the owner thereof. * * * The taxes so levied shall be a lien upon the property and security, and may be paid by either party to such security. * * *" Assuming that the tax upon the mortgage referred to in section 5 is a tax "against the property" by virtue of the provision of section 4 that the mortgage is, for the purposes of taxation, "an interest in the property affected thereby," and that the tax levied thereon is a "lien upon the property," as well as upon the security, the agreement referred to does not contravene the provisions of section 5. The agreement is solely upon the part of the mortgagee, and is in no respect binding upon or enforceable against the mortgagors, and it cannot, under any theory, be said to be a "contract" on their part; nor are they by its terms in any way "obligated" to pay any tax upon the mortgage.

It is well known that, prior to the adoption of the present constitution, it was the universal custom for the mortgagee to incorporate into the mortgage a stipulation binding the mortgagor to pay all taxes that might be levied upon the mortgage, or the debt secured thereby. This provision engendered a vast amount of litigation, and the collection of this tax was stoutly resisted at all points, chiefly upon the ground that a tax imposed upon the land and also upon a mortgage thereon was double taxation, and unconstitutional. As a consequence of various decisions of the supreme court in this litigation, all money loaned upon mortgage security escaped taxation, and the owner of the land mortgaged was compelled to pay more than his share of the expenses of government. It was for the purpose of obviating this consequence that the constitutional convention adopted the foregoing provision of section 5, art. 13, in order that a portion of the taxes might be collected from the mortgagee, and that the burden upon the mortgagor might not at the same time be increased. The provision thus incorporated into the constitution was intended for the benefit of the borrower, but it is unnecessary to say that the results expected therefrom have not been realized. All experience has shown that the rate of interest is governed by the inflexible laws of trade, and is regulated by the same law of supply and demand as that which governs all other articles of commerce; and that legislatures and constitutional conventions are powerless in their attempts to change this law; that, whenever the state imposes a tax upon a commodity, the burden of that tax is borne by him whose necessities require him to purchase, and not by him who holds it for sale. This subject in its relations to a tax upon mortgages is so fully presented in the opinion of Mr. Justice CROCKETT, in the case of Society v. Austin, 46 Cal. 416, that it is unnecessary to do more than to state the proposition that whatever burdens in the form of taxation the state imposes upon money which is loaned are in reality borne by the borrower, and not by the lender; that the lender, in fixing the rate of interest for the loan, will invariably add the amount of this tax to the market value of the money, and, under the guise of interest, collect from the borrower a sufficient amount to reimburse himself for the amount of the tax. Now, if the parties to a loan can, by an arrangement between themselves which shall not violate the requirements of any special provision of the constitution, provide for the payment of the mortgage tax in such a mode that the burden upon the borrower shall not be increased, but may possibly be diminished, such arrangement is not only not in conflict with the letter of the constitution, but is in direct harmony with its spirit and the evident purpose of its framers. Of this character is the instrument under consideration. By it, as we have seen, there is created no obligation upon the borrower to pay any portion of the mortgage tax. He is merely granted by the lender a privilege, of which he may avail himself or not, as he may choose, of reducing the interest upon his loan to the market value of the money, by a liquidation on his part of another obligation of the lender. This privilege is in reality given to the borrower by the constitution itself in that provision which permits him to pay the mortgage tax and have the amount so paid deducted from his debt. Under such arrangement, the lender will always fix the conventional rate of interest at a figure sufficiently high to cover the whole estimated rate of the mortgage tax. If, however, at any time during the existence of the loan, that tax shall be less than this estimated rate, the borrower, instead of the lender, will receive the benefit of such reduction, while, if the rate be at any time increased, he will leave the lender to pay the tax, and himself pay only the conventional rate of interest. Such an agreement is, in our opinion, in entire harmony with the spirit of the constitution, and must be held to be valid.

3. The court erred in allowing to the plaintiff the sum of $300 for attorneys' fees. The note provided that, "should suit be commenced to enforce the payment of this note, we agree to pay an additional sum of five per cent. on principal as attorneys' fees in such suit." As no action could be brought upon the note except in connection with a suit to foreclose the mortgage, the reasonable counsel fee provided for in the mortgage must be held to be limited in amount by this agreement of the parties. This was evidently deemed by the attorney for the plaintiff to be the correct construction of this clause, inasmuch as in the prayer to his complaint he only asks for judgment "for five per cent. on the said principal sum of $2,500 for attorneys' fees, as provided in said promissory note, and being such reasonable counsel fee as is provided in said mortgage." The order denying a new trial is affirmed; and the court below is directed to modify the judgment by reducing the amount allowed for attorneys' fees to $125 as of the date the judgment appealed from was entered, and, as so modified, the judgment shall stand affirmed.

REED et al. v. NORTON. (No. 13,843.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—NOTICE OF CLAIM—LIABILITY OF OWNER.

Where the owner of a building, against which mechanics' liens are filed, fails to retain, after the completion of the work, and pay over to those entitled thereto, one-fourth of the contract price, as provided in his contract, he is responsible to that extent, but may have deducted any lawful credits to which he is entitled, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1200, which provides that, if the contractor fails to perform his work in full or abandons it, the portion of the contract price applicable to mechanics' liens shall be deemed the difference between the value of the work and materials already done and furnished and the payments then due and actually made. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 26 Pac. Rep. 767.

Action by C. H. Reed and others against Thomas Norton, the owner of a building, and Thomas Helm, his contractor, to enforce the liens of mechanics and materialmen. The contractor, Helm, made default. There was judgment for plaintiffs, and Thomas Norton alone appeals. Reversed.

PER CURIAM. This case was first submitted in department 2, and on January 31, 1891, the judgment and order denying a new trial were reversed, the opinion having been prepared by Commissioner FOOTE. A hearing in bank was afterwards ordered, and the cause was again argued and submitted. After a full consideration of the case we are satisfied with the conclusion reached and the opinion filed in department. 26 Pac. Rep. 767. In their brief on rehearing counsel for appellant suggest that the last clause of the said opinion would compel the court below to render judgment against appellant for the full amount of 25 per centum of the contract price, and to exclude any credits which he might lawfully have. We do not think that such is the meaning of the opinion; but, in order to remove any doubt on the subject, we say, in addition, that, if appellant has any lawful credits under section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure,¹ or otherwise, he is entitled to the same, to be deducted from said 25 per centum. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent.

¹Sec. 1200. In case the contractor shall fail to perform his contract in full, or shall abandon the same before completion, the portion of the contract price applicable to the liens of other persons than the contractor shall be fixed as follows: From the value of the work and materials already done and furnished at the time of such failure or abandonment, including materials then actually delivered or on the ground, which shall thereupon belong to the owner, estimated as near as may be by the standard of the whole contract price, shall be deducted the payments then due and actually paid, according to the terms of the contract and the provisions of sections eleven hundred and eighty-three and eleven hundred and eighty-four, and the remainder shall be deemed the portion of the contract price applicable to such liens.

REVIEW ON APPEAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where there is a conflict in the evidence, the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. N. C. ROWELL, Judge.

F. F. Oster and Waters & Gird, for appellant. L. M. Sprecher, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. 1. The complaint states a cause of action in favor of plaintiff, and against defendant.

2. Upon the question whether defendant failed and refused to carry out and perform the contract made between plaintiff and the South Rialto Land & Water Company, we cannot disturb the finding of the court below, as it cannot be said that it is without evidence to justify it. The question here, when a finding is assailed as being against evidence, is not as to the preponderance of evidence, but only whether there was a substantial conflict in the evidence, and, if there was, the finding of the lower court is conclusive here. Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LOPEZ. (No. 20,782.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 29, 1891.)

LARCENY—SUFFICIENCY OF INDICTMENT.

Pen. Code Cal. § 484, defines larceny as "the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another." Section 487, subd. 3, makes the stealing of a horse grand larceny, which is a felony. Sections 957-960 provide that the words used in an information are to be construed according to their usual meaning; that the information is sufficient if the act charged is clearly set forth in ordinary language, so that a person of common understanding may know what is intended; and that no information is insufficient, by reason of any defect in form, which does not prejudice the substantial rights of the defendant. Section 1258 provides that, on appeal, the court must give judgment without regard to technical defects, which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties. Held, that an information charging defendant "with the crime of felony," in "stealing, taking, and driving away" a horse, the property of the person named, is not defective in failing to charge that the offense was feloniously committed, where no such objection was urged in the court below.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. GREENE, Judge.

Information against Manuel Lopez for larceny of a horse. There was judgment of conviction, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Poston and A. Laidlaw, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

FITZGERALD, C. The information upon which the defendant was tried and convicted of the larceny of a horse is claimed to be fatally defective, because it fails to charge that the offense was committed feloniously. At common law, simple larceny, whether grand or petit, was a felony, and was defined to be the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. The word "feloniously" was therefore essential to the validity of an indictment for a felony, and it has been uniformly held that this word, when used in a statute or constitution without being defined, should be construed to have the meaning affixed to it by the common law. But our statute has modified the common-law system of pleading and the rule of procedure in many important respects, and prescribed certain simple rules by which alone the sufficiency of such pleading shall be determined. These rules, or such of them as have a direct bearing on the question under consideration, are contained in the following sections of the Penal Code: Section 948 provides that "all the forms of pleading in criminal actions, and the rules by which the sufficiency of pleadings is to be determined, are those prescribed by this Code." Section 957 provides that "the words used in an indictment or information are construed in their usual acceptance in common language." Section 958 provides that the "words used in a statute to define a public offense need not be strictly pursued in the indictment or information, but other words conveying the same meaning may be used." Section 959, subd. 6, provides that the indictment or information is sufficient if it can be understood therefrom "that the act or omission charged as an offense is clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." Section 960 further provides, "that no * * * information is insufficient, by reason of any defect in matter of form, which does not tend to the prejudice of a substantial right of the defendant upon its merits." And section 1258 provides that "after hearing the appeal the court must give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects * * * which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties." The defendant is accused by the information herein "with the crime of felony," which he is charged with having committed by "stealing, taking, and driving away" a horse, the personal property of the person therein named. No objection was made to the information in the court below, and the question of its sufficiency is raised for the first time by this appeal. "Larceny" is defined by section 484 of the Penal Code to be "the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another." And subdivision 3 of section 487 of the Penal Code makes the stealing of a horse grand larceny, which is a felony under our statute, and punishable by imprisonment in the state prison. The word "steal," as here used, has, as will be hereafter shown, a fixed and well-defined meaning, and is perhaps, in its common every-day use and general acceptance, as well understood as any word in the English language. Webster defines it, "to take and carry away feloniously, as the personal goods of another," quoting Blackstone. The same definition is substantially given in all the standard law dictionaries, some of them giving "larlarceny" as a synonym, and it is used with the same meaning in the following among other sections of the Penal Code: Section 492 relates to how the value of a thing stolen may be ascertained; section 496 to receiving stolen property, knowing the same to be stolen; and section 497 provides that "every person who, in another state or county, steals the property of another, * * * and brings the same into this state, may be convicted and punished in the same manner as if such larceny * * * had been committed in this state." To therefore contend that the defendant, who must be presumed to be a person of common understanding, did not know what was intended when he was charged by the information with stealing another man's horse, is simply preposterous. Testing the sufficiency of this information by the application of the foregoing rules, we are forced to the conclusion that where the word "feloniously" is omitted from, and the word "steal" employed in, the charging part of an information for grand larceny, it will be understood as charging the criminal intent with which the act was committed, and the offense, when so charged in an information or indictment, will be deemed to be substantially charged in the language of the Code. And an indictment or information for larceny which contains both or either of those words will be held valid if found to be sufficient in all other respects. It therefore follows that, as the omission of the word "feloniously" from the information herein did not tend to the prejudice of a substantial right of the defendant, the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and we so advise.

WE CONCUR: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

HERBERGER v. HUSMAN. (No. 14,012.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1891.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE — RESCINDING CONTRACT — SURRENDER OF TITLE — SUFFICIENCY OF TENDER.

Land was sold under an agreement that, if the vendee should be dissatisfied with his purchase at the end of a year, and should give the vendor 30 days' notice and a release of the title, the latter would return the price paid with interest. Seventy-eight days before the expiration of the year the vendee gave written notice of his dissatisfaction, demanded the return of the money, and offered a release of the title. Again, at the end of the year, and twice afterwards, similar statements, demands, and offers were made, and each time the vendor promised to return the money and accept the title. Held, that the offer was sufficient, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 2074, providing that an offer in writing to deliver a written instrument is, if not accepted, equivalent to the actual production and tender of the instrument; and that the vendor was estopped by his promise to deny the tender.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by Herberger against Husman to rescind a contract for the purchase of real property and recover the amount paid. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. L. Horton, for appellant. Allen & Miller, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The defendant agreed that if plaintiff should be dissatisfied with the purchase of the lots at the end of one year (at which time—November 30, 1888—the balance of the purchase price was to be paid) he, the defendant, would return the $1,500 with interest thereon, provided the plaintiff gave him 30 days' notice and a surrender of the title to the lots.

The plaintiff did become dissatisfied with the purchase, and notified defendant of the fact on September 13, 1888, in a written notice, which contained a demand for the return of the $1,500 with interest, and an offer thereupon to surrender the title to the lots. Again, on November 30, 1888, the agent of plaintiff notified defendant of the plaintiff's dissatisfaction, made an express demand upon him for the return of the $1,500, and offered to surrender the title. In January and March following, similar statements, demands, and offers were made, and on every occasion, the court finds, upon sufficient evidence, the "defendant promised to return said sum of $1,500 with interest, as aforesaid, and accept a return of the title conveyed by said agreement to the property herein mentioned." The written notice of dissatisfaction was not premature. The terms of the contract are plain and easily understood. Defendant agreed to return the money upon 30 days' notice if plaintiff was dissatisfied with his purchase at the time the balance of the purchase price became payable. The defendant could not be required to return the money before the end of the year, and not then unless the 30 days' notice was given. The plaintiff's offer in writing was equivalent to the actual production and tender of a written release or quitclaim. Section 2074, Code Civil Proc.¹ But if the appellant's contention that the contract called for notice of dissatisfaction at the end of the year, and at no other time, be taken as the true meaning of the terms of the contract, it is sufficient to say that such notice was given. It is not clear that a written release was necessary to restore the title to defendant. But, be that as it may, defendant is estopped by his conduct from claiming that no release was tendered, or that the contract was not tendered for cancellation. The only claim or objection he made was that he did not have the money at the time. He led the plaintiff to believe that he would return the money as soon as he could raise the amount; and, having induced the defendant to act upon the belief that he would do so, it is too late now to change his position and defeat the plaintiff on the ground that a complete technical tender was not made. 2 Herm. Estop. §§ 820,

¹ Sec. 2074. An offer in writing to pay a particular sum of money, or to deliver a written instrument or specific personal property, is, if not accepted, equivalent to the actual production and tender of the money, instrument, or property.

NEWTON v. HULL et al. (No. 14,343.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 8, 1891.)

FORECLOSURE OF VENDOR'S LIEN — REFORMATION OF CONTRACT — PLEADING.

1. In an action to foreclose a vendor's lien, it appeared that the contract for the sale of the land provided that defendants should pay a certain amount down, and the balance of the purchase price in two installments, due, respectively, on or before May 1, 1888, and on or before November 1, 1888, with a further provision that, "time being of the essence of this contract," a failure of defendants to comply therewith operates as a forfeiture of all their payments and rights thereunder. February 7, 1889, plaintiff tendered a deed, and demanded payment of the unpaid installments, which was refused. Held, that plaintiff was not in default in not tendering a deed November 1, 1888, and was entitled to judgment.

2. An averment in the complaint, in an action to reform a contract to sell land, that the agreement was to sell an undivided two-fifths of the land described in the written memorandum, and "that the parties * * * intended to insert therein a description of the undivided two-fifths, * * * but that by mistake in drawing said memorandum * * * the description of said lot or parcel of land was therein set forth incorrectly in the following particulars," definitely setting forth the mistake, and how it occurred, sufficiently alleges that the mistake was a mutual mistake of the parties.

3. A direction in the second paragraph of the order of sale "that the land and premises in the complaint, and hereinafter described," be sold, etc., and which are described in the last paragraph as an entire tract instead of two-fifths, as set forth in the complaint, is a mistake, evidently clerical, creating an uncertainty as to the amount of land to be sold, not a subject for correction by appeal until after a motion for that purpose has been denied by the trial court.

Commissioners' decision. Department

1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by Mary H. Newton against B. J. Hull, W. D. Read, and others to reform an agreement for the sale of land and to foreclose the vendor's lien. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Hull appeals. Affirmed.

I. Hall and Holloway & Kendrick, for appellant. Lee, Gardiner & Scott, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to reform an agreement by which the defendants Hull and Read agreed to purchase, and plaintiff to sell, two-fifths of a piece of land situate in Los Angeles county, containing about 17 acres, together with 8 shares of the capital stock of the Lake Vineyard Land & Water Association, a corporation; and also to foreclose the vendor's lien upon the property for the unpaid portion of the purchase money. It is alleged in the complaint that by mistake in drawing the written memorandum of the agreement the words "undivided two-fifths of" were omitted from the description of the land, so that the memorandum purports to be that of an agreement to sell the whole undivided piece of land, but that the parties to said memorandum intended to insert therein a description of only the undivided two-fifths of the piece of land therein described. It is further alleged that, by mistake of the draughtsman, the description of the land in the written memorandum refers to page 312 of Book 118 of Deeds in the recorder's office, instead of page 407 of Book 167. A copy of the written agreement bearing the date of November 1, 1887, is set out in the complaint, and its execution is admitted. The price to be paid for the land and water stock was \$10,000, in the following installments: \$3,333.33 in hand, on the execution of the agreement, which was paid accordingly; \$3,333.33 on or before May 1, 1888; and \$3,333.33 on or before November 1, 1888. Interest on deferred payments at 10 percent. per annum. The other terms of the agreement pertinent to the question to be decided are as follows: "In the event of a failure to comply with the terms hereof by the said parties of the second part, the said party of the first part shall be released from all obligations in law or equity to convey said property, and said parties of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto, and shall also forfeit to said first party all right to any and all moneys theretofore paid thereon, time being of the essence of this contract. And the said party of the first part on receiving such payment, at the time and in the manner above mentioned, agrees to execute and to deliver to the said parties of the second part, or their assigns, a good and sufficient deed conveying the above-described property, and to deliver said water stock." The defendants Hull and Read failed and refused to pay the second and third installments, or any part thereof, up to the time of the commencement of this action, April, 1889. The complaint also contains the following: "That on or about February 7, 1889, plaintiff demanded payment from defendants B. J. Hull and W. D. Read of all the unpaid balance due and owing to plaintiff under and by virtue of the terms of said agreement, to-wit, demanded payment from defendants B. J. Hull and W. D. Read thereunder of the sum of \$6,666%, together with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from November 1, 1887, until date of such payment; that thereupon plaintiff tendered and offered to deliver to defendants B. J. Hull and W. D. Read, on receiving such payment, a good and sufficient deed conveying to defendants the title to said property so as aforesaid agreed to be conveyed, to-wit, said undivided two-fifths of said 17.42 acres of land; that thereupon plaintiff tendered and offered to assign and deliver to defendants B. J. Hull and W. D. Read said eight shares of capital stock of said Lake Vineyard Land & Water Association, a corporation as aforesaid; that thereupon defendants B. J. Hull and W. D. Read declined and refused to accept or receive either said deed or said water stock, and declined and refused to pay to plaintiff said \$6,666 $\frac{2}{3}$, or any part thereof; that thereupon defendants B. J. Hull and W. D. Read expressly stated that they would not make any further payments under said contracts." All the defendants except Hull made default or disclaimed any interest in the suit. Hull answered, and also filed a cross complaint praying for a rescission of the agreement, and a judgment against plaintiff for \$1,666.66, that being the portion of the purchase money alleged to have been paid by him. The court found for the plaintiff on all the issues and rendered judgment accordingly. The defendant Hull alone appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for new trial.

1. It is contended for appellant that because it does not appear that plaintiff tendered to defendants a deed to the land on the 1st day of November, 1888, when the third and last installment of the purchase money became due, she was in default equally with the defendants; that, "time being of the essence of the contract," the deed must have been tendered "at the time agreed upon, and at no other time;" and that by the mutual default of both parties "the contract came to an end, and cannot be enforced by either party." To maintain this position, counsel rely, principally, upon the case of Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280; but I think the opinion of the commissioners in that case, (in which I concurred,) in so far as it sustains the point made here by appellant's counsel, is out of line with the otherwise uninterrupted current of authority in this state. It is not sustained by the cases therein cited. The case of Bohall v. Diller, 41 Cal. 532, therein cited, decides nothing as to the point under consideration here, except that a party who agrees to convey land upon the payment of the purchase money cannot recover the purchase money until he tenders a deed; but does not decide that he will be in default unless he tender a deed on the very day the purchase money becomes due. In Englander v. Rogers, 41 Cal. 421, also cited, the facts were that the party agreeing to purchase paid a part of the purchase money under an agreement that it should be refunded if, upon payment of the balance, the vendor should not convey a good title. He sued the vendor to recover back the sum he had paid without averring that he had tendered payment of the balance of the purchase money. The court said: "The covenants of the vendor and vendee were mutual and dependent, and neither could put the other in default, except by tendering a performance on his own part, unless the other party either waived the tender, or, by his conduct, rendered it unnecessary. To entitle the plaintiff to maintain the action on the contract set out in the complaint, he should have averred a tender of the unpaid portion of the purchase money, or some sufficient excuse for the omission to tender it." This neither implies nor warrants the inference that the vendor might not have recovered the unpaid purchase money after tendering the conveyance of a good title, as was done in the case at bar, but rather the contrary. The report of the case does not show any express limitation of the time within which either party was to perform, nor does it appear that the time of performance by either party was of the essence of the contract. It follows that the case can have no proper application to the point here under consideration. Nor was the point to which it was cited in Cleary v. Folger (viz., that the defendant in that case "was no longer obliged to make a deed to the premises, * * * as the balance of the purchase money was not tendered") relevant or material in that case, since the defendant (vendor) in that case had not been asked to make a deed. He was only asked to refund that portion of the purchase money which the plaintiff had paid; and, though it may have been true that he "was no longer obliged to make a deed," it did not thence follow that he would not have been entitled to recover from the plaintiff (vendee) the unpaid portion of the purchase money in case he had tendered a deed, as did the vendor in the case at bar. Undoubtedly, time is of the essence of the contract under consideration, so far as it is expressed or implied that it should be so. It is expressly of the essence of the agreement on the part of the defendants to pay the last two installments of the purchase money, and as to which they were put in default by the plaintiff's tender of a deed and demand of payment on the 7th day of February, 1889, three months after the last installment became due; but, as to the agreement on the part of the plaintiff to convey the land "on receiving such payment," there was no default whatever, as there was no tender of payment by the defendants, or either of them. Hill v. Grigsby, 35 Cal. 656, and cases there cited; Englander v. Rogers, 41 Cal. 421; Bohall v. Diller, Id. 532. But the stipulation that time is of the essence of the contract seems to be applicable only to the agreement on the part of the defendants to pay the purchase money, and to be intended for the benefit of the plaintiff alone. Wilcoxson v. Stitt, 65 Cal. 596,¹ and cases there cited; Vorwerk v. Nolte, 87 Cal. 236, 25 Pac. Rep. 412; Smith v. Mohn, 87 Cal. 489, 25 Pac. Rep. 696. It is true that the plaintiff was not obliged to accept payment and convey the land at any time after the defendants had failed to pay the second installment at the time it became due, (May 1, 1888;) and at any time thereafter she might have elected to rescind the agreement, (Grey v. Tubbs, 43 Cal. 359;) but, as above remarked, it does not follow that the defendants could work a rescission of the agreement, or avoid their obligation to pay the purchase money by simply refusing to pay it, or by delaying payment thereof until after it became due. There is no provision in the agreement that the plaintiff should forfeit her right to the purchase money in case the defendants should fail to pay it on or before the day on which it became due, nor in case she failed to tender a deed on that day, or at any time before the defendants tendered payment of the purchase money. Nor was she bound to tender a deed, except upon tender of payment of the purchase money. Smith v. Mohn, and Wilcoxson v. Stitt, supra. As we have seen, she could not be put in default, even after the purchase money was overdue, except by her refusal to convey upon tender of the purchase money. She was, therefore, entitled, upon tendering the deed, to demand payment of the purchase money on the 7th day of February, 1889, as she did, and, upon defendants' refusal to pay, to bring this action.

2. Counsel for appellant contend that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to entitle plaintiff to a reformation of the written memorandum of the agreement, the alleged deficiency being that it is not averred that the mistake complained of was a mutual mistake of the parties, nor a mistake of one party which the other at the time knew or suspected. Inasmuch as there was no demurrer to the complaint on any ground, I think it should be held sufficient to show that the mistake was a mutual mistake of the parties. The complaint states that the agreement was to sell an undivided two-fifths of the land described in the written memorandum; that the plaintiff owned only two-fifths thereof; "that the parties to said memorandum of agreement intended to insert therein a description of the undivided two-fifths of the premises; but "that, by mistake in drawing said memorandum of agreement, the description of said lot or parcel of land was therein set forth incorrectly in the following particulars;" and then proceeds to state definitely the mistake, and how it happened to be made. To say that by mistake a description, different from that intended by the parties to the agreement, was inserted therein, is to say, substantially, that the mistake was a mutual mistake of the parties to the agreement.

3. The objection that the findings do not support the judgment is made upon no other ground than those upon which it is claimed that the complaint is insufficient; and, since the findings are quite as full and specific as the complaint as to the mutual mistake of the parties, this objection should be overruled.

4. In their reply brief, for the first time, counsel for appellant call attention to a mistake (evidently merely clerical) in the order of sale, by which that order is made, at least, ambiguous and uncertain as to whether the whole or only two-fifths of the piece of land described is to be sold by the sheriff. In the second paragraph of the decree it is ordered "that the land and premises in the complaint, and hereinafter described," be sold, etc. This evidently refers to the description in the first paragraph of the complaint, which is the same as that in the revised agreement; but the uncertainty is created by what purports to be a description of the land "directed to be sold," in the last paragraph of the decree, where it (the land to be sold) is particularly described by metes and boundaries as an entire piece of land containing 17.42 acres, instead of being described as the undivided two-fifths of that piece of land, as it should have been described. This error might and should have been corrected on motion in the trial court, as the record contains all the data necessary for that purpose. There was no necessity for an appeal to correct it, at least, until after a motion for that purpose had been denied by the trial court. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed in all respects, except that the court below should be directed to correct the description of the land directed to be sold, as indicated in this opinion, on motion of either party, the costs of this appeal to be borne by the appellant.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed, and the court below is directed to correct the description of the land directed to be sold, indicated in this opinion, on motion of either party; the costs of this appeal to be borne by the appellant.

SAN DIEGO LUMBER CO. v. WOOLDREDGE
et al. (No. 14,188.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1891.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN — RECORDING CONTRACT — VALIDITY — NOTICE OF CLAIM.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183, which provides that material-men may have liens, and that all building contracts shall be in writing when the price exceeds $1,000, and shall be filed in the office of the county recorder before work is commenced, otherwise the contract to be void, and in such case all material furnished shall be deemed to have been furnished at the instance of the owner, a failure to give a description of the property affected by the contract does not invalidate it, as no description is required by statute.

2. Where a contract was recorded, a notice of lien which states that the lien claimant agreed with the contractor to furnish the lumber and building material to be used in the construction of a building, and delivered the same, for which the contractor agreed to pay $333.86, as he received payment under his building contract, is sufficient, as the terms of payment could be ascertained from the building contract.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1184, concerning mechanics liens, which provides that at least 25 per cent. of the whole contract price of a building shall be made payable at least 35 days after the final completion of the work, a contract providing for final payment in 30 days after the completion of the work is not invalid, as the statute requires liens to be filed within 30 days after completion of a building, and no prejudice could arise.

4. A notice of lien was subscribed, "Williams & Whitmore," followed by a form of verification, viz.: "—, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is one of the persons named as Williams and Whitmore in the foregoing claim of lien. * * * [Signed] A. C. WILLIAMS." Held sufficient to show that Williams, of Williams & Whitmore, was the affiant.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

Action by San Diego Lumber Company against W. D. Wooldredge and others to foreclose a material lien. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wellborn, Stevens & Wellborn, for appellant. David L. Withington and Geo. W. Hardacre, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This action is to foreclose a lien for materials furnished defendant Smith, as contractor, for building a house for defendant Wooldredge. The other defendants were lienors. Williams & Whitmore were the only lien claimants who answered. The contract price for the building was $1,945, all of which had been paid except $505. Plaintiff's demand was for $748.86. Williams & Whitmore recovered judgment for $145.50, and $50 as an attorney's fee. On the trial various objections were made to plaintiff's notice of lien, all of which, however, are only modifications of the general one, "that it contains no sufficient statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract" under which the materials were furnished. The objection was sustained, and subsequently a nonsuit was granted as to defendant Wooldredge. Exceptions were duly taken, and the case comes here on an appeal from the judgment and an order refusing a new trial.

The material portion of the notice of lien is as follows: "The said San Diego Lumber Company agrees to furnish said lumber and building material to said Smith, to be used in the construction of said building upon said real property, and deliver the same at Escondido, in said county; and the said Smith agrees to pay therefor the sum of $833.86, the same to be paid in partial payments, (the amounts of which were not fixed,) at the time when payments become due said Smith, under said contract between him and said Wooldredge, provided that full payment for all materials furnished as aforesaid was to be made when the final payment become due said Smith from said Wooldredge under said contract between them." The trouble is that it refers to the contract between the contractor and Wooldredge for the terms of making payments, and does not repeat the provisions of the contract on that subject. The contract, being for more than $1,000, was duly filed in the recorder's office of the county, and all parties interested could there readily ascertain what the contract had provided upon the subject. Referring to that contract, we find payments by installments explicitly stipulated. But the notice of lien states that the amount of partial payments was not fixed. Upon this contract the plaintiff could not insist upon any specific sums being paid until the final payment became due upon the completion of the contract, when all became due. This seems a sufficient compliance with the statute, and we think the claim should have been received in evidence.

Plaintiffs contend that their recovery should not be limited to the balance unpaid on the contract, because they say the contract is void—First, because it contains no description of the property to be affected thereby, to which it is sufficient answer that the statute contains no such requirement; and, second, it makes the final payment of 25 per cent. due 30 days after final completion of the contract, when the Code provides that 25 per cent. of the contract price shall be payable at least 35 days after the final completion of the contract. Section 1183, Code Civil Proc., makes the contract void, if the amount exceeds $1,000, unless it be in writing, subscribed by the parties thereto, and filed in the office of the county recorder of the county. All this was done, and upon no other default does the statute declare the contract void. But the same consequence follows for a material non-conformity of the contract with the statute, under section 1184, Code Civil Proc., so far as to permit material-men and laborers to recover without regard to the amount due upon the contract. After stating what the contract shall contain, it proceeds: "In case such contracts and alterations thereof do not conform substantially to the provisions of this section, the labor done and the materials furnished by all persons, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance and request of the person who contracted with the contractor, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." This section, as amended in 1885, declared all such contracts and alterations void. In 1887 that provision was stricken out; but, although the contract is not rendered void, lienors may recover irrespective of the amount due, and upon a contract which shall be deemed to have been made at the personal instance and request of the person contracting with the contractor, and for the value of the labor or materials. But is there such a substantial non-conformity with the requirements of the Code as will justify a judgment against the owner to pay again a debt which he has already paid in good faith upon his contract? In determining this question it must be kept in mind that this is a penalty, and not a statutory mode of acquiring a right against another, as in the case of a claim of lien. In the latter case, although the rule has been somewhat relaxed in favor of liens under this chapter, very great strictness of performance is generally exacted, but every reasonable intendment is indulged to avoid a penalty. The plaintiff has not been injured, nor can we see how any lienor could be, by the fact that the final payment became due in 30 rather than 35 days. Their liens must be filed within 30 days, and attach before this payment could legally be made under this contract. As they are in as good a position as they would have been had the time been 35 days, I think the penalty has not been incurred.

There being due only about one-half enough to pay the two liens, plaintiff objects to the notice of lien on the part of Williams & Whitmore, on the ground that it was not verified. The objection was sustained, and the ruling is complained of here. The claim of lien is subscribed, "Williams & Whitmore," and immediately following this signature is what is claimed as a verification, as follows: "State of California, county of San Diego—ss.: —, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is one of the persons named as Williams and Whitmore in the foregoing claim of lien; that he has read the same, and knows the contents thereof; and that the same is true, and that it contains (among other things) a correct statement of their demand, after deducting all just credits and offsets A. C. WILLIAMS. Subscribed and sworn to before me this 2d day of February, 1887. W. R. HAWTHORNE, Justice of the Peace." It is contended that this does not show who was sworn, but I cannot subscribe to that view. Evidently some one who in the notice of lien was named Williams or Whitmore was sworn, as appears from the body of the verification, and the signature and certificate of the magistrate fix the matter beyond question. The blank is not more indefinite than the word "affiant" would have been. The verification is sufficient. The judgment against the plaintiff, and also the order denying its motion for a new trial, should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

RAMISH v. KIRSCHBRAUN et al. (No. 13,818.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1891.)

BREACH OF CONTRACT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. Where, in an action for breach of contract, the complaint alleges that defendants agreed to deliver to plaintiff, at A., 12,000 dozen eggs, as soon as they could be transported from O., and that the eggs arrived at A. on July 8th, but were not delivered to plaintiff until July 14th, evidence of the price of eggs on July 18th is inadmissible to show damage.

2. It was error to permit plaintiff to testify that he had contracted to sell the eggs at 21 cents per dozen, but, on account of the failure to deliver them in time, he lost the sale, and was obliged to sell them at 16 cents, as the evidence must be confined to the market value of eggs between July 8th and 14th.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

Action by Remish against Kirschbraun and others to recover damages for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Gould & Stanford, for appellants. Del Valle & Munday, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. It is alleged in the complaint that on or about June 25, 1888, the defendants agreed to deliver to plaintiff, at Los Angeles, 12,000 dozen of eggs, for the sum of $1,770, as soon as the same could be transported by rail from Omaha, Neb.; that the eggs arrived at Los Angeles on July 8, 1888, but defendants did not deliver them to plaintiff until July 14th, although he was ready and willing at all times on and after the 8th to receive and pay for them; that by reason of the failure of defendants to deliver the eggs to plaintiff upon their arrival at Los Angeles he sustained damages to the amount of $600. The defendants filed an answer denying each and every allegation. Judgment was entered on a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $600, and defendants have appealed.

It will be seen from this statement of plaintiff's cause of action that his claim is based upon the facts that defendants failed to deliver the eggs before July 14th, although they actually arrived at Los Angeles on the 8th, and that between these dates the price of eggs had depreciated, incurring a loss to him of $600 on the lot. In his testimony plaintiff stated that the market price of eggs was highest on the day and the day after the eggs arrived at Los Angeles. After that several car-loads came into the market, and the price went down. He was permitted by the court to state that he had contracted with Stanley and Henry to sell the eggs to them for 21 cents, but on account of the failure of defendants to deliver them in time he lost the sale, and was obliged to sell the eggs at a fraction over 16 cents per dozen. The court ought to have sustained defendants' objection to the evidence as to what Stanley and Henry had agreed to pay plaintiff for the eggs. The evidence should have been confined to the inquiry, "What was the market value of eggs between July 8th and July 14th?" The price agreed upon between himself and others—in no way connected with defendants—was incompetent to establish the market value of the eggs or the liability of the defendants. The court erred in a more serious particular. It permitted a witness called on behalf of plaintiff to state that about the time the eggs arrived at Los Angeles they were worth 21 cents per dozen, but owing to the arrival of several car-loads the market price of eggs was reduced, and about the 18th they were worth only 17 cents per dozen. Between the 8th and 18th, the witness testified, eggs were worth 21 cents per dozen, but about the 18th the market price was about 17 cents per dozen. The damages claimed by plaintiff were sustained by him, according to the allegations of his complaint, between the 8th and 14th. Any evidence, therefore, showing the market value of eggs subsequent to the 14th, was clearly inadmissible. It is claimed by appellants that there was no contract to deliver the eggs at any particular time, and therefore plaintiff failed to prove any cause of action. On this subject the court fairly instructed the jury, and, as the case must be sent back for a new trial, we will not express any opinion as to the weight of the evidence. Judgment and order reversed.

PEOPLE v. ELLIOT. (No. 20,808.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1891.)

FORGERY—SIGNING FICTITIOUS NAME.

1. One who, with intent to forge the check of R. & M., signs the name "A. E. R. & Co." thereto, believing it to be the true name of the firm, is not guilty of forgery, but may be prosecuted under Pen. Code Cal. § 476, declaring it a crime to make and pass checks bearing fictitious names, with intent to defraud.

2. In such case the defendant cannot be convicted of forgery, upon his confession alone that he had signed the name "A. E. R. & Co."

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge. Indictment of H. N. Elliot, for forgery.

Verdict of guilty. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

M.W. Conklin, for appellant. W.H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of forgery, and appeals to this court from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. He was charged by the information with forging a certain check signed "A. E. Rice & Co." The evidence in the case was as follows: (1) At the time the defendant procured money upon the check he stated that "Red Rice," who was engaged in the furniture business at the city of Los Angeles, gave him the check as the result of a transaction in furniture. (2) "Red Rice" testified that his name was Edwin A. Rice; that at the time of the alleged forgery he had a partner, and the name of the firm was Rice & McKee; and that he did not sign the check or authorize it to be signed. (3) The confessions of the defendant that he forged the check. It is elementary law that the defendant cannot be convicted upon his confessions alone, and in this case there is no evidence whatever as to the non-existence of such a firm as "A. E. Rice & Co.," and non constat but there was such a firm, and the check was genuine. If we assume that there was such a firm in existence, then the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial ordered, by reason of the insufficiency of the evidence in not showing that the check was not signed by such firm. If we assume that there was no such firm in existence then the check was a fictitious check, and the prosecution should have been had under section 476 of the Penal Code, and the case must be reversed upon that ground. From the facts set forth in the information it is apparent that it was filed and conviction had under section 470 of the Penal Code, which section is quite broad in its scope, but not sufficiently broad to include the matters contained in section 476; for that section contemplates that the information must contain allegations, and the evidence be produced to substantiate them, that the check was fictitious, and the defendant knew that fact. Williams v. State, 9 Humph. 80; People v. Dowd, 4 Pac. Coast Law, L. J. 459.

The court gave the jury the following instruction: "If you find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that at the time and place alleged, with the intent alleged, defendant did feloniously make, utter, and pass as genuine the check in question; that he intended to sign there-to the name of the firm of Rice & McKee, and by mistake signed the name of 'A. E. Rice & Co.,' believing that to be the correct name, and uttered the same as the genuine check of said firm; and that said Southern California National Bank is a corporation as alleged; and that said check is false and unauthorized,—then you should find the defendant guilty, notwithstanding the mistake in the name of said firm." Without going into a technical analysis of this instruction, as to whether or not it fully answers the requirements of the law in other respects, let us see if it be true that in the words of the instruction the defendant is guilty of forgery, "if, intending to sign the name of the firm of Rice & McKee to the check, by mistake he signed the name of A. E. Rice & Co., believing that to be the correct name." Where a note, bill, check, etc., is the subject of a forgery, it must be proven that the instrument was not signed by the person by whom it purports to be signed, or that such person did not exist at the time; or, in other words, is a fictitious person. In this case, as we have already seen, the proof is lacking in both of these essential respects. Considered in the light of the foregoing instruction of the court, there is no such firm in existence as "A. E. Rice & Co.;" therefore, the check is fictitious, and the prosecution should have been had under section 476, heretofore cited. The law appears to recognize a distinction between forged instruments purporting to have the signature of a person in existence, and those where the signature is purely and entirely fictitious. Indeed, at common law, at one time, it was not forgery to sign the name of a fictitious person to an instrument. Section 470 of the Penal Code is quite broad in its terms, and, in the absence of said section 476, it might probably be construed broad enough to include fictitious instruments as referred to in said section; but, the legislative mind having been directed specially to that class of instruments with reference to the offense of forgery, it would seem the act of making or passing a fictitious check could only be prosecuted when brought within the requirements and conditions of that section. Considered in the light of the instruction, the signature is of a copartnership not in existence, which, ipso facto, makes the instrument a fictitious check; and the fact, if it be a fact, that defendant intended to sign the name of an existing firm to the check appears to be entirely immaterial. He is being prosecuted, and necessarily so, for an offense actually committed, and not for an offense he may have intended to commit. The law does not recognize a man's intentions as a crime, however corrupt and criminal those intentions may be. His intentions simply form the light by which we read and weigh his acts. This is in no sense a question of idem sonans, but the defendant appears to have been prosecuted upon the theory that the signature of the existing firm "Rice and McKee," for the purposes of this case, was attached to the check. Especially is this apparent when we consider the following instruction: "In order to constitute the crime of forgery, the resemblance of the forged signature to the genuine must be such as might deceive a person of ordinary caution." While we are not called upon to review this instruction, it being given at the request of the defendant, yet in the face of the fact that the signature to this check is fictitious, as the court assumed in the other instruction which we have considered, and that there was no such firm in existence as A. E. Rice & Co., and therefore no such genuine signature in existence, to say the least, the two instructions, when taken together, must have tended to confuse and cloud the minds of the jury. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; HARRISON, J.; McFARLAND, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

MANNING v. DEN. (No. 13,821.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1891.)

STREET IMPROVEMENTS — VALIDITY OF CONTRACTS — ASSESSMENT — EVIDENCE.

1. Act Cal. March 18, 1885, § 5, relating to street improvements, provides that after contracts have been awarded notice thereof shall be posted for 5 days, and that within 10 days from the first posting, if the owners of the major part of the frontage on the street where work is to be done shall elect to take the work at the price awarded, and shall enter into a contract to that effect, they shall have the work; but if they do not so elect, the street superintendent shall contract the work to the one to whom it was awarded. Held, that the superintendent had no authority to contract with the one to whom it had been awarded until after 10 days from the first posting of the notice of award.

2. Where the complaint in an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment alleges a contract with the street superintendent, and the answer denies it, the award, assessments, and diagrams, with the affidavit of demand and non-payment, constitute prima facie evidence of such contract.

3. Defendant offered in evidence two documents, one purporting to be a contract between the plaintiff's assignors and the street superintendent, but which was signed by the assignors only; the other was in the form of a bond, which justified in "double the sum in the bond specified as the penalty thereof," without naming the amount of the penalty, or the names of the obligors, or making any reference to any contract for specific work, and was signed by the obligors only. Each document was certified as a "true and correct copy" of the original on file in the street superintendent's office. Held that, as they tended to show that no contract for doing the work had ever been made, they should have been admitted in evidence.

4. The objections to the correctness of the proceedings, being jurisdictional, were not waived by defendant's failure to appeal to the city council under Act Cal. March 18, 1885, § 11, which provides, among other things, for appeals to the council by those who have any objection to any act or proceeding of the superintendent of streets; and, after authorizing the council to correct the proceeding, declares that the decision of the council shall be final "as to all errors, informalities, and irregularities which said city council might have remedied and avoided."

5. Nor does the further provision in section 11, that "no assessment shall be held invalid except upon appeal to the city council," etc., apply to a case where the council are powerless to remedy the defect.

6. The judgment was erroneous in providing for a personal judgment against defendant for any deficiency that might remain after the sale of the lot assessed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by E. R. Manning against R. S. Den to foreclose the lien of a street assessment. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant moved for a new trial, which being denied he appeals. Reversed.

M. Whaling, for appellant. Herdon, Cain & Garrison, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. 1. It is alleged in the complaint that on the 15th day of October, 1888, the city council of Los Angeles awarded to the assignors of the plaintiff a contract for doing the work upon which the assessment in question was afterwards issued; that the clerk posted a notice of said award "on the 17th day of October, 1888, and for five days thereafter;" that afterwards, on the 22d day of October, 1888, the street superintendent entered into a contract with the plaintiff's assignors to do said work, and thereafter made the assessment upon which this action is brought. Section 5 of the act of March 18, 1885, authorizing street improvements, provides that after the contract has been awarded "notice of such awards of contracts shall be posted for five days, in the same manner as hereinbefore provided for the publication of proposals for said work. The owners of the major part of the frontage of lots and lands upon the street whereon said work is to be done * * * may within ten days after the first posting of notice of said award elect to take said work, and enter into a written contract to do the whole work at the price at which the same has been awarded. Should the said owners fail to elect to take said work, and to enter into a written contract therefor within said ten days, * * * it shall be the duty of the superintendent of streets to enter into a contract with the original bidder, to whom the contract was awarded, at the prices specified in his bid." The provisions of this section make it clear that the superintendent is not authorized to enter into a contract with the person to whom it has been awarded until after the expiration of 10 days from the first posting of the notice of award. During that period the owners of the land to be assessed are allowed the privilege of electing to take the work, and enter into a written contract to do the same at the price at which it was awarded. The power of the superintendent to enter into a contract with the "original bidder" does not arise or come into existence except upon a failure of the owners to make their election within the statutory period; and any contract entered into by him with the bidder before the time when by the statute he has the power to enter into such contract is without authority and void, and, consequently, cannot be the basis of a valid assessment. Burke v. Turney, 54 Cal. 486.

2. One of the issues to be determined by the court was whether the superintendent of streets had entered into a contract with the assignors of the plaintiff. The complaint alleged that such contract had been entered into by him on the 22d day of October, 1888. This allegation was denied by the answer, and it was, therefore, incumbent upon the plaintiff to establish the fact. If the superintendent had not entered into any contract for doing the work, there was no authority for him to make any assessment, and the assessment that had been offered in evidence by the plaintiff would not create any charge upon the property of the defendant. The award, assessment, and diagram, with the affidavit of demand and non-payment, offered by the plaintiff, was prima facie evidence that such contract had been entered into, and, in the absence of any other evidence, would have justified the court in so finding. It was, however, competent for the defendant to overcome the effect of this evidence, and establish his denial of the allegation, by any competent and relevant evidence. The documents offered by him were both relevant and material for this purpose, and should have been received in evidence. One of the documents offered purported to be a contract between the superintendent and the plaintiff's assignors for doing the work that had been awarded to them, and bore the same date as the contract alleged in the complaint. It had been prepared for execution by both parties, and was signed by the plaintiff's assignors, but was not signed by the superintendent. The other document was in the form of a bond for the faithful performance of the work, and was signed by the plaintiff's assignors and two sureties, who justified in "double the sum in the bond specified as the penalty thereof;" but the bond itself named no obligors, nor did it specify any sum as the penalty thereof. It was only a blank form, without containing any reference to any contract for any specific work, and was without any date. These two documents were produced from the records of the superintendent of streets, and were each certified to be a "true and correct copy of the original on file in the office of the superintendent of streets." They certainly tended to show that no contract for doing the work had ever been entered into by the superintendent. Being on file in his office, they bore the presumption of an official character and relevancy to an assessment made by him for the work described therein; and, in the absence of proof of any other contract, the court must have found that they were the only contracts in his office for doing that work.

3. Any objections to the correctness of the proceedings by reason of the foregoing defects, were not waived by the defendant by his failure to appeal to the city council. Section 11 of the statute in question provides for an appeal to the city council by those who feel aggrieved, or have any objection to any act, determination, or proceeding of the superintendent of streets; and, after authorizing the city council to remedy and correct any error or informality in the proceedings, declares that the decisions and determinations of said city council upon such appeal shall be final and conclusive "as to all errors, informalities, and irregularities which said city council might have remedied and avoided." It is evident, however, that the foregoing defects in the proceedings could not have been remedied or avoided by the city council upon any appeal from the assessment. At that time the work had been done, and there was no occasion for any contract to be entered into; and any direction from the city council to the superintendent of streets to enter into a contract would have been nugatory as to anything that had taken place prior thereto. A contract entered into by the superintendent at that date would not validate an assessment for work that had been done prior thereto. Unless the superintendent had entered into a contract in pursuance of the award at a time when by the provisions of the statute he was authorized to do so, there was no foundation for any of the subsequent proceedings, and the person who did the work acquired no rights thereby against the owner. "A contract authorized and executed in the mode prescribed by the act, is indispensable to the validity of the assessment. This defect is not cured by the failure of the lot-holders to appeal to the board, because, had an appeal been taken, the defect could not have been remedied by the board." Dougherty v. Hitchcock, 35 Cal. 524. "The premature action of the superintendent was one which affected his power or jurisdiction. His action was void, and that which was void does not become valid by reason of a failure to appeal. The property owners were not aggrieved, and the failure of the contractor to appeal did not operate (1) to create a grievance on the part of defendants, and (2) to estop them from complaining of it." Burke v. Turney, 54 Cal. 487.

The provision in the latter part of section 11, that no assessment shall be held invalid except upon appeal to the city council, etc., has no application to a case in which an appeal is not authorized, or in which, even if taken, the city council could not have remedied the defect. The legislature did not intend to declare that the owner should be deprived of his defense to any claim upon an assessment, where the assessment was void by reason of incurable defects, because he had failed to invoke the aid of a tribunal which was powerless to grant him any relief. Nor would the owner be estopped from presenting any such defects because he had appealed to the city council, and that body had denied him relief. Their denial of relief may have been based upon the express ground that the matter appealed from was not such as they could remedy, and, therefore, they would decline to take any action. If, however, they had expressly determined that the assessment was valid and the previous steps irregular, their decision would not have any binding force. Being a tribunal of limited jurisdiction, unless the facts conferring such jurisdiction existed, their action would be void, and it would be competent at any time to show that they had no jurisdiction to determine the question.

4. The judgment entered herein is erroneous. It provides for a personal judgment against the defendant for any deficiency that may remain after a sale of the lot assessed. Such judgment is unauthorized. Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 241. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

In re CHENEY. (No. 20,854.)

CARRYING CONCEALED WEAPONS—CITY ORDINANCE—PENALTY.

1. Const. Cal. art. 11, § 11, providing that any city may make all such local police regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, empowers a city to prohibit by ordinance the carrying of concealed weapons by persons, not public officers or travelers, without a permit from the police commissioners.

2. A city has the right to prescribe any penalty for the violation of its ordinances within the limits designated by its charter; and where St. Cal. 1861, p. 552, fixed the limit at $1,000, a fine of $250 for carrying concealed weapons is not excessive.

In bank. Petition by O. F. Cheney for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged.

Z. T. Cason, for petitioner. Davis Louberback and W. S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The petitioner was convicted in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco of violating section 22 of ordinance No. 1603 of said city and county, as amended by ordinance No. 2189, and was sentenced "to pay a fine of $250, and, in default of payment of said fine, to be imprisoned in the county jail of said city and county at the rate of one day for each one dollar of said fine, until said fine is satisfied." The fine not being paid, he was on the 8th day of June, 1891, committed to the custody of the sheriff, by whom, at the issuance of the writ herein, he was detained in the county jail under said commitment. Section 22 of the ordinance named reads as follows: "Sec. 22. It shall be unlawful for any person, not being a public officer or traveler, or not having a permit from the police commissioners of this city and county, to wear or carry concealed in this city and county any pistol, dirk, or other dangerous or deadly weapon. Every person violating any of the provisions of this order shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine of not less than $250 and not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment not less than three months and not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Such persons, and no others, shall be termed 'travelers,' within the meaning of this order, as may be actually engaged in making a journey at the time. The police commissioners may grant written permission to any peaceable person, whose profession or occupation may require him to be out at late hours of the night, to carry concealed deadly weapons for his own protection." It is contended by the petitioner that the judgment under which he was convicted is void, and his detention thereunder unlawful, for the reason that by the terms of the ordinance the court has no discretion to fix the penalty for its violation at a less sum than $250, and the ordinance is therefore "repugnant to, and not in harmony with, the spirit and letter of the laws and constitution of the state of California upon kindred subjects, and in conflict with the kindred statutory provisions thereof;" and also for the reason that under the terms of his sentence he may be confined 250 days, whereas the limit of imprisonment which the court is authorized to impose as a punishment for the violation of the ordinance is 6 months.

Counsel for petitioner has not pointed out to us any specific provisions of the statutes or constitution of this state with which the ordinance is directly repugnant or in conflict, but in his argument has chiefly relied upon the proposition that the ordinance is void upon the ground that the minimum penalty for its violation is excessive and unreasonable. Article 11, § 11, of the constitution of this state provides that "any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." This gives to each municipality the right to determine what police regulations it will prescribe; and the only limitation upon the exercise of the power is that such regulations shall not be in conflict with the general laws of this state. There is no general law in this state which forbids the carrying of deadly weapons concealed; so that in the passage of this ordinance there is no violation of the constitutional limitation. It is a well-recognized principle in government that the police requirements of a city are different from those of the state at large, and that stricter regulations are essential to the good order and peace of a crowded metropolis than are required in the sparsely-peopled portions of the country. Hence the organic act of the state has directly conferred upon each city the power to make such rules, in regulating the conduct of those within its jurisdiction, as in the judgment of its legislative body will best preserve their rights. Many police regulations which are demanded by the exigencies of life in a crowded city have reference chiefly to social order, and are directed to the promotion of the comfort and safety of the citizen, as well as to the protection of individual and public property. The mode of using the streets, the manner of conducting business, the times and places at which certain occupations shall be plied, are instances of this class, and the power granted to the city is limited to their regulation. It is with reference to ordinances of this character that it is said by courts they must be reasonable, and not violate those rights of the individual that are superior to the demands of society. There are other police regulations, however, which are intended for the prevention of crime and the preservation of the public peace, and in reference to which the legislative body of the city is vested with a discretion that is not reviewable by the courts. In the exercise of this power, the municipality, in determining the penalty to be imposed for violating its ordinances, is limited only by the terms of its charter, and the reasonableness of the punishment is not to be questioned elsewhere. It is a well-recognized fact that the unrestricted habit of carrying concealed weapons is the source of much crime, and frequently leads to causeless homicides as well as to breaches of the peace that would not otherwise occur. The majority of citizens have no occasion or inclination to carry such weapons; and it is often the case that the innocent bystander is made to suffer from the unintended act of another, who, in the heat of passion, attempts to instantly resent some fancied insult or trivial injury. It is to protect the law-abiding citizen, as well as to prevent a breach of the peace or the commission of crime, that the ordinance in question has been passed. By its terms, ample provision is made for those whose necessities of life or of occupation require protection from carrying such weapons; and, as the prohibition does not extend to those who come within the exceptions, there is no invasion of the rights of the citizen.

Having the right to pass the ordinance in question, the city has the right to prescribe any penalty for its violation within the limit designated in its charter. As the legislature has fixed this limit at the sum of $1,000, (St. 1861, p. 552,) it follows that the penalty prescribed by the ordinance is not illegal. The writ is discharged, and the prisoner remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

BATES et al. v. SANTA BARBARA COUNTY
et al. (No. 14,372.)¹

MECHANICS' LIENS—NOTICE TO OWNER—COSTS AND COUNSEL FEES.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1184, providing that a mechanic or material-man may give the owner of the building for which he has furnished material or labor written notice of his claim, and that it thereupon becomes the duty of the owner to retain sufficient funds to pay it, a mechanic employed by a subcontractor, who serves the required notice, acquires a prior right to the fund in the hands of the owner due the contractor, though the latter may not be entitled to a lien, the building being a public one.

2. The right of such mechanic to a deficiency judgment against the subcontractor is not waived by his proceeding to enforce the lien, or to recover from the owner the balance of the contract price unpaid.

3. Where no lien exists, the costs of filing notice thereof and counsel fees for its attempted enforcement cannot be allowed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

Action by Bates and others against Santa Barbara county and others to enforce a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Jas. G. Garrison, W. C. Stratton, and Del Valle & Munday, for appellants. B. F. Thomas, John J. Boyce, and A. E. Putnam, Dist. Atty., for respondents.

PATERSON, J. On October 2, 1888, the defendants Booty and Holmes entered into an agreement with the defendant the county of Santa Barbara to erect for the latter on a public block in the city of Santa Barbara a brick building, to be used by the county as a hall of records, for the sum of $19,850. The contract was reduced to writing, but was never signed by any officer of the county. Thereafter, defendant the Star Brick & Supply Company began the construction of the building under a contract with Booty and Holmes, and prosecuted the same until August, 1889, when Booty and Holmes assumed control of the work, which was completed by them, and turned over to and accepted by the county on September 11, 1889. Plaintiffs and their assignors performed services and furnished materials under contracts made with the Star Brick & Supply Company, while the latter was engaged in constructing the building, and it is for the value of such services and materials that this action was brought. During the progress of the work the county paid to Booty and Holmes on account of the contract price the sum of $11,991, leaving a balance of $7,859 due at the time the building was completed. Soon after the completion of the work plaintiffs served upon the proper county officers notices in writing of their respective demands, and thereupon the board of supervisors passed a resolution reserving the balance of the contract price for the satisfaction of all claims and liens. Notices in the form required by section 1187, Code Civil Proc., were filed in due time in the office of the county recorder by the plaintiffs. On January 4, 1890, plaintiffs filed their claims against the county with the clerk of the board, setting forth the facts required by the provisions of the county and township government act, and the board refused to pay the same, or any of them, until the claims were established by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. Thereupon this action was commenced against the county of Santa Barbara for the sums of $6,551.73, value of the work done and materials furnished by plaintiffs, $37.40, cost of filing and recording the notices of lien, and $850, attorneys' fees. Upon the application of the county, the defendants Booty and Holmes, original contractors, and the brick and supply company, subcontractors, were brought in and made parties defendant. The court found as conclusions of law that the several plaintiffs were entitled to recover judgment against the county of Santa Barbara in accordance with the rank of their respective claims, specifying the rank of each, the amount to which they were entitled, together with interest thereon, costs, and an attorney fee of $30 for each claimant, the same to be paid out of the balance of $7,859, set aside for that purpose by the board of supervisors; that the claims of Booty and Holmes and the brick and supply company were all subordinate and subject to the claims of the plaintiffs; that, in case the fund was insufficient to pay the amounts found due, plaintiffs would be entitled to judgment against the defendant the brick and supply company for the deficiency; and that plaintiffs were entitled to a lien on the hall of records. Judgment followed in accordance with the conclusions of law, except that no lien was declared therein against the building. The county was satisfied with the judgment, and paid the claims as directed by it. The defendants Booty and Holmes and the brick and supply company appealed, bringing the case before us on the judgment roll alone.

Appellants' contention that a lien cannot be acquired against a public building is sustained by the authorities, (Phil.

Mech. Liens, § 179; Code Civil Proc. § 690, subd. 13; Ripley v. Gage Co., 3 Neb. 397; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 577; Foster v. Fowler, 60 Pa. St. 27; Poillon v. Mayor, 47 N. Y. 666; Mayrhofer v. Board, [Cal.] 26 Pac. Rep. 646;) but it does not follow that the claims of Booty and Holmes are not subordinate and subject to the claims of the plaintiffs, so far as the unpaid portion of the contract price is concerned. Under section 1184, Code Civil Proc., the mechanic or material-man may give the owner of the building upon which he has performed labor, or for which he has furnished material, written notice of his claim, and thereupon it becomes the duty of such owner to retain sufficient funds to answer such claim. Upon receipt of the notice the owner becomes liable as on garnishment or assignment. McAlpin v. Duncan, 16 Cal. 128. "It is a form of equitable subrogation regulated by statute." Loonie v. Hogan, 9 N. Y. 439, 440; Frank v. Chosen Freeholders, 39 N. J. Law, 347; 2 Jones, Liens, § 1285. The rights of plaintiffs do not depend upon the legality of the contract. Whether it was void or valid, the contractor and subcontractor will be held to be the agents of the owner for the purposes of the law, and neither the one nor the other can assert a want of privity between himself and the laborer or material-man. The right of plaintiffs to recover does not depend upon their right to a lien. The equitable garnishment provided for by section 1184, Code Civil Proc., is a cumulative remedy, in ordinary cases; but in this instance it is the only remedy provided by the lien law, because the pursuit of the remedy by foreclosure would involve the taking of buildings which, on the grounds of public policy and public necessity, are exempt from execution and forced sale. And this remedy is one which does not contravene any principle of public policy. It operates merely as an assignment pro tanto of the money due by the owner to the contractor, and in no way affects the public buildings. The fund is in the treasury, and the statute justly provides that, instead of paying it to the contractor for the work which he agreed to do, but which the laborer has actually performed, the owner shall pay it to the latter. The true spirit and merit of the statute is lost sight of in the contention that this remedy is a mere substitute for the remedy by lien, and that, when the latter does not exist, the former cannot exist. The right to control and direct the fund remaining in the hands of the owner is as distinct and independent as the right to file and enforce a lien. It is a remedy entirely disconnected from and additional to the remedy by lien upon the building, and as the exceptional element which it is claimed arrests in this case the usual operation of the lien law does not exist, it is a remedy which should be regarded with favor by the court. The brick and supply company was primarily liable to plaintiffs for their respective claims, and cannot be heard to complain of the deficiency judgment. The right to a money judgment against the person who employs the mechanic or purchases the material is not lost or waived by a proceeding to enforce the lien or recover from the owner the balance of the contract price remaining in his hands. Brennan v. Swasey, 16 Cal. 140; Association v. Wagner, 61 Cal. 349; Code Civil Proc. §§ 1194, 1197. Furthermore, it appears that the funds held by the county are more than sufficient to pay all the demands of the plaintiffs.

The complaint contains all the allegations necessary to show a due presentation of plaintiffs' claims against the county and the rejection thereof; but if it did not, so long as the county does not complain, we do not think appellants should be heard on such an objection.

The court erred in allowing each claimant $2.20 for filing his notice of lien, and $30 attorney fee. Inasmuch as no lien could be acquired by any of the claimants, no expense incurred in attempting to secure one should have been allowed. The statute does not in express terms provide for counsel fees, except in cases of lien, (sections 1184, 1195, Code Civil Proc.,) and, of course, such fees cannot be allowed unless expressly authorized by law, (section 1021, Code Civil Proc.) The cause is remanded, with directions to modify the judgment by striking out from the amounts allowed to the several claimants the sum of $32.20. As thus modified, the judgment will stand affirmed.

SHEWARD v. CITIZENS' WATER CO. (No. 14,265.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 2, 1891.)

CITY ORDINANCES—REGULATION OF WATER-RATES —APPEAL FROM INJUNCTION.

1. Const. Cal. art. 14, requires cities to regulate water-rates by ordinance. Ordinance Los Angeles Feb. 1890, § 1, fixes certain specific rates for the use of water according to the size of the house, etc. Section 2 provides that, where there is a large consumption or waste of water, the person or corporation furnishing it may apply a meter, and collect a certain amount for certain quantities of water used. Held, that the ordinance was not invalid, in that it fixed different rates for consumers of the same class.

2. Where a preliminary injunction was granted, and afterwards made perpetual on full hearing, an appeal only lies from the final judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Action by Sheward against the Citizens' Water Company for injunction. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Howard & Balmer, for appellant. Dooner & Burdett, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant is a corporation supplying a portion of the inhabitants of Los Angeles with water for domestic use by means of its system of water-works in that city; and the plaintiff is the owner of a certain house and premises connected with the water system of the defendant, and dependent upon it for all water necessary for domestic use or consumption. In the month of February, 1890, the city council of Los Angeles, in accordance with the requirements of the constitution, adopted an ordinance "regulating the rates and compensation to be collected by any person or corporation supplying water for domestic use and private purposes to the inhabitants of that city during the year commencing July 1, 1890, and ending June 30, 1891." By the first section of this ordinance it fixed certain specific rates for the use of water furnished for dwelling-houses, according to the size of the house, and with additional rates for water used for certain specific purposes, such as bath-tubs, water-closets, lawn-sprinklers, etc., commonly called "house-rates." The second section of the ordinance declares: "Any person or corporation furnishing water to the inhabitants of the city of Los Angeles shall have the right, in all cases where there is a large consumption or waste of water, to apply a meter and collect the following meter rates: For quantities of water, 1,000 cubic feet or less, for each 100 cubic feet, 35 cents; * * * for each 100 cubic feet, over 5,000 and less than 10,000, 25 cents. * * * Any person or consumer of water shall have the right to apply a meter at his own expense, but under the supervision of the water company, and pay for his water at meter rates as above, provided that in no case where meters are used shall the bill for water be less than one dollar per month." In the month of May of that year the defendant, with the consent of the plaintiff, had applied a meter to the water service of the plaintiff, and through it supplied him with all water consumed by him during the months of July and August. According to the schedule of house-rates fixed by section 1 of the ordinance, the rates of water for the house and premises of the plaintiff amounted to $6.20 each month. By the measurements of the meter the defendant was entitled to collect a greater sum of money, and accordingly it demanded of the plaintiff $12.95 for the water consumed in July, and the sum of $11.95 for that consumed in August. The plaintiff tendered to the defendant on the last day of each of said months the sum of $6.20, and demanded therefor a receipt in full payment of the water-rates for the month ending on that day, but the defendant refused to receive the same, or any sum less than the above amounts of $12.95 and $11.95, respectively, as a payment of said rates, and, the plaintiff refusing to pay any more than the amounts tendered by him, the defendant threatened to shut off its water supply, and disconnect the house and premises of the plaintiff from its water-works and system. Thereupon the plaintiff brought this action to enjoin the defendant from so doing. Upon the filing of the complaint a restraining order was issued by the judge of the court in which the action was brought, and subsequently, viz., October 20, 1890, upon the application of the plaintiff, and after notice to the defendant, the judge issued a provisional order of injunction in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. Thereafter the defendant filed an amended answer, to which the plaintiff demurred, and, the court having sustained the demurrer, the defendant declined to further amend its answer; whereupon the court rendered its judgment, which was entered

October 25, 1890, "that the portion of the ordinance set out in the complaint which provides for meter rates, at the option of the company furnishing water, is contrary to law and void," and perpetually enjoined the defendant from shutting off the water supplied to the plaintiff, and furnished by it, or from severing or in any wise impairing the connection of the plaintiff's premises with the water system of the defendant. On the 8th of November, 1890, the defendant appealed from the judgment, and on the 19th of November, 1890, from the order of injunction.

The plaintiff has moved to dismiss the latter appeal upon the ground that, the final judgment awarding the plaintiff a perpetual injunction having been entered before such appeal was taken, no appeal could thereafter be taken from the order.

1. The order of injunction made October 20, 1890, was a provisional remedy, which by its terms was limited "until further order in the premises." Upon the entry of the final decree this provisional remedy was merged in the perpetual injunction thereby granted to the plaintiff, and ceased to have any operative effect upon the defendant. Its functions having thus terminated, there was thereafter no existing "order" granting an injunction from which an appeal could be taken. Webber v. Wilcox, 45 Cal. 301; Lambert v. Haskell, 80 Cal. 611, 22 Pac. Rep. 327; Gardner v. Gardner, 87 N. Y. 14; Jackson v. Bunnell, 113 N. Y. 220, 21 N. E. Rep. 79. It follows that the motion to dismiss the appeal from the provisional order of injunction must be granted.

2. The demurrer to the answer admits not only the facts alleged therein, but, also, for the purpose of determining the sufficiency of the answer, that the facts alleged in the complaint, which are denied in the answer, form no part of the plaintiff's cause of action, and are not to be regarded by the court. It is thus admitted by the plaintiff that the ordinance above named was properly adopted, and that for the year beginning July 1, 1890, the defendant was entitled to collect from the plaintiff for the water consumed by him according to the rates therein specified; that in the month of May, before the said ordinance went into effect, the defendant, for the purpose of ascertaining the exact consumption of water on the premises of the plaintiff, applied a meter to the water service for said premises "with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff;" that the consumption of water by the plaintiff during the months of July and August of that year "was much in excess of the amount reasonably required," and that the use of water by him on said premises during said months was "large, unusual, and wasteful;" that said meter was so constructed "that it would properly and accurately measure the water consumed by plaintiff on his said premises, and, by said meter measuring the water so used by the plaintiff, it was ascertained that said plaintiff consumed upon said premises during the month of July, 1890, 7,311 cubic feet of water, and during the month of August, 1890, the plaintiff consumed on his said premises 6,652 cubic feet of water;"

that the sums demanded of the plaintiff for water consumed by him during these months were reasonable, and were the ordinary meter charge made by the defendant to its customers, and in no wise discriminative against the plaintiff, and were less than the amount of rates therefor fixed by the ordinance; and that the plaintiff had refused to pay said sums. Upon the facts thus admitted the plaintiff showed no cause of action for compelling the defendant to continue its supply of water, or to enjoin it from cutting off such supply.

The argument presented in support of the judgment is that an ordinance "which fixes two rates, one to be determined by the size of the house and lawn and by certain specific uses, the other by the amount of water consumed, as shown by the meter," is invalid for the reason that it establishes two or more different rates for the same class of consumers, and enables the water company to discriminate between consumers of the same class. The city council of each municipality is by the constitution, art. 14, § 1, made the legislative body upon which is devolved the duty of fixing the rates to be collected for the use of water supplied to the inhabitants of any city. Its act in fixing these rates is a legislative act, and when performed is to receive all the presumptions and sanctions which belong to acts of legislative bodies generally. It must be assumed that the council, in fixing the rates for any year, have adopted such a measure of compensation as will be just towards the rate-payer as well as the company, and that the mode of collection is that which, in the judgment of this legislative body, will best subserve the interest and rights of both parties. The power of the court to disregard the terms of the ordinance has not been discussed by counsel, but, if we should concede that the court, in a controversy between the water company and a rate-payer, has any jurisdiction to inquire into the propriety of the terms of the ordinance, where the ordinance is not void upon its face, we do not think that the facts shown in the present record authorize such inquiry. The ordinance in question does not, upon its face, show that the rates to be collected, where the amount of consumption is ascertained by a meter, are different from those collected from persons who are rated by the use to which they apply the water. It may be assumed that, for the purpose of fixing the rates in any year, the city council would, as a preliminary consideration, determine the gross amount of compensation to be allowed the water company for the estimated quantity of water to be furnished by it, and would fix the rates so that this compensation would be realized. For this purpose it would establish some unit of quantity as the standard by which the rates to be collected should be fixed, and would then, in its rating for specific uses, estimate what portion of this unit would be consumed in the several specific uses for which rates are established. This unit of quantity is found in the second section of the ordinance, and, whenever the supply is determined under the provisions of that section, the compensation is in strict accordance with the standard so fixed. Recognizing the fact, however, that to furnish and keep in order meters for all its consumers increases the expenses of the company, and indirectly the rates to be borne by the consumers, the city council, in order to avoid this increase of cost, has in the first section adopted a schedule of rates to be collected for certain specific uses of water. As the rates to be collected by the water company are properly in accordance with the amount of water furnished, and not for the use to which it is applied, the council, for the purpose of determining these rates, would ascertain from such sources of information as were available what portion of the unit of quantity fixed in the standard for compensation would, under ordinary circumstances, be supplied for each of these specific uses, and would fix the rates accordingly. Necessarily the same amount of water will not be consumed by each individual, even for the same specific uses, and these rates may not produce the same compensation to the company as it would receive under the second section of the ordinance; and while this provision of the city council for rates in the absence of exact measurement, will only as a general rule be equivalent to the rates charged by measurement, and may result in an inequality of individual rates, it affords only another illustration that in practical legislation absolute perfection is unattainable.

These rates are not, however, permanently conclusive upon either the consumer or the company. If the consumer is of the opinion that they call for greater compensation than is authorized by the amount of water which is actually supplied to him, he has the right to have his exact consumption ascertained and rated; and if, on the other hand, the company is of the opinion that the consumer makes use of a larger amount of water than is justified under the estimate made in fixing the rates for specific uses, it can attach a meter and receive compensation for the exact amount consumed. In either case there is nothing unjust or inequitable to either party, since in each the company receives and the consumer pays for the exact amount of water supplied. Nor can it be said that the ordinance itself furnishes any opportunity for discrimination or distinction between its customers. The objection that the meter may be inaccurate in measurement cannot be considered. A meter is a measurer, and we must assume, upon the facts as alleged, that it correctly measures and determines the water which passes through it. With reference to the proposition of the respondent that the company has not the right or power to shut off the water from its consumer, when the consumer refuses to pay for the water supplied, we merely say, "as it is submitted without argument, it is overruled in like manner." Sharp v. Dangney, 33 Cal. 514. The appeal from the order of injunction made October 20, 1890, is dismissed. The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded.

SALLE v. MAYER. (No. 14,117.)

CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS—CONTRADICTION—RECORD OF FORMER PROCEEDINGS—CROSS-EXAMINATION—HOSTILITY BEFORE TRIAL—EVIDENCE.

1. A tenant, in an action against his landlord for money expended and work done, testified on cross-examination that at the time of the landlord's entry he did not "claim to be in possession under a lease, because there was no lease." Thereupon, for the purpose of contradicting him by showing a former admission that his possession was that of a tenant, the landlord offered a transcript in a former action between them, wherein the tenant had recovered damages for the said entry. The witness was not asked what he had admitted or alleged in the former action; nor was his attention called to the transcript. Held, that it was not proper at that time for the purpose proposed.

2. Where a tenant, in an action against his landlord, produces a written statement of account, made nearly a year before the trial, the exclusion of an inquiry, on cross-examination, as to what his feelings towards the landlord were at the time he made the statement, is not prejudicial; since it was material, only, what his feelings were at the time he testified.

3. The testimony of the tenant that he was induced to go on the land by the verbal promise of the landlord that he would give him a five-years lease, and that after his removal he refused to execute it, but told him to go on and cultivate the land, and that he would pay him for the work, is not objectionable, as proving a lease for more than one year that is not in writing, where the tenant claimed nothing under a lease, and the testimony was intended only to explain how he came to be upon the land.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Assumpsit by Salle against Mayer. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Reymert, Ortila & Reymert, for appellant. Elmer E. Rowell and Willis, Cole & Craig, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This action is of the nature of a common-law action of assumpsit. The complaint contains three counts: (1) For goods sold and delivered; (2) for money paid for the use of the defendant; and (3) for labor performed by plaintiff for the defendant. As to the first count, defendant's answer admits the sale of the goods, but pleads payment. As to the second, the answer merely denies that the defendant "is indebted to plaintiff in the sum" demanded, or in any other sum. As to the third count, the answer simply denies that plaintiff performed the alleged labor, or any labor, for defendant "at his instance and request." The answer alleged counter-claims against the plaintiff for money paid for plaintiff's use, for money loaned, for personal property of defendant converted by plaintiff to his own use, and for pasturing plaintiff's cow. The balance of plaintiff's demand, after crediting defendant with payment of $129.39, is $873; and the amount of defendant's counter-claims is $673. The case was tried by a jury, whose verdict was for plaintiff in the sum of $500, upon which judgment was rendered. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying defendant's motion for new trial.

1. The point that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict is not sustained; for, although the evidence is conflicting, that on the part of the plaintiff sufficiently tends to prove that a balance of $500 was due from defendant to plaintiff, to justify the verdict.

2. It appears that plaintiff, with his family, was residing on defendant's land—a tract of 115 acres—from December, 1887, until February, 1889, during which period the alleged indebtedness of defendant to plaintiff accrued. The plaintiff testified that he was induced to go on the land by a verbal promise of defendant that he would execute to plaintiff a lease of the land for a term of five years; that after his removal the defendant refused to execute the lease, but told plaintiff to go on and cultivate the land, and that he (defendant) would pay for the work. Defendant's counsel moved the court to strike out "all the testimony in regard to the contract for the lease, * * * on the ground that the lease was for more than a year, and not in writing." It is insisted that the denial of this motion was error; but the testimony was not intended to prove a lease, but only to explain how plaintiff was induced to remove his family upon defendant's land. Plaintiff claimed nothing under the lease which he said had been promised by defendant, but distinctly testified that it was never executed. The testimony, therefore, was not objectionable on the ground stated.

3. While testifying in his own behalf, plaintiff produced a written statement of accounts between himself and defendant, which he said he had made nearly a year before the trial. This statement was marked, "Plaintiff's Exhibit One." On cross-examination defendant's counsel asked the following question: "What were your feelings toward the defendant at the time you made plaintiff's Exhibit One?" The court sustained an objection to this question, and it is claimed that the ruling was prejudicial error. But, conceding that it was error, I think it was harmless. It was material that the jury should have been informed what were the feelings of the witness towards the defendant at the time he was testifying. What they were 9 or 10 months before could have been material only by virtue of the prima facie presumption that unfriendly feelings usually continue 9 or 10 months. But, without the aid of this presumption, it must have appeared to the jury that the feelings of the plaintiff and defendant towards each other were hostile at the time of the trial, and this was doubtless considered by the jury in estimating the credibility of plaintiff's testimony.

4. Before the defendant opened his case, and upon cross-examination of the plaintiff, defendant's counsel asked the following question: "Did you, on February 13, 1889, when defendant threw your things out, claim to be his tenant, and in possession of that place as his tenant?" The court sustained an objection to this question, but the witness answered the question as follows: "At that time I did not claim, and could not claim, to be in possession under a lease, because there was no lease." Thereupon, "for the purpose of showing the relation of plaintiff and defendant, February 13, 1889, and the character of plaintiff's possession," and to show a former admission of plaintiff that he was in possession as tenant, defendant's counsel offered in evidence what he called the "judgment roll" from a justice's court in a former action between the parties to this action, wherein the plaintiff herein recovered from the defendant $50 damages on the following complaint: "(1) That on the 13th day of February, 1889, the defendant entered the premises of the plaintiff in the town of Rincon, and unlawfully and willfully and maliciously broke open the plaintiff's barn, and turned out the plaintiff's horse, which became estrayed; and said defendant also willfully and maliciously entered a building used and occupied by plaintiff as a cook-house and store-house, and took therefrom the farming tools, consisting of shovels, hoes, etc., and otherwise willfully and maliciously trespassed upon said premises. Plaintiff further alleges that, without giving legal notice, the defendant ordered plaintiff's family to quit said premises, and abused the wife of the plaintiff with rude and violent language, inspiring her with terror, and causing her great mental suffering. (2) That the plaintiff was damaged by said unlawful act of defendant in the sum of two hundred and ninety-nine dollars and costs." The answer to this complaint was merely a denial of each and every allegation of the complaint. Upon objection to the introduction of this transcript from the justice's court, the court ruled that it was not proper to introduce it at that time for the purposes proposed, and said: "It might be competent at some other time. You simply ask a witness a certain question, and then wish to contradict him at this time." In this there was no error. The witness had not been asked any question as to what he had admitted or alleged in the action in the justice's court; nor had his attention been called to the transcript of the case. If that transcript contained evidence relevant for the defense, it was not proper for defendant to introduce it at that time for the purposes proposed. It was afterwards offered, however, at a proper time, and excluded by the court; but the defendant did not except to the ruling of the court in finally excluding it.

5. The instructions of the court to the jury were as favorable to the defendant as he was entitled to ask, and there was no exception to any instruction given.

The instruction asked by defendant and refused by the court was not applicable to the evidence. There was no evidence tending to prove such an agreement or understanding as that stated in the instruction refused. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

LATTIN et al. v. HAZARD. (No. 14,266.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 5, 1891.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—MUTUALITY OF REMEDY.

An agreement to convey land in consideration of the vendee building a dummy railroad through and by the vendors' premises, and operating the same for a period of 10 years, fare not to exceed a certain sum, cannot be enforced until the vendee has performed his part of the agreement by operating the road for the time specified, and at the fixed rate; since Civil Code Cal. § 3386, provides that "neither party to an obligation can be compelled specifically to perform it unless the other party thereto has performed, or is compellable specifically to perform, everything to which the former is entitled under the same obligation."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by Emma J. Lattin and others against Henry T. Hazard for specific performance of an agreement to convey land. Judgment for defendant on demurrer. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Dooner & Burdett, for appellants. O'Melveny & Henning, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment against them on demurrer to their complaint. It is their second appeal, the former (85 Cal. 58, 24 Pac. Rep. 611) being from a similar judgment. The complaint was amended so as to avoid the defect then pointed out, and is now questioned upon other grounds. The action is to enforce specific performance of an agreement between James McLoughlin, as party of the second part, and a number of persons, who apparently owned severally various tracts of land in Los Angeles or the vicinity. Some of them agreed to convey to him certain lands and to give him the right of way for a street railroad, in consideration of which he agreed to extend and operate his steam-dummy railroad through and by their lands on a route designated. The party of the second part further stipulated "that the road shall be well and substantially built, and operated by steam-dummy motive-power, for a period of not less than ten years, and shall have a carrying capacity and speed equal to all the requirements of the said section and the business thereof." He further agreed that the fares should not exceed certain specified rates, "and that the rate so established shall not be raised for a period of ten years." It was stipulated that the subscriptions by those who gave land should be by their several grants of land, contiguous to the line of the railway, severally conveying a clear title in every case, at the date of the agreement, or within 20 days thereafter, to be held in escrow until the completion and operation of the railroad. It is averred that the contract had been fully performed by McLoughlin. The contract was dated the 9th day of March, 1887. It does not appear when the suit was commenced, but the amended complaint was filed November 26, 1890. It is evident that some parts of the contract have not yet been performed by McLoughlin, as whose assignee plaintiff brings this suit.

The first point raised on the demurrer is that specific performance cannot be decreed, because, in the nature of things, the remedy is not mutual; that the contract could not be specifically enforced against McLoughlin, and has not been fully performed by him, "or nearly so;" and that the want of entire performance cannot be fully compensated in damages, because such damages cannot be estimated, nor does the plaintiff offer such compensation. The appellant does not contend that specific performance could have been enforced against McLoughlin, but contends that the deeds were to be delivered upon completion of the work, meaning the extension of the road, and that the road has been so constructed. As to the agreement to operate the road in a certain stipulated mode, with a stipulated efficiency, and at specified rates for 10 years, she says that is an independent covenant, upon which an action might lie for a breach. Unfortunately, that is an argument against her right to specific performance. Section 3386 of the Civil Code seems decisive of this point. Unless the remedy be mutual, specific performance will not be decreed, except where the other party has performed everything to which the other is entitled under the same obligation, or nearly so, and full compensation for any want of entire performance is made. The continued operation of the road was an important part of the consideration for the deed. The contract therefore is not nearly performed. Indeed, except by the general allegation that McLoughlin has fully performed, there is no averment that the road is now being operated. McLoughlin may be fully entitled to a conveyance, according to the terms of his contract, without being able to maintain this action. The rule upon this subject is sufficiently stated in the section of the Code cited, and the authorities may be found collected in Pomeroy on Specific Performance of Contracts, § 162 et seq. It makes no difference whether the covenants are concurrent or not. The agreement that McLoughlin will operate the road for the stipulated period in the mode agreed upon is a substantial and important part of the obligation, which has not been performed, and of which specific performance cannot be enforced by a decree. Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 403; Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 458. Damages are not claimed in the complaint, nor is there an averment of an assignment of such a cause of action to plaintiff. Taking this view of the first point presented on the demurrer, it becomes unnecessary, and perhaps it would be improper, to discuss the other important questions suggested. We think the judgment should be affirmed.

GARNSEY et al. v. GOTHARD et al. (No. 14,025.)

TRUSTS IN LAND—HOW CREATED.

1. A daughter gave her father an absolute deed to lands, and the next day made a writing intended as a will, but which was void for irregularity, declaring that she deeded the land to her father for certain purposes therein stated. In a subsequent action concerning the land, the father filed a verified answer, averring that the land was conveyed to him in trust. Held, that this answer was sufficient to satisfy Civil Code Cal. § 552, which provides that no trust in relation to land is valid unless created or declared by a written instrument signed by the trustee.

2. The deed was not invalidated by the void will.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; H. K. S. O'MELVENY, Judge.

Action by Garnsey and others against George Gothard and Thomas Edwards for specific performance of contract, and to determine which defendant was entitled to payment of the contract price. The case turned entirely on the latter point. Judgment for defendant Gothard, and an order denying defendant Edwards a new trial, from which he appeals. Reversed.

Sauel Minor and Minor & Woodward, for appellants. Wicks & Ward and Scarborough & Waterman, for respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This action is for the specific performance of a contract whereby defendant Gothard and his late wife, Elizabeth Jane, agreed to convey to the plaintiffs a certain tract of land, and 40 shares of water stock appurtenant thereto, upon their paying the stipulated price therefor, in certain installments, all of which, excepting the last, had been paid before the commencement of this suit, as stipulated; and the plaintiffs are ready and willing to pay the last installment to such person or persons as the court may determine is or are entitled to receive the same. The defendants, Gothard and Edwards, each claim to be entitled to receive said last installment. And defendant Gothard claims that he is also entitled to the installments which have been paid to defendant Edwards since the death of said Elizabeth Jane. The contest is wholly between the defendants, Gothard and Edwards, as to which of them is entitled to receive and hold the proceeds of said sale. The decision and judgment were in favor of Gothard and against Edwards, and the latter appeals from the judgment, and order denying his motion for a new trial.

The facts found by the court are that the allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint are true. That entitled them to the relief prayed by and granted to them. The residue of the findings are upon the issues raised by the answers of defendants, Gothard and Edwards, as to their respective claims to the money paid and to be paid by plaintiffs under their contracts with the Gothards.

The first finding upon the issue is that "Elizabeth Jane Gothard (the wife of the defendant George Gothard, and mother of B. T. Gothard) on the 11th day of January, 1887, made, executed, and delivered to the defendant Thomas Edwards a conveyance of her interest in the real estate described in the plaintiffs' complaint herein. The conveyance was made in view of the approaching death of said Elizabeth J. Gothard, and for the purpose of putting the legal title to said realty in said Edwards, to collect the money then due on the contract for the sale thereof in said complaint set out, and hold the same in trust for Bertrude Gothard alone, and with an oral understanding then and there with said Edwards to that effect, and without other consideration than such understanding." The next finding is "that thereafter, to-wit, on the 12th day of January, 1887, the said Elizabeth Jane Gothard, in anticipation of death and cum animo testandi, made and signed" a paper, of which a copy is inserted in said finding, and among other things contains the following: "I deeded to my father, Thomas Edwards, all interest in that property at Anaheim that I now own, being the same that was given me by deed of gift, except $1,200 to pay the mortgage thereon; also $500 that we received on the sale of the said land now due. $3,100 which I request be used as follows: $200 to be paid to Mr. Melrose, commission fees for selling the said place; $100 to my husband, being in lieu for the $100 that he has paid out of the $500 that I gave him from my separate property; $1,200 to be used to the best advantage in buying a lot for my remains, and erecting a good stone thereon, fencing the said lot in good shape; also to pay what portion of my funeral expenses shall be left unpaid. The remainder, which is $1,600, is to be kept for the use of my child, Bertrude Thomas Gothard, until he becomes 21 years old; all interest on the same to be invested and added to the principal, with the exception of ten or fifteen dollars a year to keep my grave and lot in good condition. If he dies before the age of 21 years, then to my brothers' and sisters' children. It is also my desire that my burial lot shall be put in my child's name. [Signed] ELIZABETH J. GOTHARD." The court finds that the paper was not olographic, but was written by said Edwards, and was only subscribed by said Elizabeth Jane Gothard, and was without attesting witnesses; and that she died within less than twelve hours thereafter; and said paper "was intended by said decedent as her last will and testament, but that she died intestate and leaving no estate, and said attempted will was worthless for any purpose, and that she left no heirs at law other than the said George Gothard, her surviving husband, and said Bertrude T. Gothard, her minor child." From the foregoing facts the court finds, among others, the following conclusions of law: "That the said sum of $1,398.95 so due from plaintiffs shall be paid by them into the hands of said George Gothard, guardian; that the defendant Thomas Edwards is indebted to the estate of the minor B. T. Gothard in the sum of $1,971, less $211."

It is only on the supposition that the court lost sight of the fact before found, that said Elizabeth Jane Gothard conveyed her interest in said property to defendant Edwards, that we can account for the finding of these conclusions of law. There is nothing in the findings of fact, much less in the evidence, to base such a conclusion upon. The finding is that "Elizabeth Jane Gothard, on the 11th day of January, 1887, made, executed, and delivered to the defendant Thomas Edwards a conveyance of her interest in the real estate described in the plaintiffs' complaint." That imports a deed absolute on its face, as the evidence proves it to be. But the evidence aliunde the deed, at least, tends to show that it was made, as the court finds it was, for the purpose of putting the legal title to said realty in said Edwards, to enable him to collect the money then due on the contract for the sale thereof in said complaint set out, and hold the same in trust. If the evidence is sufficient to establish a trust, there is nothing in the evidence or findings of fact to support the decision that Edwards, under the trust, is not entitled to hold all of the money paid and receive all to be paid by the plaintiffs for a conveyance to them of the land described in their complaint. A fortiori, if a trust has not been established, he is entitled to receive and hold it. We think, however, that a trust is established; and that the objects for which it was created are specified in the paragraph above quoted from the writing, which the court finds was made and signed on the 12th day of January, 1887, the day following the execution of the deed to Thomas Edwards. We do not overlook the provision of the Code that "no trust in relation to real property is valid unless created or declared by a written instrument, subscribed by the trustee or by his agent thereto authorized by writing." Civil Code, § 852. The defendant Edwards, by his verified answer in this action, has declared in a written instrument, in the most solemn manner, that the property in controversy was conveyed to him in trust. We think that a sufficient declaration in writing to satisfy the requirements of the Code.

The contention of counsel for respondent Gothard is that the writing of the date of January 12, 1887, was intended as a will, and, being so intended, it nullified the deed of January 11, 1887; that the deed, which is properly executed, was vitiated by a subsequent futile attempt to make a will; that the two instruments are so blended as to constitute but one; and that both must stand or fall "with the sufficiency or insufficiency of the execution of the testamentary paper dated January 12, 1887." There are cases in which it is held that a deed and will made upon the same day constitute one testamentary act; and other cases in which deeds have been held to be testamentary. But we are unable to find any case in which it has been held that a deed, otherwise valid, is rendered invalid by a void instrument subsequently made by the grantor. The theory of respondent Gothard's counsel does not appear to have been adopted by the court below. But we can conceive of no sounder or more plausible theory upon which the decision of the court below could be sustained. We think the decision clearly erroneous, and would modify or direct a modification of the judgment in accordance with the views above expressed, were it not for the fact that there is no finding on one of the material issues. By the contract between the Gothards and the plaintiffs the former agreed to convey with the land described therein a "water-right thereunto appertaining, viz., forty shares." In his answer defendant Gothard states that he is the owner of said forty shares of water stock, and that it "is distinct and separate, a distinct property from said land." This presents an issue upon which there is no finding, and, under our view of the case, a complete determination of it could not be had in the absence of such a finding. We think appellant is entitled to receive and hold all the moneys paid or to be paid for the land conveyed to him by Elizabeth Jane Gothard. But if the water stock is owned by George Gothard he is entitled to the money paid or to be paid for that. And it is necessary that the court should find who owns the water stock, and what proportion of the money paid or to be paid by the plaintiffs is for said water stock. So much of the judgment only as adjudges "that on payment of the money remaining due by plaintiffs on the contract of purchase set up in plaintiffs' complaint, to-wit, the sum of $1,398.95, the said Thomas Edwards and said George Gothard convey to plaintiffs herein the land and water stock in the complaint described," is affirmed. With that exception the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to try and find upon the issue raised by the allegation of defendant George Gothard that he is the owner of said 40 shares of water stock, and upon the trial of said issue the respective parties will be allowed to introduce any evidence pertinent to said issue.

RIGHTS OF VENDOR—RESALE BY VENDEE.

1. On May 13, 1887, A. contracted with B. for the sale of land for $1,000 cash, $1,000 May 12, 1888, and $1,500 May 12, 1889; deed to be executed on second payment; balance secured by mortgage on the land. On May 17, 1887, B. contracted to sell the land to C. On December 16, 1887, A. executed a deed to B., and took a mortgage on the land to secure the deferred payments. One note for $1,000 was made payable May 16, 1888, and one for $1,500, May 16, 1889. All parties were fully informed as to the contracts of May 13th and 17th. Held, that A. did not lose his lien by changing the form of the security and the date of payment.

2. The equities acquired by C. in the land were no greater than those of his vendor.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by William F. Stanton against George Quinan, Thomas W. Grimes, and others to foreclose a mortgage. Decree for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Elmer E. Rowell and Willis & Cole, for appellant. Harris & Gregg, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action is to foreclose a mortgage executed by defendant Quinan to one Salton. The appeal is upon the judgment roll. May 13, 1887, Salton contracted in writing with Quinan for the sale of the property described in the mortgage for $3,500,—$1,000 payable at once, $1,000 on or before May 12, 1888; and $1,500 on or before May 12, 1889. When the second payment was made, Salton was to convey to Quinan, receiving a mortgage on the property for the last payment. May 17, 1887, Grimes purchased the property from Quinan for $4,000, payable $1,500 in cash; $1,900, May 16, 1888; and $1,500, May 16, 1889. The contract was in writing, and contained a stipulation to the effect that upon full payment Quinan would convey the premises to Grimes free from all incumbrances. The two deferred payments were secured by negotiable promissory notes. December 16, 1887, before any of the deferred payments in their contract became due, Salton conveyed the property to Quinan, and took from him a mortgage to secure the money then due on the contract, made payable according to two promissory notes, being the mortgage and notes sued upon in this action,—one note for $1,055.90, due May 16, 1888, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum; the other for $1,574.88, payable May 16, 1889, with interest at 10 per cent. The rate of interest is the same as in the original contract; the notes became due four days, respectively, after the payments were to have been made under the contract. Before the execution of the mortgage, Salton knew of the purchase by Grimes, and the terms of his agreement with Quinan, and of the payment made by him; and the plaintiff purchased the mortgage with full knowledge of such facts. Grimes, also, at the time of his purchase, knew all the facts with reference to the contract between Salton and Quinan.

Appellant contends that Salton took the mortgage subject to his equities as purchaser from Quinan, and in this we agree with him; but we do not agree with his further contention that his interest in the land is not subject to the lien of the mortgage. Appellant was entitled to such rights with reference to the property as Quinan had under his contract. Salton and Quinan could not rescind it, or make its conditions more onerous. Had he asked for such relief, perhaps he would have been entitled to a decree that, upon paying the amount due upon the contract, the mortgage should be satisfied, and a deed made to him for the property. But he does not propose to pay anything. The difference between the amount due on the contract and the mortgage is but trifling, and is due to compounding the interest before it was due. The appellant is not complaining of that, but contends that by the change in the form of the debt and security Salton lost his lien. In this he is mistaken. There is no merit in the objection made to the complaint; and, if there were, such an objection could only be made by special demurrer. We think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIFF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

BEATTY, C. J. In order to a proper understanding of the various questions involved in this appeal it is necessary to state pretty fully the facts out of which the case arises. On June 7, 1887, the plaintiff, a married woman, living separate from her husband, entered into a written contract with the Colton Land & Water Company, whereby said company agreed to sell and she agreed to purchase certain real estate, situate in San Bernardino county, for the sum of $57,000, to be paid $1,000 cash on the delivery of the agreement, one-third of the balance in 15 days, and the remaining two-thirds in 6 and 12 months. It was stipulated that time was of the essence of the contract, and that failure by the vendee to comply with its terms should release the vendor from all obligation to convey, and work a forfeiture of all sums paid. It was further stipulated that at the time of paying the first one-third of the purchase money the vendee should procure from one P. A. Raynor a release and settlement of certain claims of Raynor against the vendor then in litigation. In pursuance of the contract, and at the date of its delivery, Mrs. Ferguson made the cash payment therein provided of $1,000, and thereafter obtained the consent of the vendor, indorsed in writing on the contract, extending the time for making the second payment to and including the 12th day of July, 1887. At the time of obtaining the extension she assigned the contract to the defendant McBean,—that is to say, her written assignment was to McBean alone; but she claims that it was in fact made to the defendants McBean and Bills jointly, such being the understanding and intention of the parties. In consideration of said assignment she received from McBean a contract in writing, signed by him alone, in the following terms: "It is hereby agreed on the part of Alexander McBean, of Oakland, California, to and with Mrs. M. L. Ferguson, that in case the said Alexander McBean shall sell or purchase the interest of the Colton Land and Water Company in and to certain lands, water, and agreements held in common with P. A. Raynor, under and by virtue of an agreement by and between said company and M. L. Ferguson, dated June 7, 1887, or any extension of time granted by said company or which may be given to said McBean, that he will pay to said Mrs. M. L. Ferguson or assigns the sum of three thousand dollars at the time of the consummation of said sale or purchase. Witness my hand and seal this 30th day of June, 1887. [Seal.] ALEXANDER McBEAN." But, although executed only by McBean, the plaintiff claims that this was understood to be and was equally the contract of Bills. Bills is a step-son of McBean, and it clearly appears that they were not only connected very closely in their personal relations, but that they were at and about this time engaged in the same kind of speculation in the same locality, and generally conversant each with the doings of the other; but they both deny that Bills had anything to do with the transaction between McBean and the plaintiff. Shortly before the time for making the second payment, McBean, who had gone to San Francisco, as he says, for the purpose of raising money or interesting parties with means to conclude the purchase, telegraphed to Colton announcing his failure, whereupon the plaintiff exerted herself, as she claims, to procure money for Bills, in order that he might make the second payment, and prevent a forfeiture of the contract. She claims that she did raise this money, and that Bills used it in making the second payment, and in obtaining a conveyance of the property in pursuance of the contract. The defendants deny this, and claim on the contrary that the money procured through the exertions of plaintiff was obtained for P. A. Raynor, who, in conjunction with Bills, subsequently purchased the same property mentioned in the contract, not, however, in pursuance of its terms, but under a separate and independent agreement entered into between them and the owner after the expiration of the time, as extended for plaintiff's second payment. As to all these matters, the evidence is extremely conflicting, but it is not disputed that on the 12th day of July, the very last day for making the second payment under plaintiff's contract, Bills went to the office of the Colton Land & Water Company, and proposed to purchase the identical property described in the contract, and offered to pay on the purchase the same amount stipulated in the contract as a second payment. The company refused to entertain his proposition unless he produced the release of Raynor's claims, as provided by the contract. He offered to comply with this condition if they would give him until the next day to get the release, to which offer the company assented; and accordingly, on the following day, July 13th, Bills delivered Raynor's release, paid the sum of $19,000, and received a conveyance of the land to himself. In making the purchase he claimed and received credit for the $1,000 originally paid by the plaintiff; that is to say, he was credited on the purchase price of $57,000 with the full sum of $20,000, although he paid but $19,000, and gave his notes for the balance of $37,000, secured by mortgage on the land. After the conclusion of the purchase, and on the same day, he conveyed a half interest in the land to P. A. Raynor. The plaintiff thereafter demanded of each of the defendants payment of the sum of $3,000, as provided in the written contract of June 30th, above quoted, and, payment being refused, she brings this action to recover that sum, with interest.

In her complaint, after setting out her agreement for the purchase of the land, and alleging the payment of $1,000 at the date of its delivery, she proceeds as follows: "That on the 30th day of June, A. D. 1887, plaintiff, at the special instance and request of defendants, assigned to them the contract aforesaid, and all her interest therein, the said defendants and each of them promising and agreeing that in case they or either of them should purchase or sell the property of the said Colton Land and Water Company, and make the payments to said company as in said contract specified, and within any extension of time granted in which the same might be made, that they or either of them would pay to plaintiff the sum of three thousand dollars. And at the time of the making of said agreement between plaintiff and defendants it was agreed that the written evidence thereof should be between plaintiff and defendant McBean, but that defendant A. Bills should be equally interested therein, and that such written agreement should be binding upon both of defendants alike. And in case of either of the defendants purchasing or selling the said property of the said Colton Land and Water Company they would pay to plaintiff the sum of three thousand dollars. And that pursuant to said understanding defendant Alexander McBean drew and signed the instrument in writing of which the following is a copy, [here follows a copy of the contract of June 30th, above quoted:] And that the consideration for which said assignment was so made to defendants was their agreement to pay said sum of three thousand dollars, as aforesaid." She then alleges a purchase of the property by defendants on July 12th; demand on them for payment of $3,000, as provided by the contract of June 30th, and their refusal to pay; and prays judgment for that sum and interest. To this complaint each of the defendants demurred, generally for the want of facts, and specially on the ground of misjoinder of defendants, in that it appeared that Bills was not a party to or interested in the contract set out in the complaint. Their demurrers being overruled, the defendants answered separately, McBean denying that he ever bought any of the lands described in the contract, and Bills denying any connection with the contract of June 30th, or that he ever bought any land under or by virtue of plaintiff's contract with the Colton Land & Water Company. But neither defendant denied that said contract had been assigned to them. Upon these pleadings the parties went to trial, but during the progress of the trial, and after most of the evidence was in, the defendants, by leave of the court, filed amended answers, in which they separately denied any assignment of the contract of the Colton Land & Water Company to Bills, amplified their original denials on other points, and set up two additional defenses: First. That plaintiff was at the commencement of the action the wife of one J. B. Ferguson, and that the action did not concern her separate property. Second. That plaintiff was never the real owner of the contract of June 7th, which she pretended to assign to McBean, but that said contract, with all its rights and privileges, belonged to P. A. Raynor; and that plaintiff, knowing that Raynor was such owner, in making said pretended assignment was willfully and knowingly attempting to defraud McBean out of the sum of $3,000. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the findings and judgment were for the plaintiff. Defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and they unite in an appeal from the judgment and said order.

The most important question involved in the appeal is as to the liability of Bills on the contract upon which the action is founded. This question is raised not only by the demurrers to the complaint, but by numerous exceptions taken at the trial to rulings of the superior judge admitting oral testimony to the effect that Bills, although not named therein, was nevertheless a party to said contract. According to plaintiff's testimony, she knew at the time of the assignment of her contract that Bills was to be equally interested with McBean in the rights assigned, and was to be equally bound to pay the $3,000. According to all the testimony, Bills was then present in San Bernardino, and in direct communication with the plaintiff. His interest, in other words, was fully disclosed at the time; and no reason existed—at least none is alleged—why he was not named as an assignee, and as a party to the agreement to pay for the assignment.

In short, it appears by the testimony more fully than by the complaint, though we think not more plainly, that the plaintiff deliberately chose to accept a contract in writing which did not name, nor by any of its terms bind, one of her intended assignees. Can she, under such circumstances, claim that he is bound? This is a question upon which there is a great conflict of authority in this country and England, and an adequate review of the cases in which it has been agitated would require a volume. We have neither time nor inclination to enter upon any such review, but content ourselves with saying that in our opinion the better reason and sounder policy are against the proposition. In England the rule seems to be pretty well settled, after much debate, the other way; but in the United States the weight of authority seems to be against the English rule. The cases in which the question has arisen are those in which an agent has contracted in his own name, and his principal has afterwards sued or been sued on the contract; and Judge Story, in his work on Agency, § 160a, says that the doctrine maintained in the more recent authorities is that, "if the agent possesses due authority to make a written contract not under seal, and he makes it in his own name, whether he describes himself to be an agent or not, or whether the principal be known or unknown, he, the agent, will be liable to be sued and be entitled to sue thereon, and his principal also will be liable to be sued and be entitled to sue thereon in all cases, unless from the attendant circumstances it is clearly manifested that an exclusive credit is given to the agent, and it is intended by both parties that no resort shall in any event be had by or against the principal upon it." But an examination of the authorities cited in support of this statement shows that they do not support it, as has been frequently pointed out. It is undoubtedly true that when the principal is undisclosed he may sue or be sued, but not when he is known, and especially not when he is present at the making of the contract. For a full and able discussion of the whole subject, see Chandler v. Coe, 54 N. H. 561, and Gillig v. Road Co., 2 Nev. 216, and cases therein cited. Considered independent of authority, we think sound policy requires the enforcement, in cases such as these, of the general rule that a writing cannot be varied by parol. It is as important to know who has made a contract as to know its terms, and when the parties put it in writing there is no more reason or excuse for omitting the name of a known party, whom it is the intention to bind, than there is for omitting its most important stipulation. To allow such a practice opens the door in every case to such conflicts of evidence as this case illustrates upon a point which can be easily and forever set at rest by simply making the written evidence of the contract conform to the mutual understanding of the parties as to matters fully within their knowledge. We think the superior court erred in overruling the demurrers and in admitting the testimony referred to. This error compels a reversal of the judgment and order appealed from; but, as a new trial will be necessary, it is proper that we should dispose of some other questions likely to arise in the further progress of the case.

Although the plaintiff cannot recover on this contract against Bills, we see no reason why she may not recover against McBean upon pleadings properly amended. All the evidence in the record indicates pretty clearly collusion between McBean and Bills and Raynor, by means of which the two last named obtained the benefit of plaintiff's assignment to McBean. In fact McBean turned the contract over to Bills and Raynor without a formal assignment of it, and they got the benefit of the assignment, and especially if McBean was a participant in their purchase, he became liable on his promise to pay the $3,000.

The court erred in sustaining an objection to the offer to prove what plaintiff told Crossman, on the ground that it was a privileged communication. Crossman, as to that matter at least, was not the attorney, if he was her attorney at all; and, moreover, the statement, if made, was not intended to be confidential, but was made with the purpose of having it communicated to others.

The court did not err in excluding evidence that the contract with the Colton Land & Water Company was the property of Raynor. Whether it was or not is a question between Raynor and the plaintiff, to be litigated by them or their representatives. McBean got a valid assignment, and cannot be excused from paying the price because some one else may have a right to claim it from his assignor.

There is barely sufficient, but certainly not very satisfactory, evidence to sustain the finding that the plaintiff was, at the beginning of the action, living separate and apart from her husband, by reason of his desertion of her. There is no positive or direct evidence that he went away without or against her consent. And the evidence is likewise rather unsatisfactory on the point of the contract being her separate property, but we cannot say that it does not support the finding.

Other points made in the briefs are comparatively unimportant, and need not be particularly referred to. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to sustain the demurrers to the complaint, with leave to the plaintiff to amend as she may be advised.

ALANIZ v. CASENAVE et al. (No. 14,156.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 5, 1891.)

CANCELLATION OF DEED—FRAUD—PLEADING—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

1. A complaint for the reconveyance of real estate, which alleges that defendant, while acting as plaintiff's agent, proposed that she convey all her real estate to him for the purpose of managing the same, promising to reconvey on demand, that she was induced by his representations and promises to make the conveyances, and that at the time of making the promises he had no intention of performing them, but made them with the fraudulent purpose of inducing her to put the property in his hands that he might cheat and defraud her, sufficiently sets out the facts which constitute the alleged fraud.

2. The conveyance, under such circumstances, was without consideration.

3. Where a general fiduciary relationship exists, and confidence was reposed in the grantee, it is not necessary to allege or prove that the conveyance was taken with a fraudulent intent, in order to establish a constructive trust.

4. Where one, by means of a parol promise to reconvey, obtains an absolute deed without consideration from one to whom he stands in a fiduciary relation, the violation of the promise is constructive fraud.

5. Where the evidence is conflicting, the supreme court will not disturb the findings of the trial court.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Action by Concepcion Alaniz against Pierre Casenave and Cayetana Casenave, his wife, for an accounting and reconveyance of real estate. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Brousseau & Hatch and W. F. Williams, for appellants. Smith, Howard & Smith and Smith, Winder & Smith, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This action is for an accounting and to compel the reconveyance of real estate. The complaint charges that defendant Pierre is the husband of the other defendant, who is the niece and adopted daughter of plaintiff; that after their marriage, in 1870, defendant Pierre took charge of plaintiff's business, and has ever since continued to manage and control the same, as her agent; that in 1874 plaintiff sold some property, and placed the proceeds, about $22,000, in the hands of said Pierre to manage for her; that with a portion of the money he purchased certain lots in Los Angeles, taking the deeds in her name, but retained the larger portion of the money; that on the 17th day of June, 1875, he proposed to her that for the purpose of managing her business she should convey all the lands to him, promising to manage and control the same for her, and reconvey on demand, and thereupon she conveyed all of the lands to him for the purposes mentioned; that she was living in the family of defendant at the time, had unlimited confidence in him, and was entirely under his control in business matters, being herself an illiterate and ignorant woman, entirely unacquainted with business, and was induced by his representations and promises to make the conveyances, and she is informed and believes that at the time of making the promises he had no intention of performing them, but made them with the fraudulent purpose of inducing her to put the property in his hands, that he might cheat and defraud her; that she had requested a reconveyance, which he refused to make; that he is indebted to her in a large sum, the amount of which she is unable to state, for portions of the money unexpended, and for rents received by him, and the proceeds of her property sold by him; that said defendant pretends that he never received from her, or for her use, any money whatever, and that he did not receive said lands in trust, but purchased the same from her; that on the 22d day of May, 1888, said defendant conveyed said lands to his wife, the other defendant, by a deed of gift; that the said Cayetana was privy to all the fraudulent designs of her husband, and took the deed for the sole purpose of defrauding the plaintiff, and preventing the assertion of her rights, and in trust for the use and benefit of her husband.

The answer admits the relationship of the parties set out in the complaint, but denies that defendant Pierre was ever the agent of plaintiff, or managed any business for her in any capacity. Denies receiving any money for her. Denies that the lands were conveyed to him in trust, and avers that he purchased them for a valuable consideration. They deny that plaintiff was ignorant, illiterate, or unacquainted with business, or was under the control of said defendant, or was induced by any representations or promises to make the conveyances, or that he took the lands in trust or with any fraudulent intent. They also deny the indebtedness. They also charge that plaintiff had full knowledge of the conveyance to defendant Cayetana at the time it was made, and approved of it. That the deed was not made with any fraudulent intent, but in good faith, for the purpose of vesting the title in said Cayetana. All the facts alleged in the complaint are found by the court, except that the defendant Pierre, at the time he made the promises which induced plaintiff to convey the property to him, had no intention of fulfilling them, but made them simply with the fraudulent purpose of inducing her to put the property in his hands. On the other hand, the court finds: "Said defendant, at the time he made such representations and promises, had the intention in good faith of fulfilling the same, but afterwards conceived the design of claiming the same as his own." There is also a finding to the effect that said defendant still has in his hands $23,700, money received for the use of plaintiff.

On this appeal the defendants make three points: First, the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; second, the judgment should have been for defendants on the findings; and, third, the evidence does not sustain the findings.

Under the first point the objection is that the facts which constitute the alleged fraud are not specifically set out, but we cannot agree with this proposition. A general fiduciary relation between the parties is averred; and that plaintiff reposed in the principal defendant unlimited confidence, and was entirely under his control, being herself ignorant and unacquainted with business; that he proposed the conveyances to enable him more conveniently to manage her business, and promised to hold and manage it for her, and to reconvey upon request. If the rule laid down in Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. Rep. 689, is to be upheld, these facts, with the others, constitute a cause of action. It is not expressly alleged in the complaint that the conveyances were without consideration, but such is the clear and necessary conclusion from the facts which are stated. The objections to the findings are necessarily of the same character, except that the court has failed to find the one fact of fraudulent intent existing at the time of the conveyance, but, on the contrary, finds that such fraudulent intent did not exist. But in the case of Brison v. Brison, supra, it was held that where a general fiduciary relation exists, and actual confidence is also reposed in the trustee, it is not necessary to allege or prove such fraudulent intent in order to establish a constructive trust, and the case of principal and agent is cited as an example of a fiduciary relation. In Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 21 Pac. Rep. 984, also written by Mr. Commissioner HAYNE, it is said, referring to the above case, that it was held: "If, by means of a parol promise to reconvey, a party obtains an absolute deed without consideration from one to whom he stands in a fiduciary relation, the violation of the promise is constructive fraud, although at the time of the promise there was no intention not to perform." The fiduciary relation, it is said, is one of the facts constituting the fraud, meaning that it was a necessary element in the case. See, also, Broder v. Conklin, 77 Cal. 330, 19 Pac. Rep. 513; Adams v. Lambard, 80 Cal. 426, 22 Pac. Rep. 180. This doctrine was again affirmed in the second appeal of Brison v. Brison, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 186.

The objection that the findings are not sustained by the evidence is based on several grounds. It is contended that the evidence does not show that the relation of principal and agent existed between the parties. The evidence on this point is not altogether satisfactory, owing chiefly to the confused and contradictory testimony of the plaintiff herself, but it cannot be said that there was no evidence to sustain the finding. Other parts of plaintiff's testimony tended strongly to prove the relation and absolute actual trust and confidence reposed in the male defendant, and she is corroborated by other witnesses. There is testimony, it is true, contradicting this testimony, but that was a matter for the trial court. The same is true of the question whether the parties did really intend to create a trust or not. It is also said that the evidence shows that the conveyances were made to defraud third parties, and the court should have so found. It seems that she feared that some heirs of her father might assert some kind of a claim against her which would compel her, as she says, "to come and go," and she did not wish to have the trouble. Thereupon the defendant, her son-in-law and agent, proposed that she convey to him, and he would take the trouble of the defense off her hands. She testifies that she did not fear any claim that her father's heirs might prefer, and that she so stated at the time. There is no evidence that the claims were asserted against her or her property, or could have been. The defendants deny the entire proposition. If such had been the nature of the conveyance, defendants certainly would have known it, and could have defended on that ground. Courts will not allow a trust to be proven by a party to the fraud, if the trust was created for a fraudulent purpose, but before it will deny relief upon that ground there should be proof that some one was to be defrauded. Here there is no proof of a claim which it was intended to defeat, or that any creditor or claimant of any kind existed. As to the amount of money received, we do not understand that it is objected to as too much if the trust were properly established. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. STAPLES. (No. 20,796.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 3, 1891.)

COMPLAINT—WARRANT OF ARREST—NECESSITY OF DEPOSITION — SUFFICIENCY OF INFORMATION—BRINGING STOLEN PROPERTY INTO STATE—VENUE—EVIDENCE—HEARING ON APPEAL.

1. Pen. Code Cal. §§ 811-813, provide that when an information is laid before a magistrate he must take the depositions of the informant and his witness, if any; that the depositions must set forth the facts tending to prove the offense, and the guilt of defendant; that, if the magistrate is satisfied therefrom that an offense has been committed, and there is reasonable ground to believe that the defendant has committed it, he must issue a warrant of arrest. Held, that when the information is positive in its allegations of every fact necessary to support the charges laid, it is a sufficient deposition within the meaning of the statute, and a warrant may be issued thereon.

2. Where one charged with committing a felony is examined, and evidence adduced sufficient to justify the magistrate in holding the accused to answer the charge, an irregularity in the warrant of arrest is immaterial, since thereafter the accused is held under the commitment, which authorizes the filing of an information.

3. Under Pen. Code Cal. § 872, concerning commitment for public offenses, which provides that, if it appears from the examination that a public offense has been committed, the accused must be held to answer to the same, the fact that the offense charged in the information is different from that laid in the complaint does not affect the sufficiency of the information.

4. Under Pen. Code Cal. § 789, which provides that the jurisdiction of a criminal action for stealing in any other state and bringing the property into this state is in any county into or through which such property has been brought, an information which charges the defendant with having stolen property in Arizona, and that he did bring the same into the county of Los Angeles, charges an offense within the jurisdiction of the court of Los Angeles county.

5. Where the larceny was committed at or near the line between Arizona and California, on a moving train, it was proper to admit evidence that it was committed immediately after crossing the line into California, as the variance was not material, as taking the stolen property into Los Angeles county was a part of the offense, and it was immaterial whether it was stolen before or immediately after coming into the state.

6. The fact that the information alleged that the larceny was committed in Arizona, does not require the state to prove that the offense charged is defined by the laws of Arizona as larceny.

7. Where the evidence as to the value of the property stolen is conflicting, the verdict of the jury upon that question is conclusive.

8. Pen. Code Cal. § 1252, which provides that "all appeals in criminal cases must be heard and determined by the appellate court within sixty days after the record is filed in said appellate court, unless continued on motion or with the consent of the defendant," is merely directory, and a failure to determine a case within the time mentioned does not entitle the defendant to a discharge.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM A. CHENEY, Judge.

Information against M. N. Staples, for grand larceny. Verdict of guilty. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hugh J. & Wm. Crawford, for appellant.
W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant was convicted in the superior court of Los Angeles county of the crime of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

His first assignment of error is upon the order of the superior court overruling his motion to set aside the information. One ground of the motion was that the magistrate before whom his examination was had issued his warrant of arrest without having taken any depositions of witnesses in support of the charge laid in the complaint, thus violating,—as he claims,—the provisions of sections 811-813 of the Penal Code.¹ In support of this point he cites and relies on the case of Ex parte Dimmig, 74 Cal. 164, 15 Pac. Rep. 619. But that case lends no support to his contention for two reasons. In the first place, the complaint in this case—unlike the complaint against Dimmig—is positive and direct in its allegation of every fact necessary to support the charge laid, and is therefore, in itself, a sufficient deposition within the doctrine of the Dimmig Case. In the second place, the want of jurisdiction to order an arrest becomes immaterial when the warrant of arrest is functus officio. In Dimmig's Case the objection was raised while the warrant was the only authority for holding him, and, the warrant being held invalid, he was necessarily discharged. But when a prisoner has been examined, and evidence adduced sufficient to justify the magistrate in holding him to answer on a charge of felony, the infirmity in the warrant of arrest, if any there be, ceases to be of any consequence, since he is thereafter held under the commitment, which of itself authorizes the filing of an information. The regularity of the information does not depend on the complaint, but upon the order holding the defendant to answer. People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 458; People v. Wheeler, 65 Cal. 77, 2 Pac. Rep. 892. This view also disposes of the second ground of the motion, viz., that the complaint alleged the larceny to have been committed in San Bernardino county, and the stolen goods to have been brought into Los Angeles county, whereas the information charges a larceny in Arizona territory, and a subsequent bringing of the stolen goods into Los Angeles county. Even if the offense charged in the information was, as claimed, totally different from that laid in the complaint, it would not affect the sufficiency of the information, since, as we have seen, the information does not depend on the complaint, but upon the commitment, and it does not appear that the order of commitment differed in any respect from the information. It is not claimed, and it cannot be, that the commitment must follow the complaint, for the statute and the decisions of this court, are directly to the contrary. It is the duty of the magistrate to hold the defendant to answer for the offense proved, whatever may have been the offense charged. Pen. Code, § 872;¹ People v. Wheeler, 73 Cal. 255, 14 Pac. Rep. 796. Therefore, if the evidence showed that the goods were stolen in Arizona territory, it was the duty of the magistrate to hold him for that offense, if it was in fact or law a different offense from that charged; and, if he failed to do so, it was, nevertheless, the duty of the district attorney, in drawing the information, to charge the offense according to the facts disclosed by the depositions, ignoring to that extent the form of the commitment. People v. Vierra, 67 Cal. 231, 7 Pac. Rep. 640; People v. Lee Ah Chuck, 66 Cal. 662, 6 Pac. Rep. 859. But in truth there is no substantial difference between the charge laid in the original complaint and that set out in the information. Each charges in effect a larceny in Los Angeles county. When goods are stolen in one jurisdiction and carried into another, in legal contemplation the crime of larceny is committed in both jurisdictions, and may be punished in either. Our statute on that point (Pen. Code, §§ 497, 786, 789,) merely re-enacts the law as it was before. People v. Mellon, 40 Cal. 654; State v. Brown, 8 Nev. 212. Or, perhaps, it is more correct to say that our statute has adopted one of the two views upon which the courts of other states have divided in deciding upon the common-law rule. It follows that in both the complaint and information the defendant was charged with an offense committed in Los Angeles county. The place where the goods were alleged to have been stolen—San Bernardino or Arizona—was a mere circumstance, and a wholly immaterial one, of the offense. The superior court did not err in refusing to set aside the information.

Nor did the superior court err in overruling the demurrer to the information. If we understand the position of appellant's counsel with reference to the demurrer, it is that the information does not charge an offense within the jurisdiction of the superior court of Los Angeles county, although no such objection is stated in the demurrer. The information charges in plain, direct, and unequivocal terms that the defendant did, in the territory of Arizona, unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously take, steal, and carry away from the possession of one Margaret McGregor a watch and chain, of the value of $75, then and there being the personal property of said Margaret McGregor; and that, after having so unlawfully taken and stolen said watch and chain, he did bring the same into the county of Los Angeles. This states the exact offense defined in section 497 of the Penal Code, the jurisdiction of which is, by section 789,² conferred upon any county of the state, into or through which the stolen property has been brought.

Several instructions asked by the defendant were refused by the court. The only question worthy of consideration raised by the assignments of error upon these rulings is this: Was it essential to prove that the original larceny was committed in Arizona, as alleged in the information? The defendant was porter on a sleeping-car, upon which the owner of the stolen property, Mrs. McGregor, was traveling as a passenger from Chicago to this state. The watch and chain were stolen from her berth just about the time the train crossed the Colorado river from Arizona to San Bernardino county in this state. The evidence left it somewhat doubtful upon which side of the boundary the theft occurred, and the defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that they must acquit unless they were satisfied that the larceny was committed in Arizona. These requests to charge were refused, and the question is whether such refusal was error. We do not think it was. Whether the original larceny was committed in Arizona or across the line in San Bernardino, the taking of the stolen property into Los Angeles county was equally criminal; and not only was it equally criminal, it was the same offense, punishable in the same manner, to the same extent, in the same jurisdiction, under the same law. The precise spot at which the criminal act was initiated was a mere circumstance of the offense, properly enough stated in the information, but not essential to be proven as stated. If the information had charged a larceny in Los Angeles county, proof of an original taking in San Bernardino or in Arizona would have been admissible. The only real question is whether evidence of a larceny on the west bank of a river is such a substantial variance from the charge that it was committed on the east bank as to be inadmissible. Under the circumstances of this case, where the theft occurred on a moving train in the act of crossing the river, we do not think the variance was material.

¹Sec. 872. If, however, it appears from the examination that a public offense has been committed, and there is sufficient cause to believe the defendant guilty thereof, the magistrate must make or indorse on the deposition an order, signed by him, to the following effect: "It appearing to me that the offense in the within depositions mentioned [or any offense, according to the facts, stating generally the nature thereof] has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within-named A. B. guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer to the same, and committed to the sheriff of the county of."

²Sec. 789. The jurisdiction of a criminal action for stealing in any state the property of another, or receiving it, knowing it to have been stolen, and bringing the same into this state, is in any county into or through which such stolen property has been brought.

As to the other instructions refused, it is sufficient to say of them generally that, so far as they were correct, they were given in better form in the charge of the court and in other instructions asked by the defendant and allowed.

It is contended that the evidence does not sustain the verdict, because—First, there was no evidence as to the laws of Arizona defining larceny; and, second, because the evidence clearly showed that the stolen goods were worth less than $50. As to the first objection, we say that the laws of Arizona have no bearing upon the question whether our laws have been violated. We do not assume to punish offenses against the laws of other states and territories. When we undertake to punish as larceny the bringing into this state goods that have been stolen in another state or country, we mean goods that have been stolen according to our definition of larceny, for which we look to our own laws exclusively, and not the laws of other countries. As to the second objection, it is sufficient to say that there was some evidence that the watch and chain were worth more than $50, and therefore the verdict of the jury on that point is conclusive.

There is no error in the record, and the judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed, unless a motion now made by the defendant to reverse the judgment and discharge him from custody must be granted on the ground that his appeal has not been decided within 60 days after the filing of the transcript here, as required by section 1252 of the Penal Code.¹ But no such consequence is annexed to a failure to comply with that provision, in which respect it differs from section 1382, which is mandatory in its requirement that a criminal prosecution must be dismissed, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, when the defendant is not brought to trial in the superior court within 60 days after the filing of an indictment or information. It is to be noted also that the latter section prescribes the means, and the only means, of enforcing the constitutional right of the accused to a speedy and public trial. Const. art. 1, § 13; People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. Rep. 892. We do not, however, rest our denial of this motion upon any distinction between a constitutional and statutory right,—between the right to a speedy trial and a speedy determination of an appeal,—but solely upon the ground that one provision is merely directory and the other mandatory in substance and in terms. Motion to reverse denied, and judgment and order affirmed.

PACIFIC ROLLING-MILL Co. et al. v. RIVERSIDE & A. RY. CO. (No. 14,333.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 2, 1891.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — CONCLUDED CONTRACT.

Defendant offered to buy plaintiffs' street railroad at an agreed price, "offer based on a clear title." Plaintiffs prepared an agreement to be signed, and forwarded it to defendant, the title to be examined "before signing the agreement." Defendant's attorney objected to the title, and defendant notified plaintiffs thereof, who thought the title good, and wished to know what defendant would "finally conclude to do." Defendant refused to purchase. Held, that there was no such concluded contract as could be specifically enforced.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge.

Action by Pacific Rolling-Mill Company and San Pedro Lumber Company against Riverside & Arlington Railway Company, to enforce specific performance of an alleged contract. Decree for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Goodell & McIntyre, for appellant. Byron Waters and Lyman Evans, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enforce specific performance of an alleged contract by which the plaintiffs agreed to sell, and the defendant to buy, a certain street railway, situate in the city of Riverside, county of San Bernardino, and known as "Seventh Street & Grandview Railroad." Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. At the time the agreement is alleged to have been made the plaintiffs did not have the legal title to the road they offered to sell, but held a certificate of purchase at a sheriff's sale, made under a decree enforcing a lien for the price of materials furnished to construct the road. The only evidence of the agreement is a written correspondence between the parties by mail, the letters from plaintiffs being dated at San Francisco, and those from defendant at Riverside. The appellant contends, among other things, that the correspondence does not prove a completed contract of sale. The first letter of the correspondence is from defendant, dated October 22, 1888, as follows: "Will you sell your Seventh-Street road for $5,000 on six months' time, with interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum? Note of undeniable value." In answer to this plaintiffs wrote November 15, 1888: "The rolling-mill company would sell the Seventh-Street road for $6,500, on the following terms, namely: $1,500 in cash and the balance in six months at eight per cent. interest, secured by good paper, or mortgage on the other road." From defendant to plaintiffs, November 23, 1888: "We will pay you for the road and equipments as it stands, title, etc., to be subject to examination of our attorney, $5,750, one-half in six months, and one-half in one year, to bear interest at eight percent. per annum; said notes to be secured by a mortgage upon all of our lines as well as upon the Seventh-Street line." Plaintiffs to defendant, November 27, 188—: "The price you offer is not enough. The time, terms, and security proposed will not be objected to if you will come to the price asked in former letter to you, to-wit, $6,500. * * * There is another party figuring on the purchase of this railroad, and we hold ourselves at liberty, notwithstanding this offer to you, to sell to the first one who comes to our price. I note that your offer was for the road and equipments. We don't own the rolling stock or motive power." Telegram from defendant to plaintiffs, November 30, 188—: "We will agree to your price, and accept offer of 27th. Have written." Letter, of same date as telegram, is as follows: "We will agree to your price and accept your offer of the 27th. If you will send us the papers, we will have our attorney examine your title, and prepare the notes and mortgage. Our offer is based on a clear title." Plaintiffs to defendant, December 4, 188—: "Dear Sir: Your telegram of 30th ult. was received, and your letter of same date was received this A. M. We note that your 'offer' is based on a clear title. Our title comes through a sheriff's sale under execution and order or decree of court in the case of V. S. Runnels & Sons et al. vs. J. A. Studabecker et als., superior court of San Bernardino county. We have the sheriff's certificate dated October 16, 1888. And six months after that date we or our assigns will be entitled to a deed, unless the property is in the mean time redeemed. If you are not satisfied to take our title as it now stands, and close the matter, you must give us some assurance that you will take our complete title when we get it. I supposed that some of your people knew that we took title through the sheriff's sale in October last, and hence I concluded that you would only be assured of the regularity and effectiveness of the proceedings up to that time. Let me hear from you." Defendant to plaintiffs, December 8, 188—: "Dear Sir: Yours of the 4th is at hand and contents noted, and in reply would say that we will be satisfied with a sheriff's deed. We are willing to close the matter up at the present time on the terms stated. If you will prepare a contract, we will submit it to our attorney. The contract to state the facts, and when the six months from the date of your purchase have expired the notes and mortgages can be made. Notes dating from date of our contract and purchase. We understand the above to be your wish, and we are willing to make such a paper." Plaintiffs to defendant, December 13, 188—: "Dear Sir: Inclosed find an agreement for your company to execute in regard to the purchase of the Seventh-Street Railway. Inasmuch as your company may change its board of directors before the six months expire, and inasmuch as the emergency may arise which would induce you to mortgage or sell your road before the six months expire, and this agreement gives us no lien on any property, we request that you have Mr. Evans and J. G. North and some other one of your stockholders sign the guaranty attached to the agreement. You will note that the agreement says nothing about title. So you must make your investigations about title, if you wish, before signing the agreement. You can take a week to examine the title if you wish. I suppose I have your correct corporate name. Upon signing the paper as requested, and returning the same, the rolling-mill and lumber company will execute, and send you a duplicate." Defendant to plaintiffs, December 22, 188—: "Dear Sir: Yours of the 13th came duly, and the same was referred to our attorney. To-day we got his reply as inclosed. Can you give us any points that would set the matter at rest, and which could be submitted? We thought it was all right, and still hope you can make it clear to us." The opinion of defendant's attorney, inclosed in this letter of December 22d, was to the effect that the sheriff's deed would not convey the franchise, for the reason that the franchise had been granted to an individual person solely, and not to his assigns. Plaintiffs to defendant, December 27th: "Dear Sir: Yours of the 22d at hand. I have been trying to find time to send your attorney a list of authorities and memoranda, etc., but am still busy. I think, though, that I can remove your attorney's doubts. First. Our supreme court has decided that a right of way to maintain and operate a street railroad through the streets of a city is an easement and an interest in the land, (North Beach & M. R. Co.'s Appeal, 32 Cal. 506-512,) and therefore subject to execution. Second. The 7th-St. Railway was sold, not only under execution, but under the decree and order of the court. (See the decree.) The sale would have been good under the decree without execution. Third. The decree was made in a foreclosure suit of a mechanic's lien in which the city of Riverside and Studabecker were parties, and therefore bound by the judgment which decreed a sale of the franchise or right of way. We deny that the ground of the rejection of the title is good. But let us know what you finally conclude to do without delay, so that we know where we stand. You must be on or entirely off." On January 14, 1889, the defendant wrote: "We decline to purchase the 7th-Street franchise."

It seems clear that the correspondence does not prove such a concluded contract as may be specifically enforced by a court of equity. It does not appear that either party intended to be bound until a written contract expressing all the terms of the agreement should be executed. Wristen v. Bowles, 82 Cal. 84, 22 Pac. Rep. 1136; Pom. Spec. Perf. §§ 58, 63, and authorities there cited. It is contended, however, for respondents, that all the terms of the contract were assented to and the contract completed, by defendant's letter of December 8th, in answer to that from plaintiffs of December 4th, in which plaintiffs say: "We note that your offer is based on a clear title. * * * If you are not satisfied to take our title as it now stands, and close the matter, you must give us some assurance that you will take our complete title when we get it." In answer to this defendant's letter of December 8th says: "We are willing to close the matter up at present on the terms stated. If you will prepare a contract, we will submit it to our attorney. The contract to state the facts," etc. Plaintiffs' letter (of December 13th) in reply to this shows that they did not understand that negotiations had terminated in a complete contract, and indicates that they knew defendant's ultimate decision depended upon whether or not it should be satisfied with the title derived through the sheriff's sale. This letter contained a draft of the agreement as then proposed by plaintiffs, (which does not appear in the record,) and says: "You will note that the agreement says nothing about title. So you must make your investigations about title, if you wish, before signing the agreement. You can take a week to examine the title, if you wish." Besides, this letter proposed, and the inclosed draft contained, a material new term to the agreement, viz., the personal guaranty of "Mr. Evans and J. G. North and some other one of your stockholders." No such guaranty had been asked or offered before. Plaintiffs' letter of December 4th asked "some assurance" that defendant would take their complete title when they should get it, but no kind of assurance was specified; and the only kind of assurance mentioned was that of a mortgage on defendant's roads. As contended by plaintiffs' counsel it seems to have been understood that plaintiffs would undertake to convey only such title as they got by the sheriff's sale; but it was quite as well understood that if, upon examination, the defendant was not satisfied with that title, it was not bound to purchase; otherwise, plaintiffs' letters of December 13th and 27th are unaccountable. In the latter plaintiffs undertook to answer the objections of defendant's attorney to their title, and close by saying: "We deny that the ground of the rejection of the title is good. But let us know what you finally conclude to do without delay, so that we know where we stand. You must be on or entirely off." This seems inconsistent with the alleged understanding of plaintiffs at the date of this letter, that the agreement had been completed by defendant's letter of December 8th. If the agreement to purchase only such title as plaintiffs had derived through the sheriff's sale had been closed 19 days before, why were plaintiffs concerned to vindicate that title? and why ask to be informed without delay what defendant finally concluded to do? and how could defendant be "entirely off?"

From a careful reading of the whole correspondence, I conclude (1) that plaintiffs proposed to sell only such title as they acquired through the sheriff's sale; (2) that it was not intended nor understood that the negotiations should be considered closed, and the contract completed, until, upon examination, the defendant should become satisfied with that title, nor until a formal written contract should be executed by both parties; and (3) as it appears that defendant was not satisfied with the title, and that no formal or final written contract was executed by the parties, the fourth finding of the court to the effect that the agreement had been concluded, considered as matter of fact, is not justified by the evidence; and, as matter of law, it is a misconstruction of the written correspondence. In the process by which these conclusions have been reached the question discussed by counsel, as to whether or not the sheriff's deed would convey a perfect title, has not been considered material; and this accords with the construction contended for by respondents' counsel. Yet it may not be out of place to remark that it does not appear that the title was not rejected by defendant in good faith. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BURKETT v. GRIFFITH. (No. 14,254.)

SLANDER OF TITLE — WHEN ACTION LIES — CONTRACT OF SALE — ENFORCEMENT — COMPLAINT — SPECIAL DAMAGES.

1. An averment that a certain person offered to buy plaintiff's land, and that the offer was accepted, but that, after the purchaser was informed of the false statements of another regarding the title, he was "deterred from carrying out his agreement," indicates that there was a valid contract enforceable against the purchaser; and no action, therefore, is maintainable for the slander.

2. A complaint for slander of title referred to certain leases, annexed as exhibits for the purpose of identifying the lands, in which plaintiff had a "leasehold interest, with option and privilege of purchase;" but failed to allege the nature and covenants of the leases, or the terms of the option, or the nature of plaintiff's rights thereunder, or whether such covenants and option were those contained in the exhibits. Held that, inasmuch as the alleged defamatory statements referred to the covenants of the leases, and plaintiff's rights thereunder, it was necessary to allege facts sufficient to show what such rights and covenants were; and exhibits attached to the complaint, merely to identify the land, were not sufficient for this purpose.

3. A complaint for slander of title alleging that a certain purchaser was informed of the false statements of a third person, and withdrew his offer, without alleging that such person made the statements to the purchaser, or directed them to be communicated to him, or that any one to whom they were communicated repeated them, or by whom he "was informed" of them, fails to show that the alleged damage was the natural and direct result of such statements.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by Frank Burkett against G. J. Griffith to recover for slander of title.

There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John Roberts and John D. Bicknell, for appellant. Stephen M. White and George W. Knox, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action against the defendant to recover the sum of $25,000 damages caused by certain false and malicious statements alleged to have been made by him concerning certain property of the plaintiff. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the grounds of insufficiency and uncertainty, and from a judgment entered upon an order sustaining the demurrer the plaintiff has appealed.

Although the term "slander" is more appropriate to the defamation of the character of an individual, yet the term "slander of title" has by use become a recognized phrase of the law; and an action therefor is permitted against one who falsely and maliciously disparages the title of another to property, whether real or personal, and thereby causes him some special pecuniary loss or damage. In order to maintain the action, it is necessary to establish that the words spoken were false, and were maliciously spoken by the defendant, and also that the plaintiff has sustained some special pecuniary damage as the direct and natural result of their having been so spoken. As words spoken of property are not in themselves actionable, it is necessary to allege the facts which show wherein the plaintiff has sustained damage; and, as special damage is the only ground upon which the action can be maintained, it is essential that such damage be distinctly and particularly set out in the complaint. Linden v. Graham, 1 Duer, 670; Swan v. Tappan, 5 Cush. 104; Malachy v. Soper, 3 Bing. N. C. 371. It is not actionable to speak disparagingly of the title of another unless he is damaged thereby. The utterance of a mere falsehood, however malicious, will not sustain an action unless damage has resulted therefrom, (Add. Torts, 25;) and the damage which can be recovered is only such as is the direct and natural result of the utterance of the words. As in all other cases dependent upon special damage, there must be both injury and damage. The slanderous words, false in fact and maliciously uttered, constitute the injury, and give the right of action; and the pecuniary damage sustained is the measure of recovery. If the words uttered are not false, or if there be no malice, there is no right of action, and there can be no recovery unless some special pecuniary damage has resulted from their utterance. In order to show that the words uttered have caused injury to the plaintiff, it is generally necessary to aver and show that they were uttered pending some treaty or public auction for the sale of the property, and that thereby some intending purchaser was prevented from bidding or competing. Folk. Starkie, Sland. § 123; Odger, Sland. & Lib. 138. "This action lieth not but by reason of the prejudice in the sale." Per FENNER, J., in Bold v. Bacon, Cro. Eliz. 346. If the plaintiff has merely a general intention to sell, or if the words uttered do not reach any intending purchaser, or if they do not prevent any sale, or are uttered after the sale is completed or agreed upon and contracted for, the plaintiff does not suffer any damage from their utterance.

It is alleged in the complaint that in August, 1888, the plaintiff was the owner of a certain leasehold interest, with option and privilege of purchasing two certain tracts of land in Los Angeles county, and that one Arthur Sketchley was then negotiating and treating with him for the purchase of, and offered to purchase from him, "an undivided one-half of the same for the sum of $25,000," and that the plaintiff accepted said offer; that the defendant, well knowing the premises, did willfully, maliciously, and without probable cause, during the period that the said Sketchley was so negotiating and making the offer aforesaid, and prior and subsequent thereto, publicly state to divers persons, (naming them,) and to the plaintiff, "that the plaintiff had broken the covenants of his said leases, and had forfeited all rights thereunder and by virtue thereof," and that the defendant would not sell to the plaintiff, or to any person purchasing from him, the lands described in said leases, or execute a deed therefor on the tender of said purchase price; that the said statement and declarations were false, and were made by the defendant for the purpose of preventing the plaintiff from disposing of said leasehold interests and option, and that said Sketchley was informed of the said statements, and was intimidated, dissuaded, and deterred from carrying out his agreement with plaintiff, and withdrew his offer to purchase, and refused to purchase the same; that, but for said statements by defendant, Sketchley would have completed said purchase; and that by reason of the said statements plaintiff has been unable to sell said property to Sketchley, and has been thereby damaged in the sum of $25,000. The averment in the complaint that Sketchley offered to make the purchase from the plaintiff, and to pay therefor the sum of $25,000, and that "the plaintiff accepted said offer," must, for the purposes of the demurrer, under the familiar rule that the pleading is to be construed contra proferentem, be regarded as an allegation of a valid and efficient offer and acceptance, and that by virtue thereof a complete and executed contract of purchase and sale was entered into between them. This construction is corroborated by the subsequent averment that, after Sketchley was informed of the statements of the defendant, he was "intimidated, dissuaded, and deterred from carrying out his agreement with plaintiff," and shows that it was the intention of the pleader to allege such contract. This acceptance by the plaintiff of Sketchley's offer, and the agreement between them for the purchase and sale of the property, terminated the "treaty," and gave to the plaintiff a contract capable of being enforced against Sketchley, and on which he can recover any damages he may have sustained from its violation. The subsequent refusal by Sketchley to carry out his agreement did not give the plaintiff the right to recover in this action the damages thus sustained. In an action like the present, the plaintiff can recover only such damage as he may have sustained by reason of an intending purchaser being prevented from making the contract; but the complaint herein shows that whatever statements or declarations were made by the defendant prior to the making of the contract did not have the effect to prevent Sketchley from entering into the same, and those which he made thereafter have not caused the plaintiff any damage which can be said to have resulted therefrom. We know of no case in which it has been held that, when the plaintiff has a valid contract of sale, he can recover damages for its breach against one whose words, however false and malicious, have induced the other contracting party to violate such agreement. In Morris v. Langdale, 2 Bos. & P. 284, in an action for defamation, the special damage alleged was that certain persons had refused to fulfill their contracts with the plaintiff in consequence of the words spoken; but Lord Eldon said: "Now, if the plaintiff has sustained any damage in consequence of the refusal of any persons to perform their lawful contracts with him, it is damage which may be compensated in actions brought by the plaintiff against those persons; and the law supposes that in such actions the plaintiff would receive a full indemnity." A similar principle is laid down in Townsh. Sland. & Lib. § 206; Kendall v. Stone, 5 N. Y. 14; Vicars v. Wilcocks, 8 East. 1; Paull v. Hafferty, 63 Pa. St. 46; Brentman v. Note, 3 N. Y. Supp. 420. It is not shown by the complaint whether the plaintiff accepted the refusal of Sketchley to complete his purchase as a termination of the contract, or whether he still holds his right of action to enforce the contract. From the averment that "the said Sketchley was then and there, and at all times since has been, able and willing to purchase" the property contracted for, it would seem that Sketchley is still bound by the contract; and, if so, the complaint fails to show that the plaintiff has sustained any damage. In any action against Sketchley founded upon the contract, it would be no defense that he had been induced to refuse to complete his purchase by reason of the statements of the defendant alleged herein; and as, in such action, the plaintiff can recover all the damages he has sustained, he has no right of action herein against this defendant. If, on the other hand, the plaintiff has released Sketchley from the obligations of his contract, or does not desire to enforce the same, whatever damage he has suffered is the result of his own voluntary act, and cannot be visited upon this defendant. Kendall v. Stone, supra.

2. The complaint fails to show that the statements and declarations alleged to have been made by the defendant could have caused any damage to the plaintiff. It was necessary for the plaintiff to set forth and describe in his complaint the property respecting which the defamatory statements had been made, as well as to aver his title thereto, so that it might be shown wherein the defendant had done him any injury. The defamatory statements alleged to have been made by the defendant are "that this plaintiff had broken the covenants of his said leases, and that plaintiff had forfeited all rights thereunder and by virtue thereof." The only leases referred to in the complaint are those which are annexed to it as exhibits for the purpose of identifying the lands in which the plaintiff had a "leasehold interest, with option and privilege of purchasing." The plaintiff has not alleged the nature or extent of his leasehold interest, or the terms of his option, or what were the covenants of his leases, or the nature of his rights thereunder; nor has he alleged that the covenants or the option are those which are contained in the exhibits. As the statements alleged to have been made by the defendant referred to the "covenants of his said leases, and his rights thereunder," it was necessary to aver facts sufficient to show whether he had any rights, or whether there were any covenants to be violated or broken. The exhibits attached to the complaint are made a part thereof only for the purpose of identifying the lands referred to, and do not satisfy this requirement of pleading. Argumentative pleading is no more permissible under the Code than it was at common law. Matters of substance must be alleged in direct terms, and not by way of recital or reference, much less by exhibits merely attached to the pleading. Whatever is an essential element to a cause of action must be presented by a distinct averment, and cannot be left to an inference to be drawn from the construction of a document attached to the complaint. Los Angeles v. Signoret, 50 Cal. 298. The only property to which the plaintiff alleges that he had any title is the leasehold interest and option to purchase. He does not allege that the defendant denied his title to this property, but charges him only with disparaging certain rights which the complaint does not allege that he possessed. The allegation that the defendant had stated that he would not sell the lands described in the leases cannot be regarded as any slander of his title, even if the complaint had shown any right to make a purchase from the defendant. The plaintiff, moreover, does not allege that Sketchley was informed of this declaration of the defendant.

3. The complaint also fails to show that the special damage alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff is the natural and direct result of the statements and declarations made by the defendant. This action is governed by the same rule that obtains in the ordinary action of slander, viz., that, if the words are not actionable in themselves, the originator of the slander is only liable for such damage as is the direct and natural result of his act, and that he is not liable for the subsequent repetition of those words by another without his direction or authority. Folk. Storkie, Sland. § 642; Add. Torts, 795; Parkins v. Scott, 1 Hurl. & C. 153; Ward v. Weeks, 7 Bing. 211; Terwilliger v. Wands, 17 N. Y. 54; Gough v. Goldsmith, 44 Wis. 262; Hastings v. Stetson, 126 Mass. 329. This is but the application of the general rule that, when special damages are to be recovered, they must be the legal and natural consequence arising from the tort itself, and not from the wrongful act of a third party, remotely induced thereby. Crain v. Petrie, 6 Hill, 524. The only special damage which the plaintiff has alleged is that Sketchley was informed of the statements and declarations made by the defendant, and withdrew his offer to purchase, and that the plaintiff thereby sustained damage. It is not alleged that the defendant ever made any statement or declaration to Sketchley, or in his presence, or that he directed or authorized any of his statements to be communicated to him; nor is it alleged that either of the persons to whom the defendant made such statements repeated them to Sketchley, or by whom or in what manner Sketchley "was informed" of the statements. The only connection between the statements by the defendant and their reaching Sketchley is that the defendant made them for the purpose of circulating the rumor and conveying the impression that the plaintiff had violated the covenants and conditions of his leases. This, however, is too remote to render the defendant liable. We are of the opinion that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and that the demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

BOUNDARIES—OBLITERATION OF MONUMENTS—SUBSEQUENT SURVEYS—CONFLICT—EVIDENCE.

In an action for recovery of land, involving a dispute as to boundaries, it appeared that the township was partly surveyed in 1856, and the south-west corner of the section in controversy located and marked; that in 1871 the survey was completed on this corner; and that there was delineated on the plat, and mentioned in the field-notes, a certain road running north and south through the east half of the section. Afterwards the stakes and monuments of the original surveys became so far obliterated as to require restoration. Plaintiff's and defendant's surveys, starting from different points, were widely variant. Plaintiff contended that the only proper way to restore sectional corners was to go back to the nearest corner of the original survey east of the section in dispute; but neither party did this, and there was evidence that no such corners could be found. Plaintiff's survey started from the road mentioned in the survey of 1871. This survey, however, was entirely discredited by defendant's witnesses. Measuring from the south-west corner, which was undisputed, one mile east for the south-east corner, it was found to be nearly half a mile south-east of the point where plaintiff's survey located it. Held, that the jury were not bound to accept the measurements from the road as conclusive, and that a verdict for defendant was not unsupported by the evidence.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action by Henry Miller against Bernardino Cuelho for the recovery of land.

There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. E. Wilson and W. H. Spencer, for appellant. J. M. Wilcoxon, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The plaintiff in this action prosecutes separate appeals, No. 13,591 from the judgment, and No. 13,633 from an order overruling his motion for a new trial. No error is assigned upon the first appeal, but in support of his appeal from the order denying a new trial plaintiff contends that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. The action is for the recovery of land, and the plaintiff is undoubtedly the owner of the legal subdivisions described in his complaint; the only question in the case being whether a certain spring in the possession of the defendant is situated within the limits of such subdivisions as originally surveyed by the government. The defendant claims that the spring is upon an adjoining subdivision, the government title to which is in him. It will be readily understood from this statement that the dispute arises out of the fact that the stakes and other monuments by which the section and quarter section corners of the official survey were originally marked have become so far obliterated as to require restoration by means of new surveys. As frequently happens in such cases, the different surveyors who have undertaken this task have arrived at widely variant results,—the surveyor for plaintiff locating his lines so as to include the spring, and those employed by defendant bringing it within his lines. We are asked to decide, as matter of law, that the verdict for defendant is wholly unsupported by the evidence, because his surveyor did not use a proper method in his attempt to restore the lost corners of the section in which the lands of both parties are included. It seems that the exterior lines of the township were surveyed by a deputy surveyor, named Freeman, in 1856, who at the same time surveyed some of its interior or section lines. It is conceded on all sides that Freeman was very careful and accurate in his work, both in measuring his lines and marking his corners. But the deputy who completed the survey of the section lines of this township in 1871 is said—by some of the witnesses, at least—to have been careless and inaccurate, and it does not appear that any of the stakes or monuments by which he marked his corners are now discoverable, although many of Freeman's stakes and other marks are still standing and easily found. The particular section (section 8) in which the premises in controversy are included was partly surveyed by Freeman; that is, he located and marked the south-west corner of the section, and set a quarter-post on its south line. Afterwards, when Read completed the survey of the township, he closed his survey of section 8 on these corners, and laid it down on the township plat as a regular section, one mile square, and containing 640 acres. The plat made and returned by him, and approved by the surveyor general, does not indicate the position of the spring, and his field-notes contain no reference to it; but there is delineated on the plat, and mentioned in the field-notes, a certain road extending north and south through the east half of the section, and thence north-east through the south-east quarter of section 5. In the field-notes the distance from the north-east and south-east corners of section 8, at which this road is intersected by the north and south lines of section 8 and the east line of section 5, is given. The surveyor for plaintiff, failing to discover Read's corners, has taken this road as the basis of his survey and the means of restoring the lost boundaries of section 8. He admits that the road is not now where it was in 1871, but its old situs is so satisfactorily proven by him and a number of other witnesses, that, if it is to control in the re-establishment of the section lines, the claim of plaintiff to the spring seems to be well founded. But the misfortune of plaintiff's case is that, if the defendant's witnesses are to be believed, Read's survey is completely discredited, and no more reliance can be had upon his notes as to the location of the road than upon other statements therein, which must be erroneous if those respecting the road are correct. As above stated, his survey of section 8 closes on Freeman's corners, and shows a regular square of 640 acres; but, measuring from Freeman's monument at the south-west corner (the location of which is undisputed) one mile to the east for the south-east corner, it is found to be nearly half a mile south-east of the point where plaintiff's survey locates it, measuring from the road. Such being the case, it cannot be said that the jury were bound to accept the measurements from the road as conclusive, for who can say whether Read's mistakes were made in those measurements or in his measurements to Freeman's corners? That he made an error, and a very serious error, in one or the other set of measurements is clearly proved if the witnesses for the defendant tell the truth; and for the purposes of this decision we must assume that the jury believed them, and were right in believing them. The appellant, ignoring the weakness of his own case, directs the whole force of his argument against the defendant's survey, which he claims is wholly unreliable, because it started from the wrong corner of the section. He contends that the only way to restore the lost sectional corners of a township survey is to retrace the lines as they were originally run, from south to north and from east to west, going back for this purpose to the nearest ascertainable corner of the original survey east of the section in dispute. But, conceding the correctness of this rule, the plaintiff, upon whom rested the burden of proof, himself disregarded it. He complains that defendant did not start from some of Read's corners east of section 8, but neither did he. Besides this, his evidence seems to show that no such corners could be found. If, therefore, plaintiff's survey was sufficient to make out a prima facie case for him, the defendant's survey was certainly competent for the purpose of rebuttal. We cannot see that the superior court erred in holding that the verdict of the jury was not in conflict with the evidence. Judgment and order affirmed.

TIBBETTS et al. v. CAMPBELL, Judge. (No. 13,993.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 5, 1891.)

MANDAMUS TO JUDGE—REMEDY BY APPEAL.

Mandamus will not lie to compel the sustaining of a motion for judgment made by petitioner in an action in the trial court, and to permit him to prove certain allegations of his complaint; appeal being the proper remedy, if such rulings be erroneous.

In bank.

Application by Tibbetts and others for mandamus to compel John L. Campbell, judge of the superior court, to receive certain evidence in a pending suit. Writ denied.

Luther C. Tibbetts, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. The affidavit in this case does not state facts sufficient to entitle the petitioners to a writ of mandate directing the respondent to do any of the things which it is alleged that he has refused to do. The overruling of petitioners' motion for a judgment in their favor in the case of Tibbetts et al. v. The Riverside Banking Company et al., and the refusal to allow the plaintiffs therein to prove certain matters alleged in their complaint, were decisions of questions of law arising during the trial. If there was any error in such rulings, the petitioners were afforded a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by an appeal from the final judgment rendered in the action. Application for writ denied.

ONTARIO STATE BANK v. GERRY et ux.
(No. 13,993.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 7, 1891.)

HOMESTEAD—LIABILITY FOR DEBTS—UNRECORDED MORTGAGE.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 1241, subd. 4, providing that the homestead is subject to sale in satisfaction of judgments obtained on debts secured by mortgage on the premises executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record, an unrecorded contract for the purchase of real estate, given to the husband, and assigned by him as security for a debt, cannot be enforced by the assignee against the wife's recorded claim of homestead in the land, although it was afterwards paid for by the husband, and the title taken in her name.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by the Ontario State Bank against John Gerry and Eliza Gerry, his wife, upon a promissory note executed by defendant John Gerry, and to establish a lien on the homestead of defendants. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed in part and affirmed in part.

I. E. Tubbs and H. C. Rolfe, for appellants. Waters & Gird, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. On November 29, 1887, the defendant John Gerry made a promissory note to plaintiff for $1,500 and interest, payable in three months. Gerry was at that time the holder of a written contract from one Osborn, who was then the owner of the lot of land and premises described in the complaint, by which Gerry was entitled to a conveyance of said lot upon his payment of certain money; and when Gerry gave said note to plaintiff he assigned said contract to plaintiff as security for the payment of said note. Afterwards Gerry paid to Osborn all the money due on said contract; and, at Gerry's request, Osborn executed a deed of conveyance of said lot to the defendant Eliza Gerry, who was and is the wife of said defendant John Gerry, which deed was recorded July 3, 1888. The defendants were residing on said lot, and on July 10, 1888, the defendant Eliza duly executed and had recorded a declaration of homestead on said premises. At that time she had no knowledge (if that be material) of the said assignment of said contract to plaintiff. Said assignment was never recorded; nor was there any record of any claim of lien of any character in favor of plaintiff against said premises. This present action was commenced March 7, 1889, to recover a judgment against John Gerry for the amount due on said note, and also to enforce a lien for the same on said premises against both defendants. The defendants answered, setting up their homestead right. The court below gave judgment against John Gerry for the amount of the note, and also decreed the sale of the premises and the foreclosure of all the right and title of both defendants in and to the same; and defendants appeal from the judgment.

The part of the judgment which decrees the sale of the premises is erroneous. The court seems to have acted upon the theory that, as the wife was not a subsequent purchaser for a valuable consideration, therefore, as against her, the prior unrecorded mortgage was valid. But the doctrine that unrecorded deeds and mortgages are good except as against subsequent purchasers for a valuable consideration, does not apply to homesteads. Rights to homesteads are defined by the provisions of the Code which directly deal with that subject. "The doctrine bearing upon conveyances made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors has no application to the creation of a homestead;" and a declaration of a homestead is not a "conveyance," as that word is used generally in the Code. Section 1241 of the Civil Code enumerates the cases where a homestead may be taken for a debt, and it can be so taken in no other instance. The only subdivision of that section upon which respondent could rest with any plausibility is the fourth, which is as follows: "On debts secured by mortgages on the premises executed and recorded before the declaration was filed for record." It makes no difference that the mortgage (if it was a mortgage on the land) in the case at bar was executed by the husband before the legal title vested in the wife; the mortgage was not recorded "before the declaration of homestead was filed," and therefore cannot be enforced against the wife's claim of homestead; and the wife has a right in the homestead which she can protect, not only against the husband's creditors, but against the husband himself. The respondent could have protected his mortgage by simply recording it. There is no question here about the morality of the transaction. It is simply a matter of statutory provision. The judgment, so far as it adjudges the sale of the premises described in the complaint and the foreclosure of appellants' interest therein, is reversed. In all other respects it is affirmed.

MINES D'OR DE QUARTZ MOUNTAIN SOCIETE ANONYME et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF FRESNO COUNTY. (No. 14,420.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 8, 1891.)

WRIT OF PROHIBITION—WHEN ISSUED.

Where a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter ordered service of summons by publication, defendant was not entitled to a writ of prohibition to stay proceedings until he should enter a general appearance or be personally served with summons, appeal from the judgment being the proper remedy.

In bank.

Application by the Mines d'Or de Quartz Mountain Societe Anonyme for writ of prohibition to the superior court of Fresno county. Application denied.

Daniel Titus, for petitioners.

DE HAVEN, J. The petitioners are non-residents of the state of California, and an action against them is pending in the superior court of Fresno county, in which that court made an order directing that the summons therein be served upon petitioners by publication. Thereafter the petitioners appeared specially in the action, and moved to vacate and set aside that order upon the alleged ground that the action is in personam, and therefore not one in which summons by publication is authorized. The motion was denied. After this petitioners again entered a special appearance in said action, and moved for an order staying all proceedings therein, until the summons should be personally served upon petitioners, or until such time as they should enter their general appearance. This motion was also denied, and the petitioners now ask that a writ of prohibition issue out of this court commanding said superior court to refrain from further proceeding in said action until petitioners shall enter their general appearance therein, or are personally served with the summons in the action.

We do not deem it either necessary or proper to determine at this time whether the action now pending against petitioners in the superior court is one in which the summons can be legally served by publication. That court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and whether it has jurisdiction over the persons of petitioners is a question which it must determine for itself before entering judgment in the action, and which it has the same authority to pass upon as any other question of law or fact which may arise during its progress, and, if in the decision error shall be committed to the prejudice of petitioners, the law affords them a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by an appeal from any judgment which may be entered against them. *Agassiz v. PRESTON v. FREY et al. (No. 14,279.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 9, 1891.)

SLANDER—EVIDENCE—MITIGATION OF DAMAGES—MALICE—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. In an action for slander, evidence that the defamatory statements made by defendant were common reports in the place where plaintiff formerly lived is inadmissible in mitigation of damages.

2. Where, in an action for slander, a witness testifies to the defamatory words, which were spoken in his presence, and which clearly imputed want of chastity to a female, it is harmless error to allow him to state what he understood to be the import of the words, since they were actionable per se, within the provisions of Civil Code Cal. § 46.

3. In an action for slander, defendant, upon cross-examination, was asked, "Haden't you told some things about her [plaintiff] prior to that time?" referring to the date on which the defamatory words were spoken; and, "Had you made the statements prior to that time?" Held, that the answers were properly admitted for the purpose of showing malice.

4. In an action for slander, it appeared that the defamatory words were spoken voluntarily, in a spiteful and malicious manner, to one W., who repeatedly told defendant that he did not want to hear them. The parties had met for the purpose of compromising their troubles, upon plaintiff's request, at W.'s house. W. was not retained by either party as counsel or attorney. Held, that the statements did not constitute privileged communications.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Action to recover damages for slander by Laura F. Preston, an unmarried woman, against Sarah F. Frey and Edward S. Frey, her husband. Trial to the court. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Waters & Gird, for appellants. L. Gill and Trippett & Neale, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover damages for slander. The plaintiff is an unmarried woman, and the defendants are husband and wife. The complaint alleges "that on the 7th day of October, 1889, in San Diego county, Cal., the defendant Sarah F. Frey maliciously spoke and published, in the presence and hearing of J. F. Walker, of and concerning the plaintiff, the false, unprivileged, scandalous, and slanderous words following, to-wit," then setting them out; "and that said defendant thereby intended and did impute to plaintiff a want of chastity, and the defendant was so understood thereby by those who heard her, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of twenty thousand dollars." The defendants answered, specifically denying the said allegations of the complaint, and for a separate defense pleaded, in substance, that prior to said 7th day of October certain controversies and differences, set forth in the answer, existed between plaintiff and the defendant Sarah F. Frey; that the said Walker was an attorney at law and justice of the peace at Perris, in the county of San Diego; that at the request of plaintiff, and pursuant to agreement between plaintiff and defendants and said Walker, plaintiff and defendants met at the office of Walker for the purpose of making an amicable and peaceable settlement of said matters of difference and controversy, Walker then and there being the mutual adviser and counselor of both plaintiff and defendants; and that all the statements made by defendants concerning plaintiff were made, in the course of an attempted settlement, to Walker, as their mutual counselor and adviser, without malice, in reply to allegations and demands of plaintiff, and to the end that an amicable settlement might be had, and for no other purpose; and that all of said statements were privileged. They further allege that all of said slanderous statements were made as matters of common report only. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the findings were that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and all the allegations of the answer were untrue; that the defendant Sarah F. Frey, at the time and place named, maliciously spoke and published, in the presence and hearing of J. F. Walker, of and concerning the plaintiff, the false, unprivileged, scandalous, and slanderous words set forth, and that the plaintiff had been damaged thereby in the sum of $1,000; and that the parties prior to said speaking and publication had not agreed to submit the matters of grievance between them to said J. F. Walker. Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,000 and costs, from which and from an order denying a new trial the defendants appeal.

It is argued for appellants that the judgment should be reversed because of several errors committed by the court in the reception and rejection of evidence, and because the findings were not justified by the evidence. It appears that the parties formerly lived in the state of Kansas, and had been living in the town of Perris, in San Diego county, for some three years. The plaintiff had heard that Mrs. Frey was speaking disrespectfully of her, and circulating slanders, and she wished her to retract the slanders, and to sign a paper to that effect. At plaintiff's request, the parties met at Walker's office to talk the matter over, and, if possible, settle their troubles. Mrs. Frey refused to sign any paper, and proceeded to make the statements complained of in regard to the plaintiff's past life. These statements were that the plaintiff had been in a house of prostitution; had been afflicted with a venereal disease; had given birth to an illegitimate child; and that she was in love with a young man named, and had exposed her person, laid down on a bed, and wanted him to go to her. Walker testified that when she commenced he said: "Mrs. Frey, I don't want to hear this story at all; compromise this matter, and stop it." I asked her not to tell it, but she went on without any answer being made." And again: "As Mrs. Frey was repeating her story, I repeatedly told her I didn't want to hear it, and that it was not what I was there for. No one there requested her to state what she did say. It was entirely voluntary on her part. It was said in a spiteful, malicious manner. She may have said, and I think she did say, that those things were reported, but she several times turned to Miss Preston, and said: 'Fanny, you know it is so,' and 'that she could prove these allegations by any quantity of witnesses.'" Mrs. Frey testified: "I don't know whether the reports were true. I know that there were such reports out against her. No one at that meeting asked me to repeat these things. I did so voluntarily. At the time I made these statements to Mr. Walker and Miss Preston, in Mr. Walker's office, I believed the reports to be true. I did not state that the reports were true, but said that I had heard them."

One of the errors assigned was the refusal of the court to allow defendants to prove that the statements made by Mrs. Frey were common reports in the state of Kansas. The evidence was objected to as irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and we think the ruling proper. The law on this subject is stated as follows in Newell on Defamation, Slander, and Libel, (page 893, § 70:) "Evidence of previous publication by others is inadmissible in mitigation of damages. The fact that others besides the defendant have defamed the plaintiff is a wholly irrelevant matter. And so is the fact that on such former occasions the plaintiff did not sue the publisher, or take any steps to contradict the charges made against him. And when the falsehood thus unchallenged grows to a persistent rumor or general report, which the defendant hears, believes, and repeats, it is not regarded in law as a mitigating circumstance. Evidence of any such rumor is altogether inadmissible." And see the same author, p. 350, §§ 3, 4; also, 13 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 441; and Wilson v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 384.

It is claimed that other errors were committed in the reception of, and in the refusal afterwards to strike out, portions of the testimony of Walker. He was permitted to state all that was said and done in his presence, and that he understood from the language used that Mrs. Frey intended to impute to the plaintiff a want of chastity. It is argued that some of the statements made by the witness were in relation to matters not within the issues made by the pleadings, and were therefore irrelevant and immaterial for any purpose, and that the understanding of the witness as to the import of the words was of no consequence, and proof of it therefore wholly inadmissible. We see no material error in the rulings. All of the statements testified to were made on the same occasion, and were parts of one transaction. It was proper, therefore, for the plaintiff to prove all that was said by Mrs. Frey, and how it was said. And if it was error to allow the witness to state what he understood to be the import of the words spoken, it was error without harm. The words imputed a want of chastity beyond question, and were actionable per se. Civil Code, § 46.

A similar objection is made to some of the testimony given by Mrs. Frey on cross-examination. She was asked: "Hadh't you told some things about her [plaintiff] prior to that time?" (October 7, 1889;) and, "Had you made the statements prior to that time?" The answers to the questions were properly admitted for the purpose of showing malice. "It is always competent in an action for defamation to prove a repetition of slanderous charges for the purpose of showing malice, and it is wholly unnecessary to plead the repetition of the words." Newell, Defam. p. 349, § 1.

The claim that the findings were not justified by the evidence is rested upon the assumption that the slanders were spoken under circumstances which made them privileged communications. A privileged communication is one made "without malice, to a person interested therein, by one who is also interested, or by one who stands in such a relation to the person interested as to afford a reasonable ground for supposing the motive for the communication innocent, or who is requested by the person interested to give the information." Civil Code, § 47, subd. 3. Here the words were spoken "in a spiteful, malicious manner," to one who was not interested therein, and who repeatedly told the speaker that he did not want to hear them. They were spoken voluntarily, as shown by the testimony of Walker and admitted by Mrs. Frey, no one at the meeting having asked her to repeat them. Walker says he "had been retained by neither one of them in any way, shape, or form, as a counsel or lawyer." Under these circumstances, the statements complained of were, in our opinion, rightly held by the court below to be malicious slanders, and not privileged communications. See Newell, Defam. p. 515, §§ 114, 115. It follows that the judgment and order should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PERRI v. BEAUMONT. (No. 13,737.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 3, 1891.)

SWAMP LANDS—CONTEST—INSUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT — DETERMINATION OF ENTIRE CONTROVERSY.

The complaint, in a contest concerning the purchase of swamp land, alleged that defendant, in 1873, filed an application of purchase, and received a certificate, but that the land had not then been surveyed as swamp land; that in 1888 plaintiff filed a like application, and also a protest against the issuance of any further evidence of title to defendant; and that plaintiff was at that time, and is now, an actual settler having valuable improvements on the land, and possessing all the personal qualifications entitling him to purchase it. There was no allegation that the land had been surveyed when plaintiff's application was filed. Held, that it was the duty of the court to determine the entire controversy, under Pol. Code Cal. §§ 3414, 3415, which provide that, in certain contests, the surveyor general must refer the matter to the district court, and that, after such reference, either party may bring an action to determine the conflict; and that plaintiff was entitled to a judgment as to the validity of defendant's application, even though the complaint failed to show the survey necessary to validate his own. Urton v. Wilson, 65 Cal. 11, 2 Pac. Rep. 411, overruled.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Kern county.

Action by Perri against Beaumont to determine a contest regarding the purchase of swamp and overflowed land. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. B. Lamar and E. Rousseau, for appellant. Hagan & Van Ness, (Geo. C. Gorham, Jr., of counsel,) for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This action is based upon an order of reference made by the surveyor general of the state referring to the superior court of Kern county a contest concerning the right to purchase certain swamp and overflowed land. It is averred in the complaint, in general terms, that the defendant, Beaumont, filed with the surveyor general, in 1873, his application to purchase the land in controversy, and that in 1874 a certificate of purchase was issued to him thereon, and that at the time of filing said application the land had not been surveyed or segregated as swamp and overflowed land. The complaint further alleges that plaintiff, in the year 1888, filed in the office of the surveyor general of the state his application to purchase said land, and at the same time filed a protest against the issuance of any further evidence of title based upon defendant's application and certificate of purchase. The complaint also alleges that at the date of his application the plaintiff was and still is an actual settler on the land applied for, and has valuable improvements therein, and that he possesses all the personal qualifications to entitle him to purchase the said land. It is not averred, however, that the land was surveyed at the date of plaintiff's application. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the general ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiff failing to amend, the court rendered judgment that he take nothing by the action, and that defendant recover from plaintiff his costs. The plaintiff appeals from this judgment.

It is clear that, upon the facts stated in the complaint, the plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment directing the approval of his application to purchase, as it is not alleged that the land applied for was surveyed at the date it was made; but, although the plaintiff may not have been entitled to all the relief demanded, still if, upon the facts alleged, he was entitled to any relief against the defendant, the demurrer was improperly sustained, and the judgment in favor of defendant for his costs is erroneous. The complaint does allege facts showing the defendant's application and the certificate of purchase issued thereon to be invalid, and consequently that he has no right by virtue thereof to acquire a patent from the state. The question is thus presented whether, in view of these facts, the judgment rendered by the court against plaintiff, and in favor of defendant for his costs, was proper. It is urged by respondent that, inasmuch as the complaint does not show that the land in controversy was subject to sale at the date of plaintiff's application, he is not entitled to a judgment as to the validity of defendant's application upon the facts alleged, and is therefore in no position to complain of the judgment appealed from; and this contention of respondent seems to have been upheld by this court in the case of Urton v. Wilson, 65 Cal. 11, 2 Pac. Rep. 411, and perhaps, also, in Millidge v. Hyde, 67 Cal. 5, 6 Pac. Rep. 852, and it may be that there are dicta in other cases which also support this view. The decisions, however, have not been uniform, and, upon full consideration, we are of the opinion that the rule announced in Urton v. Wilson, supra, should not be followed. The jurisdiction of the superior court in this class of cases is special, and is conferred by sections 3414 and 3415 of the Political Code,¹ and when invoked it is the duty of the court to proceed and determine the entire controversy referred to it for decision. Garfield v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 175, 15 Pac. Rep. 620. In this latter case the court also said: "But though the plaintiff had no right to purchase the land, and even if he had not sought to purchase it, he could still contest the right of the defendants to purchase it." This is in accordance with the law as declared in the earlier and well-considered case of Cunningham v. Crowley, 51 Cal. 128, in construing section 17 of the "Act to provide for the management ¹Sec. 3414. When a contest arises concerning the approval of a survey or location before the surveyor general or concerning a certificate of purchase or other evidence of title before the register, the officer before whom the contest is made may, when the question involved is as to the survey, or one purely of fact, or whether the land applied for is a part of the swamp or overflowed lands of the state, or whether it is included within a confirmed grant, the lines of which have been run by authority of law, proceed to hear and determine the same; but when, in the judgment of the officer, a question of law is involved, or when either party demands a trial in the courts of the state, he must make an order referring the contest to the district court of the county in which the land is situated, and must enter such order in a record-book in his office.

Sec. 3415. After such order is made, either party may bring an action in the superior court of the county in which the land in question is situated, to determine the conflict; and the production of a certified copy of the entry, made by either the surveyor general or the register, gives the court full and complete jurisdiction to hear and determine the action.

and sale of lands belonging to the state," (St. 1867-68, p. 511,) a section which does not materially differ from the above-cited sections of the Political Code. In that case, in speaking of the object and scope of the action to determine conflicts arising in the office of the surveyor general, the court said: "The purpose of the action is not to annul the certificate of location or purchase, or other evidence of title; but, if both of the parties are applicants for the purchase of the lands, the purpose is to procure a determination of the question as to which applicant has the better right to purchase them; or, if the contest has its origin in a protest, filed by a person who is not seeking to purchase the lands from the state, the purpose of the action is to determine whether the party against whom the protest is filed has the right to purchase the lands; and the annulment of the certificate of purchase, or other evidence of title, is merely a consequence of the determination that the party holding it was not entitled, as against the other party, to effect a purchase of the lands. In other words, the statute provides a mode by which, and the parties in whose name, an action may be instituted to determine which party has the better right to purchase the lands, where there are contesting applicants, or to determine, in case of a mere protest, whether the party against whom the protest is filed is entitled to make the purchase." The court in this case, as well as in that of Garfield v. Wilson, supra, was speaking of a contest properly originating in the office of the surveyor general, and referred to the court for decision. It is unnecessary at this time to determine whether sections 3414 and 3415 authorize a mere volunteer, who does not seek to purchase the land himself, and who does not possess the personal qualifications entitling him to do so, or one who is without any interest in the land, to be affected by a sale by the state, to originate a contest by filing a protest against the issuance of title to a prior applicant. This is not such a case. Upon the facts stated in the complaint, the plaintiff was a person authorized by law to initiate this contest, and it was the duty of the court to decide as to all the matters involved therein, and referred to it for decision; and one question so referred was as to the right of the respondent to receive from the state a patent for the land involved in this action. It cannot be said that the plaintiff is not aggrieved by the failure of the court to decide this part of the controversy, and adjudge defendant's application void. The plaintiff is an actual settler upon the land, and has valuable improvements thereon. In addition to this, he is possessed of all the personal qualifications which would entitle him to purchase, if the land were surveyed, and it is alleged that he desires to purchase it. It is clear, therefore, that he has an interest in preventing defendant from acquiring the legal title from the state. But the judgment in this case leaves the defendant free to proceed upon his present application, and acquire such title, and it cannot be assumed that he may not be able to do so. A patent, although based upon an invalid application, is conclusive as against all persons other than those who have prior to its issuance initiated a valid right to purchase from the state; and, upon the facts alleged, the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment which would make it impossible for the defendant to clothe himself with such a title by virtue of his present application. The judgment must be reversed, and, we think, it would be proper for the court to still permit the plaintiff to amend his complaint by adding thereto an averment that the land in controversy was surveyed at the date of his application, if he so desires.

MILLER v. HIGHLAND DITCH Co. et al.
(No. 14,170.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 9, 1891.)

TAXATION OF COSTS—BURDEN OF PROOF—NECESSARY DISBURSEMENTS.

1. Where the prevailing party inserts a charge in his memorandum of costs which does not appear upon its face to be a necessary and proper disbursement, the burden of proof is upon the claimant.

2. A charge of $500 for a map in a bill of costs is not a necessary disbursement, appearing as such on its face, which, unless controverted, will control the court on taxation.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge.

Action by George Miller against Highland Ditch Company et al. Defendants appeal from an order refusing to retax plaintiff's costs. Order reversed. For former report, see 25 Pac. Rep. 550.

Waters & Gird and George E. Otis, for appellants. Willis, Cole & Craig and Harris & Gregg, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal from an order of the court below refusing to retax the plaintiff's costs. It appears from the bill of exceptions that a duly-verified memorandum of costs, a copy of which is set out, was filed by the plaintiff in proper time. One of the items in the memorandum is as follows: "Paid J. B. Pope for map introduced in evidence, adopted by judge in his findings, and made part thereof, $500." Other items are for the attendance of witnesses a stated number of days. The defendants served, and filed in due time, notice of motion to retax the costs, and their objection to the item above quoted was: (1) That the same is not a proper charge, nor authorized by law to be included in plaintiff's bill of costs. (2) That said charge is excessive, and far beyond the value of said map; that said map is of not any greater value than $5, and could not have cost the plaintiff herein a greater sum." The objections to the other items were that the charges were for a greater number of days than the witnesses were actually in attendance. "Thereafter the defendants' said motion came on regularly for hearing before the court, both parties appearing by counsel, and plaintiff introduced no evidence whatever, whereupon the court refused to strike out any part of any of the said items of costs, and denied defendants' said motion; to which ruling the defendants did then and there duly except." The respondent contends that, in a case like this, the burden is upon the party moving to strike out, and that, as no evidence was offered at the hearing of the motion as to the circumstances under which the map was made and introduced in evidence, or as to its value, it must be presumed that the court below did not abuse its discretion in allowing the charge therefor to stand as made; and in support of this position Barnhart v. Kron, 26 Pac. Rep. 210, is cited. In that case a cost-bill was filed, and all the items in it were for the attendance of witnesses, and the fees of the sheriff, clerk, and reporter. A motion was made to retax the costs, by striking out each and every item thereof, upon the ground that none of the items were incurred by the respondent in establishing his defense to the action, but that each of them was incurred by his co-defendant. The motion was denied by the trial court and on appeal it was held that the allowance or disallowance of items for the expenses and disbursements incurred upon the trial of an action must be left, in nearly every instance, to the discretion of the judge before whom the cause was tried; that there was nothing in the record showing that the court did not properly exercise its discretion in refusing to strike out the items objected to; and that the memorandum of costs was properly verified, "and unless controverted, should control the decision of the court." This is undoubtedly the correct rule where the charges appear on their face to be for proper and necessary disbursements in the action. The rule, however, ought not to be extended, and, in our opinion, it should not be applied where the charges do not appear on their face to be proper and necessary. In such cases the burden should be on the claimant, and not on the moving party, and, if he fails to introduce evidence to justify and sustain his charges, they should be stricken out on motion. For example, if the prevailing party should put in his cost-bill charges for the services of an expert accountant, or of a surveyor in the field, such charges would not appear on their face to be necessary disbursements, (Faulkner v. Hendy, 79 Cal. 265, 21 Pac. Rep. 754; Haynes v. Mosher, 15 How. Pr. 216; Mark v. City of Buffalo, 87 N. Y. 189;) and he ought not to be permitted to rest on his oars and say, because the court may have appointed the expert or directed the survey, that his verified memorandum, unless controverted by proofs on the other side, must control the decision. In this case we think the charge for the map comes within the exception above stated. Presumably the map was made for the plaintiff and at his request, and the burden was therefore upon him to show that the disbursement was a necessary and proper one in the action. We advise that the order be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to sustain the motion of defendants to strike out from the cost-bill the item of $500 above mentioned.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to sustain the motion of defendants to strike out from the cost-bill the item of $500 above mentioned.

PEOPLE v. PARKER. (No. 20,806.)

BURGLARY—INFORMATION—COMPLAINT AND COMMITMENT—SURPLUSAGE.

1. A magistrate who committed a person on the charge of burglary returned to the superior court only the sworn complaint, upon which was indorsed the order of commitment. The complaint alleged that the accused "entered a barn with intent to commit larceny, said barn being located on the Simmons ranch," etc. The commitment was as follows: "It appearing to me that the offense in the within deposition mentioned has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe" "the accused guilty thereof," etc. Held, that Penal Code Cal. § 809, providing that when a defendant has been thus committed the district attorney shall file an information "charging the defendant with such offense," did not authorize an information charging that the accused feloniously entered a barn, "the property of one G. W. Ditman," since the information must be based entirely on the commitment or the facts stated in the depositions. Following People v. Lee Ah Chuck, 66 Cal. 663, 6 Pac. Rep. 859, and People v. Vierra, 67 Cal. 231, 7 Pac. Rep. 640.

2. In the absence of any other description of the barn, the allegation of ownership was necessary.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge. Prosecution for burglary against Flem Parker. Defendant before plea moved to set aside the information, which being denied, he appeals. Reversed.

J. S. Clack and Charles G. Lamberson, for appellant. Maurice E. Power, Atty. Gen. Hart, and Wm. H. Layson, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. An information was filed charging the defendant with the crime of burglary. Before pleading he moved to set aside the information upon the ground "that he had not been legally committed by a magistrate." Upon the hearing of the motion it was shown that G. W. Ditman filed a sworn complaint before a magistrate, alleging "that one Flem Parker, on or about the 20th of November, 1890, and before the filing of this complaint, at the county of Tulare, state of California, did willfully and unlawfully enter a barn with intent to commit larceny, said barn being located on the Simmons ranch, in said Kaweah township," etc. There were no other depositions in the case, and upon the complaint was indorsed the following commitment: "It appearing to me that the offense in the within deposition mentioned has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within-named Flem Parker guilty thereof," etc. The information charges that "the said Flem Parker, on or about the 20th day of November, 1890, and before the filing of this information, at the county and state aforesaid, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously enter a certain barn, the property of one G. W. Ditman, with intent then and there and therein to commit the crime of larceny."

The motion to set aside the information should have been granted, for the foregoing record discloses that the defendant was never committed by a magistrate for the offense charged in the information. Under the law, as declared in People v. Lee Ah Chuck, 66 Cal. 663, 6 Pac. Rep. 859, and People v. Vierra, 67 Cal. 231, 7 Pac. Rep. 640, the district attorney is allowed to file an information based either upon the offense set out in the commitment or upon the facts disclosed by the depositions, and that is the limit of his authority.¹ This information is based neither upon the commitment nor the facts set out in the complaint or deposition. It alleges that the defendant entered a certain barn, the property of one G. W. Ditman, with the intent, etc. The record is entirely silent as to any such state of facts, and the district attorney in framing his information is bound by the record.

It is insisted that the allegation of ownership of the barn in G. W. Ditman is immaterial, and therefore harmless. While in charging the offense of burglary it may not be necessary in all cases to allege ownership of the property entered, yet, in this case, it was a necessary allegation, for it constituted the entire and only description of the barn which the defendant is charged with feloniously entering. Let the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions that the information be set aside.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; DW. HAVEN, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; HARRISON, J.

¹Pen. Code Cal. § 809: "When a defendant has been examined and committed, as provided in section 872 of this Code, it shall be the duty of the district attorney, within 30 days thereafter, to file in the superior court of the county in which the offense is triable an information charging the defendant with the offense," etc.

PATERSON, J. If the question were an open one, I should say that an information could not be sustained unless it charged the offense charged in the complaint, and for which he was examined and committed by the magistrate. Such it appears to me is the view of the supreme court of the United States in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 292. Our own cases, however, hold that the district attorney may prosecute for any offense shown by the depositions taken on the preliminary examination. I therefore concur.

SAN BERNARDINO NAT. BANK v. COLTON LAND & WATER Co. et al. (No. 14,330.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 10, 1891.)

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — ACCOMMODATION PAPER — INDORSEMENT BY CORPORATION — NOTICE TO HOLDER — FINDINGS.

1. In an action on a note signed by a corporation, and by its president and one other director individually, the corporation alone answered, alleging that it was merely an accommodation maker, that the execution of such a note was in excess of its corporate authority, and that the payee, and the bank to which it was transferred after maturity, had knowledge of the fact at the time of the execution and transfer. The president testified that he told the payee he wanted the money for his individual use, and that he would give the corporation as security. The payee testified "that he knew nothing about who was the principal debtor, or for whose use the money was obtained." The evidence showed also that the note was made under a resolution of the directors of the corporation to "borrow" the money; that the resolution, which was written by the president, was delivered by him to the payee at the time he received the money; and that the signature of the corporation appeared first upon the note. Held that, as the evidence was conflicting, and there was nothing on the face of the transaction to indicate that it was not in the ordinary course of business, a judgment against the corporation would not be disturbed.

2. A finding that the note was executed for a valuable consideration was admitted by the answer, and was not inconsistent with a finding that the defendant corporation received no part of the consideration.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by San Bernardino National Bank, a corporation, against the Colton Land & Water Company, a corporation, and others, to recover on a promissory note. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Goodcell & Leonard, for appellants. Frank F. Oster, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. This action is brought to recover on a promissory note for $2,500, executed by the defendants to the Farmers' Exchange Bank, a corporation, and by it indorsed to plaintiff after maturity. The note, which is joint and several, is dated July 28, 1887, and is signed by the defendants in the following order: "Colton Land and Water Company, by A. B. Hotchkiss, Pres't. A. B. Hotchkiss. J. C. Peacock." The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The Colton Land & Water Company alone answered, alleging that it was merely an accommodation maker; that such execution of the note was in excess of its corporate authority; and that the plaintiff and its assignor had knowledge of the fact at the time of the execution and transfer of the note. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and the defendants the Colton Land & Water Company and A. B. Hotchkiss appealed from the judgment. Subsequently an appeal was taken by the defendant corporation from the order refusing a new trial, but it is stipulated that both appeals be heard as one upon the same transcript. It appears that the note sued on was made by the defendant corporation in pursuance of the following resolution adopted at a meeting of the board of directors of the Colton Land & Water Company, held at Colton on the 27th day of July, 1887, at which five of the directors, including the defendants Hotchkiss and Peacock, were present: "Resolved by the board of directors that this company borrow $2,500, and execute its note therefor, at regular market rate of interest, to such person as might have the money to lend it." The following stipulation was entered into between the parties hereto: "That the articles of incorporation of the Colton Land & Water Company included no power of the corporation to make accommodation paper, or to sign paper as an accommodation maker or indorser, but the corporation had the power, under its corporate powers, to sign negotiable paper for the purpose of paying corporate indebtedness, or for in any way carrying out the purposes of the incorporation, as set forth in the answer, including the borrowing of money for its own purposes." Plaintiff offered no evidence, but rested its case on the pleadings. The defendant Hotchkiss was sworn as a witness for the defense, and testified substantially as follows: That he stated to Mr. Drew, the president of the Farmers' Exchange Bank, that he wanted the money for his individual use, and that he would give the Colton Land & Water Company as security; that he got the money on the note sued on, and used it for his own purposes, and that the Colton Land & Water Company was simply security thereon, as was Mr. Peacock; that the body of the resolution, in pursuance of which the note was given and the money borrowed, was in his handwriting; and that he delivered it with the note to Mr. Drew, when he received the money from the bank, at which time he was the president, and acting as such, of the Colton Land & Water Company. Mr. Drew was then called as a witness for the defense, and testified substantially "that he knew nothing about who was the principal debtor, or for whose use the money was obtained on the note." On cross-examination, he stated "that he understood the money was for Hotchkiss, but whether it was something the company was owing him, or whether it was borrowing for him, he was not clear." The statement by Hotchkiss that the defendant corporation signed the note merely as accommodation maker or surety, and that it was so understood and accepted by the Farmers' Exchange Bank, is contradicted by Drew, and is inconsistent with the act of the board of directors of the defendant corporation, by which it resolved to "borrow" the money, and with the fact that the resolution, which was written by Mr. Hotchkiss, who is an attorney as well as president of the corporation, was delivered by him with the note to the bank at the time he received the money, and with the further fact that the signature of the defendant corporation, by its president, Hotchkiss, should appear first on the note,—a rather unusual place, it must be conceded, for the signature of an accommodation maker or surety. It would appear, therefore, that, aside from the testimony of the defendant Hotchkiss, there is nothing that is even remotely suggestive of the slightest suspicion that the transaction, on its face, was not in the ordinary course of the business of the defendant corporation, and one that was clearly within the scope of its corporate authority. The court, in its decision, found that neither the plaintiff nor its assignor, the Farmers' Exchange Bank, had any knowledge whatever, either actual or constructive, that the defendant corporation executed the note in question as an accommodation maker or surety, and not as principal. As the evidence on this point is substantially conflicting, the finding thereon will not be disturbed on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify it. It is insisted by appellant that the fourth and ninth findings are contradictory. In this view we cannot concur. The fourth finding, that the note was executed for a valuable consideration, is admitted by the answer, and is in no respect inconsistent with the ninth finding, that the defendant corporation received no part of the consideration. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PAINTER et al. v. PASADENA LAND & WATER Co. et al. (No. 14,064.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 5, 1891.)

WATER-RIGHTS — RESERVATION IN DEED — VALIDITY.

1. A land and water company conveyed a tract of land through which ran a ditch, reserving the ditch and a strip of land 10 feet wide on each side of it; also the right to enter on the lands for the purpose of making repairs, and to tunnel or in any manner develop the waters on the lands. The reservation provided that the grantees were not to use any of the water in the ditch, nor use any water on the land, except for the purpose of irrigation and for domestic use. Held, that the reservation included about an acre of water-bearing land which was in the tract, and the undeveloped water therein, less the quantity required to irrigate the tract and for domestic use.

2. Where a deed described the land conveyed by courses and distances, and conveyed no specific number of acres, it was competent for the grantor to except a swamp or marsh from the operation of the deed.

3. Where it appeared from the deed that part of the land was water-bearing land and part so dry that it required irrigation, the subject-matter supported the reservation of the water land, and the exception was not void for uncertainty because the boundaries of the excepted land must be shown by evidence.

4. The rights reserved were appurtenant to the ditch and water-rights, and passed by grant from the company to defendant, though the reservation contained no power of assignment or words of inheritance, since Civil Code Cal. §§ 1072, 1092, 1105, provide that no such words are requisite, and that a fee is presumed to pass unless the grant expresses a different intention.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by Painter and others against the Pasadena Land & Water Company to enjoin it from entering upon certain lands and taking water therefrom. Decree for plaintiffs, and order denying a new trial. Order affirmed. Decree modified.

Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, for appellants. Lee, Gardiner & Scott, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. On April 23, 1887, the Lake Vineyard Land & Water Association conveyed the land described in the complaint to plaintiffs' grantors. The deed contained the following provisions: "Provided, that the said A. Elliott and G. A. Richardson do not construct or allow to be constructed on the above-described land any work that will in any manner injuriously affect the waters or water-rights of this association. And it is distinctly understood that the said association reserves the right at all times to enter upon said lands for the purpose of making any repairs or for the development of the waters of this association. And a strip ten feet wide on each side of the water-ditch of said association is hereby expressly reserved from the above sale, and under no consideration is the above description, or anything in this resolution contained, to be construed as conveying any part or portion of the aforesaid water-ditch or waters, or of the land for ten feet on each side thereof. And the aforesaid Elliott and Richardson shall not, and in purchasing this land they agree not to, use any water for other than domestic purposes and for irrigating said land; neither are they to sell, give away, or allow to be wasted any water whatsoever. And under no consideration are they to use any water from the ditch of said association. And the said association reserves the right to tunnel, or in any other manner to develop the waters of said association on this land. And it is also clearly understood that the association reserves the right of way through the above-described lands for a wagon road,—either the present road or one as good." Plaintiffs have acquired all the rights of Elliott and Richardson, and the defendants have succeeded to all the rights reserved to the Land & Water Association which could be transferred by it to a third party. The statement on motion for a new trial shows: "That there was on this tract of land a marshy, swampy piece of water-bearing land of from a three-fourth acre to an acre and one-quarter dimension; that the water came to the surface and became running water in this piece of land 'only where it is trenched;' that when Richardson and Elliott first bought and took possession of the land there was no water running 'to amount to anything,' only 'sieping a little over the bank;' that an inch and two-thirds of water measured under a four-inch pressure has been developed by Elliott and Richardson and plaintiffs on this piece of marshy or swampy land, and has been and was at the beginning of this suit all used by plaintiffs for domestic purposes and irrigation of the tract of land conveyed by said deed to Elliott and Richardson. An impeached witness on behalf of defendants testified that in his opinion twenty inches of water measured under a four-inch pressure, over and above the water now being used, could be developed on said piece of marshy or swampy land." The defendants claim that the right to enter upon the land, dig trenches, and develop the water resting in the swampy portion referred to was reserved to the association in its deed to Elliott and Richardson, and that they succeeded to the same right through the deed from the association to them. They were proceeding to enforce such claim when this action was brought to restrain them from so doing. Plaintiffs contend that no such rights were reserved to the association, and, if they were, they were personal to the association, and could not be transferred to defendants or any other person. The court below sustained plaintiffs' contention, and gave judgment in their favor. Defendants have appealed from the judgment, and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

Were the rights claimed by defendants reserved to the association? It is evident that the parties had under consideration certain waters other than those in the ditch, and intended to define what their respective rights to the same should be under the deed. It was stipulated that "under no consideration" were the grantees "to use any water from the ditch of said association," but of the other waters they were to have sufficient for "domestic purposes and for irrigating said land." Where were the waters other than those in the ditch from which the grantees might draw sufficient for domestic uses and irrigation? Manifestly they lay quiescent in the "marshy, swampy piece of water-bearing land" in which "the water came to the surface, and became running water only where it was trenched." There was about one acre of the land capable of producing over 20 inches of water. This is the water which the grantor retained the right to develop. There was no other water to develop. The association certainly did not desire to tunnel for, "or in any other manner to develop," water already running in its ditch. The grantor was a water association, and the owner of a large body of water-bearing lands, including the land described in the deed. A large portion of the tract conveyed was dry, but susceptible of cultivation when irrigated. The association wanted the water to assist in feeding the ditch which ran through the tract granted, and the grantees wanted the land, with water sufficient for domestic and irrigation purposes. The association conveyed the land, but reserved to itself the ditch and the water therein, together with a strip of land 10 feet wide on each side thereof, and all undeveloped water in the land conveyed, less the quantity required to irrigate the tract and for domestic purposes. It is clear that such was the intention of the parties, and it is expressed in language so plain that there is little, if any, room for controversy.

Were the rights thus reserved capable of assignment? It is claimed by respondents that rights like those reserved in the deed to Elliott and Richardson, and now under consideration, cannot be granted over unless the power of assignment is expressly given to the grantor, or the usual words of inheritance to pass the fee are used, showing an intent to extend the right beyond the present grantee; that the rights reserved were not made appurtenant to any land of the grantor, and were, therefore, mere rights in gross which are not assignable. We do not deem it necessary to discuss the legal and technical etymology of exceptions, reservations, or profits à prendre. A right reserved may be an exception though designated in the deed as a reservation. The strip of land 10 feet wide on each side of the ditch reserved in the deed is clearly an exception. The other rights reserved are either exceptions or profits à prendre, and, if exceptions, neither the word "heirs" nor express power of assignment was required to enable the grantor to transfer his rights to the appellants. Whitaker v. Brown, 46 Pa. St. 198; Emerson v. Mooney, 50 N. H. 319; Gould, Waters, § 310. Regarded as a profit or interest in the soil, or, as it was designated in the Norman-French, a right of profits à prendre in alieno solo, the same result follows. When such a right is reserved in a deed by which lands are conveyed, it is equivalent, so far as the creation of the right of common is concerned, to an express grant of the right by the grantee to the grantor, (Wagner v. Hanna, 38 Cal. 116;) and in this state words of inheritance are not requisite to transfer a fee in real property, (Civil Code, §§ 1072, 1092, 1105.¹) These provisions of the Code were intended to change the common-law rule, not only with respect to a transfer of the fee, but of all other estates in real property. In cases of exception, where the grantor owns the fee, such words would be entirely superfluous, because the thing excepted never passed to the grantee; and, as a reservation of a right of profits à prendre was assignable at common law with words of inheritance, we think, under the provisions of the Code quoted, it may now be assigned without such words. The original and underlying principle of the old rule requiring words of inheritance in the grant conferring the fee—which was of feudal origin—was that the personal services of the grantee were the only consideration of the grant, and the estate, therefore, would not continue beyond the life of the grantee, unless the grantor expressly provided that it should extend to his heirs. The great changes which have occurred in the political and business relations of life, however, have done away with the reason for such a rule, and there is certainly no reason why an absolute estate should pass without words of inheritance, and the reservation of a right of profits à prendre should not. The cases cited by respondents which relate to water running on the surface do not aid us in determining the question before us in this case. There is a wide and apparent distinction between the water of a running stream and water which rests in the soil. The former assumes a distinct character from that of the earth; no exclusive property can be acquired in it while it is still flowing in its natural condition, distinct and separate from the land over which it runs; the latter is confined in the earth, and "has no distinctive character of ownership from the earth itself any more than the metallic oxides of which the earth is composed." Roath v. Driscoll, 20 Conn. 540; Cross v. Kitts, 69 Cal. 222, 10 Pac. Rep. 409. In Hanson v. McCue, 42 Cal. 309, the court said: "Water filtering or percolating in the soil belongs to the owner of the freehold, like the rocks and minerals found there. * * * The owner may appropriate the percolations and filtrations as he may choose, and turn them to profit if he can." Being an integral part of the realty, the right to take it away for use or profit is as much a profit à prendre as the right of fowling, fishing, hawking, or the common of turbary, or the common of estovers. Washburn, Easement. (2d Ed.) *10; Hill v. Lord, 48 Me. 100; Goodrich v. Burbank, 12 Allen, 459; Chatfield v. Wilson, 28 Vt. 49. In Trustees v. Youmans, 50 Barb. 319, the court, in speaking of subterranean waters, said: "The water belongs to the soil, is part of it, and may be used, removed, and controlled to the same extent by the owner."

Respondents claim that neither percolating nor standing waters can be granted without a grant of the soil above and below, and that, if the reservation under consideration be held to mean both water and soil, the exception is void because repugnant to the estate granted. We do not think this contention is sound. If the deed in express language had excepted all the water-bearing lands from the tract granted,—and that is practically though not precisely what was done, because the grantors reserved the right to enter and "to tunnel, or in any other manner develop the waters of the association on this land,"—the exception would not be repugnant to the grant. The grant was not of any specific number of acres. The land was described by courses and distances, and it was as competent to except from the operation of the grant the marsh or swamp as it was to except 10 feet on each side of the ditch. If a grant of land be for 20 acres, and 1 acre be excepted therefrom, the exception is void because repugnant to the grant. "So one may grant a farm, excepting the meadow; but to grant a pasture and meadow, excepting the meadow, would be repugnant and void." 3 Washb. Real Prop. (5th Ed.) 464. Nor can it be said that the exception would be void for uncertainty. It appears from the provisions of the deed that a portion of the tract conveyed is water-bearing land, and some of it is so dry that it requires irrigation to fit it for cultivation. The subject-matter, therefore, supports the exception, and the exception is not void because the boundaries of the part excepted must be shown by evidence. The evidence shows that out of the 32 acres granted there is only from three-fourths of an acre to an acre and one-quarter which can be used for the production of water, and that this small parcel is capable of yielding over 20 inches of water. It is apparent, therefore, that the quantity excepted can be easily located and defined, and that there is not much basis for the respondents' disquietude on account of what they term "such a tremendous and destructive power over their property * * * as that which is now claimed by appellants." Sections 801 and 802 of the Civil Code are cited to show that the rights reserved were mere servitudes in gross, and incapable of being granted over. There is no doubt that the servitudes enumerated in section 801 are real servitudes imposed for the benefit of the estate to which the right belongs, and resting upon the estate on which the obligation is imposed, and that those named in section 802 are personal, not attached to any dominant estate, and are not assignable. We cannot, however, regard the rights in question as mere servitudes, but, if they are, they were created as incidents or appurtenances to the ditch and water-rights of the company, and passed by the grant to appellants. At common law a profit à prendre, if granted in gross, was regarded as an estate or interest in the land itself. 6 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 142. Such a right "has always been considered in law a different species of right from an easement," and, although capable of being transferred in gross, may also be so attached to a dominant estate as to pass with it by a grant transferring the land with its appurtenances. Huntington v. Asher, 96 N. Y. 610. As stated before, the intention of the parties is clearly expressed in the deed, and this being so, little weight should be attached to technical definitions of terms used. It matters but little what name we give to the rights reserved to the grantor in the deed. Attempts to create symmetry in the law by classification and designation of classes of different kinds of rights connected with and springing out of lands are always hazardous. From whatever stand-point we view the case, and whatever may be the true and technical term applicable to the rights reserved, we are led to a conclusion different from that reached by the learned judge of the court below.

"Sec. 1092. A grant of an estate in real property may be made in substance as follows: 'I, A. B., grant to C. D. all that real property situated in * * * county, state of California, bounded as * * * follows: * * * Witness my hand this * * * day of * * * 18—. A. B.'"

"Sec. 1105. A fee-simple title is presumed to be intended to pass by a grant of real property, unless it appears from the grant that a lesser estate was intended."

It is claimed by respondents that all of the water on the land is necessary for irrigation and domestic purposes, and that the court found this contention to be true, but we do not so construe the findings. It is found that certain waters rise and flow from springs existing on the land which have been sufficient to furnish water for the irrigation of a large portion of the land; that about 10 acres of the land have been irrigated, plaintiffs "using therefor all of the said waters so rising and flowing on said lands; * * * and all of the water rising on said land was at all of the times herein mentioned needed for the proper irrigation of said land, and for proper domestic use thereon;" that defendants have dug and excavated ditches which have interrupted the flow of a portion of said waters "so rising and flowing as aforesaid," and prevented the same from flowing into the conduits of plaintiffs, "and plaintiffs have ever since the making of said excavation been and now are prevented from using said portion of said waters for the irrigation of said land or otherwise;" that defendants, "claiming they had the right to appropriate and take for their own use and benefit, and convey from said land, all of the waters so flowing in said trenches and ditches excavated as aforesaid, and at least four-fifths of the other waters rising and flowing on said lands as aforesaid, entered in and upon said land, and diverted all of said waters so flowing in said trenches and ditches excavated as aforesaid, and the greater portion, to-wit, at least four-fifths of said other waters rising and flowing on said land as aforesaid, * * * so that plaintiffs were then and there wholly deprived of all use thereof;" that plaintiffs have since said diversion turned the water back into their conduits, and used the same for irrigation and for domestic purposes, but defendants still unlawfully threaten to again divert, and at all times thereafter to appropriate and take, for their own use and benefit, all of the waters so diverted by defendants. These facts found by the court entitled the plaintiffs to an injunction restraining the defendants from diverting the water which plaintiffs needed for irrigation and domestic purposes, and to that extent the decree is correct; but the judgment went further, and declared that the defendants "have not, nor has either of them, any estate, right, or interest of, in, or to such land and waters, so owned as aforesaid by said plaintiffs, or any part thereof, nor of any easement or servitude upon or against said land, or any part thereof;" and adjudged that the defendants and those claiming under them be perpetually enjoined from appropriating or taking "said waters rising and flowing, or hereafter to rise or flow, upon said land so owned by said plaintiffs, or any part thereof, or from in any manner interfering with said plaintiffs' use, control, and possession of said waters, or from in any manner interfering therewith, or from entering in or upon said land owned by said plaintiffs, to excavate, dig, or bore thereon, or otherwise disturb the soil thereof." These latter provisions of the decree go beyond the relief to which the plaintiffs are entitled. The defendants are entitled to go upon the land for the purpose of making repairs, and to tunnel, or in any other reasonable manner to develop the water which may exist in the water-bearing lands of the tract, and which may not be required by plaintiffs for irrigation and domestic purposes. How many tunnels or how many ditches may be cut in the land by appellants cannot be determined in advance. All that can be said in that regard is that they will be held to a reasonable exercise of the right to develop the water remaining after the plaintiffs have secured enough for irrigation and domestic purposes. The order denying a new trial is affirmed, but the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to modify its decree in accordance with the views we have expressed.

GOULD v. STAFFORD. (No. 14,273.)

WATER-RIGHTS—CONVEYANCE—CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESS.

1. In an action for damages, and to restrain an alleged wrongful and excessive diversion of water from a stream, the evidence showed that defendant was a riparian owner above plaintiff, and had let a tract of land, which was riparian to the stream, agreeing to construct a flume to it; that he employed one C. to construct it; that defendant agreed that C., in consideration of his work on the flume, should have a partial use of it, to convey water to his land, lying below the tractlet; that there was no permanent dam across the stream to divert the water into the flume, but that the lessee and C. placed temporary obstructions in the stream at low stages of water, without any directions from defendant. Held, that a finding that defendant had diverted and misapplied water, or that he authorized such misapplication by others, could not be sustained.

2. The rights of a riparian proprietor to the flow of a stream of water over his land may be severed from the land by grant, and where such right has been conveyed without reservation the grantor cannot maintain an action to enjoin a diversion of water from the stream.

3. Where, in such case, the riparian rights had been conveyed to the Montecito Water Company, and an officer of the Montecito Valley Water Company testifies that the company is paying the expense of the litigation, it is error to rule that the witness cannot be asked on cross-examination, "Why does the company pay the expense of this litigation?" as it is proper to show the witness' interest, though it does not appear that the last-named company is identical with or the successor of the other.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

Action by Fred S. Gould against O. A. Stafford for damages and to enjoin the diversion of water. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

B. F. Thomas, for appellant. John J. Boyce, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for damages resulting from the alleged diversion of water by defendant from Montecito creek, in the county of Santa Barbara, and for a perpetual injunction against such diversion in the future. Both parties claim to be riparian proprietors upon both sides of the creek, the defendant's land being about one mile above that of the plaintiff's. The complaint charges that in January, 1882, by means of a dam across a main branch of the creek, (the Cold Spring branch,) and certain flumes and ditches erected and maintained by the defendant, he "prevented a portion of the waters naturally flowing in said creek from flowing down to and reaching plaintiff's land and premises. That defendant wrongfully and unlawfully has continuously since said time appropriated and taken for his own use a large portion of the waters naturally flowing in said stream as aforesaid, and has wasted said water, and applied the same to unlawful purposes, and prevented the entire quantity so taken from again returning to the natural bed or channel of said Montecito creek, or any of its branches, and said waters have by means of said unlawful diversion been wasted and lost, and have not reached the land of plaintiff;" whereby plaintiff's land has been deprived of the flow of the water, and of the use thereof for necessary or any purposes, and in the seasons of scarcity of water the bed of said creek, within the premises of plaintiff, has become dry for a long period, and plaintiff has been deprived of the use of any water of said creek for domestic or other reasonable and lawful uses, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $5,000, and that defendant threatens to continue, and, unless restrained, will continue, such unlawful diversion, to the lasting and irreparable injury of plaintiff and his land. The amended answer of the defendant, on which the case was tried, denies that the waters of said creek naturally flow through plaintiff's land later than the month of June, except in extraordinarily wet seasons; and specifically denies all the wrongful acts charged in the complaint. The answer alleges the defendant's riparian ownership of land as above stated, and that on November 19, 1881, the defendant leased to Ah Young, a Chinaman, a part of his riparian land on the west side of the creek, and sets out the lease, as follows: "Agreement. In consideration of the sum of one hundred dollars ($100) per annum, to be paid semi-annually in advance, I agree to lease to Ah Young my field of eight (8) acres, more or less, lying on the west side of Cold Spring creek, formerly known as the 'Sanchez Land,' for the term of five (5) years from date of this agreement. I furthermore agree to build a six-inch flume to carry water from the creek to the land, he, Ah Young, agreeing to keep said flume and the fence now about the land in good repair, as they are at present. O. A. STAFFORD. Montecito. S. B. Co., Cal. [Chinese mark.] AH YOUNG. November 9, 1881." The answer further alleges that defendant did not agree to furnish the lessee any particular quantity of water, or any water except such as the lessee was entitled to by the terms of the lease, viz., so much as was appurtenant to the land leased by reason of its being riparian to the creek; that Ah Young took possession of the leased premises on November 9, 1881, and he and his assigns continued to occupy the premises under the lease until November 9, 1886. It is also alleged in the answer "that no notice was given to defendant before the commencement of this action to abate any dam in said creek, or that the waters of said creek which flowed into said flume were being or had been wasted or misapplied."

As to the alleged riparian ownership of defendant, and the lease and possession of the lessee under it, the court found the answer to be true. As to the alleged want of notice to defendant there is no finding. As to damages, the plaintiff withdrew all claim except for nominal damages, and the court found only nominal damages. But upon all other material issues the court found for the plaintiff, and gave judgment against defendant for nominal damages and costs assessed at $263.60, and perpetually enjoined and commanded him, substantially, as follows: First. From wasting, or permitting to be wasted, any portion of the waters of said creek or the branches thereof. Second. From diverting or using, or permitting to be diverted or used, any of said waters upon any other land than the riparian land of the defendant. Third. From diverting or permitting to be diverted, for the purposes of irrigation, all the waters of said creek or any of its branches, "at any season of the year, for purposes of irrigation, and from interrupting or interfering with the said supply of water so enjoyed by the plaintiff for domestic and household purposes, and for watering his stock; and from permitting the same to continue un-restored, and from permitting to continue on his land or at the dam erected by him, any means or appliances whereby the said uses of plaintiff therein are or may be diverted or interfered with." Fourth. In case the defendant should divert and use a portion of the waters of said stream for the purpose of irrigating his riparian land, he is commanded by "substantial and proper artificial means and methods" to conduct back to the channel of the creek, above the lands of plaintiff, all surplus water not necessary for such irrigation, and not being used therefor, so that the same may be restored to the natural channel above the lands of plaintiff, without waste or unnecessary diminution. Fifth. It is adjudged that the use by the defendant of the waters of said stream for the purpose of irrigation is subordinate to the right of the plaintiff to use the same for domestic and household purposes and the watering of stock. The case was here on a former appeal, (77 Cal. 66, 18 Pac. Rep. 879,) but the questions now presented are different from those decided on the former appeal. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The appellant contends that the evidence does not justify the finding that the defendant by any means diverted, misapplied, or wasted any water from the Cold Spring branch of the creek; or that he caused, authorized, or promoted any such misapplication or waste by others. The evidence tends to prove no other wrongful or excessive diversion than that from the Cold Spring branch through the flume to the garden leased to Ah Young; and the only evidence claimed to have any tendency to prove that defendant caused or authorized such diversion, or any waste or misapplication of the water, is that he executed the lease to Ah Young, and constructed the flume according to the terms of the lease; and also that he employed one Chico to construct the flume, and agreed that Chico should have a partial use of the flume to convey water to his land, situate below the Chinese garden, in consideration of his work upon the flume. The flume tapped the stream above defendant's land, and defendant acquired the right of way for it upon the land of others. There never was any permanent dam across the stream to divert the water into the flume. In the early part of each season, when the stream carried a large quantity of water, very little, if any, obstruction was required to turn sufficient water into the flume to fill it. A few rocks thrown into the stream were then sufficient to turn water into the flume to its full capacity. Later in the season, as the water in the stream diminished, the obstruction was increased until the lowest stage of the water, when a dam composed of stones, brush, and mud was extended entirely across the stream. This dam was washed away in the winter or spring of each year. The defendant testified that the dam and obstructions by which the water was turned into the ditch were annually constructed by the lessee of the Chinese garden and Chico; and that he (defendant) neither assisted in their construction, nor directed or advised as to the manner or extent thereof, nor as to the quantity of water to be diverted thereby. This testimony is corroborated by that of other witnesses, and there is no evidence to the contrary. Nor is there any evidence tending to prove that Chico was the agent or servant of the defendant for any other purpose than the construction of the flume, or that defendant ever controlled, aided, or advised Chico in regard to diverting or using the water of the stream. It appears that Chico extended the flume from the Chinese garden to his place lower down the creek, where he irrigated a strawberry bed and an orchard of pear trees; but there is no evidence tending to prove whether or not he owned the land thus occupied and irrigated by him, or whether it was riparian to the creek, or how much water he used. Upon cross-examination of Packard, the principal witness for plaintiff, defendant's counsel asked him: "What portion of the water flowed into the flume that Chico used?" This question was objected to by plaintiff's counsel as irrelevant and immaterial, and the court sustained the objection. The defendant also testified that he was never notified before the commencement of this action that more water was being diverted by means of the dam and flume than his lessee and Chico were entitled to divert, nor that the water diverted by them was misapplied or wasted; and his testimony in this respect was not disputed. There is no question that the Chinese garden was riparian to the creek, and that the owner thereof, or his lessee, was entitled to such reasonable use of the waters of the creek to irrigate the same as was consistent with the rights of other riparian owners. The evidence shows that the quantity of water that might be so used at any given time depended upon the stage of the water in the creek, which varied in different years, as well as at different seasons of the same year. It follows that defendant had a perfect right to construct a flume to convey water from the stream to his land, for his own use or the use of his lessee, of sufficient capacity to carry all the water that he or his lessees might be entitled to use at any season of any year. The mere capacity of the flume did not concern other riparian owners, as they could object to only an unlawful or excessive use of it. The flume was not a nuisance per se; and after the defendant leased it, he had no more power or right to control the use of it by the lessee, than he had to control the use of the land and other fixtures leased. The lessee alone was responsible for his wrongful use of it, by which others were injured. "A landlord is not responsible to other parties for the misconduct or injurious acts of his tenants to whom his estate has been leased for a lawful and proper purpose, when there is no nuisance or illegal structure upon it at the time of the lease." Kalis v. Shattuck, 69 Cal. 593, 11 Pac. Rep. 346, and authorities there cited. The relation of Chico to the defendant, after the flume was constructed, was either that of lessee or licensee of the flume alone, in consideration of his labor in constructing it; and since the defendant neither authorized nor participated in a wrongful use of the flume by Chico, he was not liable, unless the lease or license contemplated, or necessarily involved, a nuisance or a wrongful use. Gwatney v. Railroad Co., 12 Ohio St. 92; Wood, Landl. & Ten. § 539. As the flume was not a nuisance per se, and was, unquestionably, adapted to a lawful use, there can be no presumption against the defendant, in the absence of evidence, that he intended or contemplated an unlawful use of it by his lessee or licensee. For the reasons above stated I think the finding under consideration is not justified by the evidence.

2. Appellant's counsel further contends that the twelfth finding is not justified by the evidence. That finding is to the effect that by the diversions of the waters complained of "the plaintiff has suffered material damage, and the rights of plaintiff as a riparian proprietor have been infringed and injured, and are threatened with further irreparable injury, as far as said riparian rights are concerned." In support of this point it is claimed that the evidence shows that plaintiff had no riparian rights that could have been infringed or injured; that prior to plaintiff's purchase of the land described in his complaint as to which he claims riparian rights, his grantors had granted to Montecito Water Company (a California corporation) all riparian rights to water appurtenant to or parcel of said land, in consideration of certain shares of stock in that corporation, which shares of stock entitled the holder thereof to a certain quantity of water, in proportion to the number of shares, to be conveyed to the land through pipes or aqueducts by the corporation; and that, during the time the defendant is alleged to have diverted water from the creek, the Montecito Water Company, by virtue of that grant, was diverting water from the same stream, and conveying such portion of it to plaintiff's land as plaintiff was entitled to in consideration of the grant. To prove this alleged grant the defendant put in evidence a long and complicated written agreement between riparian proprietors on the creek (23 in number, including plaintiff's grantors) of the first part, and the Montecito Water Company of the second part. Among other things, this agreement purports to be a grant by the parties of the first part to the Montecito Water Company of all the rights of the grantors to the waters of the creek for the consideration above stated. In addition to this, the evidence tended to prove that the plaintiff regarded the agreement as valid and binding upon him; that, as successor to his vendors, he had applied to the corporation to have their stock transferred to him, and that it had been so transferred on the books of the corporation; and that he had received on his land water from the corporation for domestic and other uses during the time he complains of having been deprived of water by the defendant; but whether during all that time he received from the corporation as much water as he was entitled to by the agreement does not clearly appear. The agreement purports to be a substitute for a lost agreement, to which it refers, and, in some undefined respects, to be different from the lost agreement. Besides, it is not clear that all the parties to the lost agreement are parties to the substituted agreement. It is also quite apparent upon the face of the agreement that, in order to construe it and determine its effect, if any effect it can have in this action, it will be necessary to consider the circumstances under which it was executed, and the acts of the parties under it, of which there was not sufficient evidence upon the trial. Gould, Waters, § 319. In view of the record here, I think it cannot be said that the evidence does not justify the finding that the plaintiff has riparian rights which were infringed by the diversions of water complained of, or that the court improperly declined to give to the agreement above referred to, as presented on the trial, the effect claimed for it by counsel for appellant; although it may turn out, upon a proper construction of that agreement, (which is not attempted here,) in the light of all the circumstances which may be lawfully considered as aids to such construction, that the agreement may have the effect claimed for it by counsel for appellant; and for the purposes of a new trial, which must be granted upon other grounds, it is proper to pass upon some of the questions of law discussed by counsel relating to the grant of riparian water-rights, and the effect thereof. The right of a riparian proprietor to the flow of a stream of water over his land is an incident of his property in the land, is annexed to the land, and considered part and parcel of it, (Civil Code, § 662; Water Co. v. Forbes, 62 Cal. 182;) but may be severed or "segregated" from the land by grant, by condemnation, or by prescription, (Water Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219, 24 Pac. Rep. 645; Water Co. v. Mayberry, 88 Cal. 69, 25 Pac. Rep. 1101; Washb. Easem. pp. 12 and 385; Ang. Water-Courses, §§ 96, 141, 146.) If, therefore, the grantors of the plaintiff, while they owned the land, granted to the corporation, (Montecito Water Company,) "its successors and assigns," all or any portion of their riparian rights to the waters of Montecito creek, they thereby, to the extent of such grant, severed from the land their riparian rights, and disabled themselves to grant such rights to the plaintiff; and, consequently, their grant of the land to the plaintiff did not pass the riparian rights theretofore granted to the Montecito Water Company, without which the plaintiff is not entitled to complain that those rights have been infringed by the defendant. In other words, the plaintiff is not entitled to maintain an action for the protection of rights which he has not. It is suggested, however, that even in this supposed hypothetical case, the plaintiff would have a reversionary right to be protected against the acquisition by defendant of a right by prescription; but this would depend upon the terms and conditions of the grant to the Montecito Water Company. If that grant is only for a limited term, or is upon a condition subsequent by which it may be terminated, the plaintiff would be entitled to maintain an action to protect his reversionary right; but if the grant is absolute and unconditional the plaintiff has no reversionary interest. That such a grant may be absolute and unconditional appears by the authorities above cited, but for reasons above stated it is not intended to intimate in this opinion what construction should be given to the written agreement above referred to, in any respect.

3. G. H. Gould was called as a witness for plaintiff, who, after testifying in chief to facts material to plaintiff's case, on cross-examination testified that he is the brother of plaintiff, and one of plaintiff's attorneys in this action; that he is a member and the president of the Montecito Valley Water Company, and that the last-named company pays the expenses of the litigation. Thereupon he was asked the following question: "Why does the Montecito Valley Water Company pay the expenses of this litigation?" Plaintiff's counsel objected to this question, on the ground that it was irrelevant and immaterial, and the court sustained the objection, to which ruling defendant's counsel excepted. It does not appear by the record that the Montecito Valley Water Company is identical with, or successor to, the Montecito Water Company, yet, for the purpose of showing the interest, bias, and prejudice of the witness the question was proper on cross-examination, and the court erred in sustaining the objection to

it. Under the circumstances, a liberal cross-examination of the witness should have been allowed. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BEHLOW v. SHORB et ux. (No. 14,088.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 11, 1891.)

SUMMONS IN ACTION FOR MONEY ONLY—NOTICE—AMBIGUOUS COMPLAINT—APPEAL—CLERICAL ERROR IN JUDGMENT.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 407, subd. 4, which provides that, in an action arising on contract for the recovery of money or damages only, the summons shall contain "a notice that, unless the defendant so appears and answers, the plaintiff will take judgment for the sum demanded in the complaint, (stating it,)" a summons in an action for goods sold is sufficient which states that the "action is brought to obtain a judgment * * * for the sum of" $2,843.25, "with legal interest * * * until paid, alleged to be due plaintiff upon account, and for costs of suit. Reference is had to complaint for particulars."

2. A complaint in an action for goods sold and delivered is not uncertain or ambiguous because it fails to state where the goods were sold.

3. Where the judgment rendered was for $53 more than the amount found due, and was doubtless an error in computation of interest, which, if brought to the attention of the court below, would have been corrected, the objection being first made in the supreme court, the judgment will not be reversed, but will be ordered reduced by that amount.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM H. CLARK, Judge.

Action by William Behlow against J. De Barth Shorb and wife on account for goods sold. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chapman & Hendrick, for appellants. Gottschalk & Luckel, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action on account for goods, wares, and merchandise alleged to have been sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendants between the 1st day of May, 1887, and the 1st day of March, 1888, and to have been of the value of $2,843.25. The defendants moved the court to quash the summons issued in the action, and served upon them, upon the ground that it did not state the amount for which the plaintiff proposed to take judgment. The portion of the summons objected to as insufficient reads as follows: "The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of said court for the sum of two thousand eight hundred and forty-three 25-100 dollars, with legal interest thereon from March 1, 1888, until paid, alleged to be due plaintiff upon account, and for costs of suit. Reference is had to complaint for particulars. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint as above required, said plaintiff will cause your default to be entered, and take judgment as prayed for." The motion was denied, and an exception reserved. Shortly afterwards, the plaintiff, after due notice to defendants' attorney, moved that the summons be amended so as to meet the objections urged against it; but this application was resisted by the defendants, and thereupon denied by the court. After their motion was denied, the defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground (1) that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and (2) that it was uncertain, ambiguous, and unintelligible, in that it did not appear therefrom where the said goods were sold. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendants answered. They averred that the whole sum sued for had been paid, and that no part thereof was then due or payable to the plaintiff. They also, by way of counter-claim, averred that they sold, and on the 23d day of August, 1888, conveyed, to plaintiff a certain piece of land for and in consideration of the sum of $5,900, and "that at the time of the execution of the said conveyance the said plaintiff had agreed to sell and deliver the goods, wares, and merchandise mentioned in the complaint, and to do certain work for the defendants; and, it being then uncertain what the amount and value of said goods or of said work and labor would be, it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendants that when the said contract on the part of the plaintiff had been performed, if the reasonable value of the same amounted to less than the consideration for said land, to-wit, $5,900, the said William Behlow should pay to the defendants the difference between the value of said goods and labor; and if the value of said goods and labor amounted to more than the sum of $5,900, these defendants would pay to the plaintiff the difference between the said purchase price of said land, and the value of said goods and labor. And defendants further aver that no part of the consideration for said conveyance was paid by the plaintiff at the time, or at any other time, except under the contract aforesaid; and that after deducting the amount stated in the complaint as the value of the said goods, to-wit, $2,843.25, there remains due and owing to the defendants from the said plaintiff the sum of $3,056.75, no part of which has been paid;" and for the last-named sum and costs they prayed judgment. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the findings were, in substance, that there were two distinct transactions between the parties; that between the dates named in the complaint the plaintiff sold and delivered to defendants the goods, wares, and merchandise sued for, and that the same were to be paid for in money, and the full and reasonable value thereof was the amount demanded, no part of which, or any interest thereon had ever been paid; that the conveyance of the land for $5,900 set up in the counter-claim was not in consideration of the sale and delivery of the goods sued for, but of other goods received from plaintiff by defendants at or about the time of the delivery of the said deed the value of which last-mentioned goods amounted to the sum of $6,039.96; that the value of all the goods sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendants was $8,883.21, and the total value of the land conveyed to plaintiff was $5,900, and that besides the land nothing was paid to plaintiff on account of said goods or otherwise by defendants or either of them; that nothing was due the defendants from plaintiff by reason of the matters set up in their counter-claim; and, as conclusions of law, that plaintiff was entitled to judgment against defendants for the sum of $2,843.25 with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from March 1, 1888, until paid, and his costs. Judgment was accordingly entered on the 28th day of December, 1889, for the sum of $3,261.21 and costs, and that defendants take nothing by reason of their counter-claim. From this judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the defendants appeal.

1. The first point made for a reversal is that the court erred in refusing to quash the summons. It is said the notice in the summons was insufficient, because it did not state the amount for which judgment would be taken in case the defendants failed to appear and answer, as required by section 407, subd. 4,¹ of the Code of Civil Procedure. We think the summons in effect complied with the requirements of the statute.

2. It is claimed that the demurrer ought to have been sustained upon the ground that the complaint was uncertain and ambiguous. We see nothing in this point. It was not necessary for the plaintiff to state in the complaint where the goods were sold.

3. It is earnestly contended that the findings were not justified by the evidence; that the sales of the goods were not separate and distinct transactions; that plaintiff by splitting his demand, and suing for a part of it, waived any right to ever sue for the balance; and hence that defendants could interpose and maintain any defense to this action that they could have interposed and maintained to the whole demand if sued upon. It is unnecessary to state the evidence, which covers a hundred pages of the transcript. There was some conflict, but, after reading the whole of it, we are of the opinion that it was amply sufficient to justify the findings and decision of the court. The judgment cannot, therefore, be reversed on this ground.

4. Finally, it is suggested that the judgment is for $53 more than the amount found to be due, with the interest thereon at the rate and for the time allowed. This seems to be so, but the point appears to be made here for the first time. If the suggestion had been made to the court below, doubtless the error in the computation of interest would have been corrected at once. It follows, in our opinion, that the judgment and order should be affirmed, except that the court below should be directed to modify the judgment by striking therefrom the sum of $53; the

WATER-RIGHT—APPROPRIATION OF SPRINGS—PUBLIC LAND.

1. A rightful occupant of public land can acquire a water-right which will become appurtenant thereto, although the land was unsurveyed, and he had no legal title when the right was acquired.

2. Water flowing from springs may be appropriated under Civil Code Cal. § 1410, providing for the appropriation of "running water flowing in a river or stream or down a canon or ravine."

Action by Benjamin Ely against Louisa J. Ferguson to restrain her from obstructing the flow of water in ditch owned by plaintiff. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. W. Crump, (Ira C. Jenks, of counsel,) for appellant. F. E. Baker, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff brought this action to obtain a perpetual injunction restraining the defendant from obstructing the flow of water into a ditch constructed to convey the water to his land, to be there used for domestic and irrigating purposes. The court below granted the injunction as prayed for, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial.

The ditch referred to was constructed in 1862 by one Jamison, and it extended from the land now owned by plaintiff to that now owned by defendant. These two tracts of land were situate in Lake county, and were then public land of the United States, but were separately inclosed, and occupied by Jamison. On the land now owned by defendant there was a marsh containing about four acres, and on one side of it were hills, near the base of which several springs of water flowed out, carrying in the aggregate, during the summer and fall months, as estimated, about 24 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure. These waters flowed into the marsh, and thence through a natural channel to and across the land now owned by plaintiff. The ditch was constructed around the side of the marsh so as to tak in the waters of all the springs and conduct them to plaintiff's land at points higher than they would otherwise have reached. In 1867 Jamison posted and had recorded a notice that he claimed all the water flowing from the different springs for purposes of irrigation. In 1870 he sold his possessory claim to the land now owned by defendant, and one-half of the water appropriated by him, to one Chambers, and reserved by his deed the other half of the water for use on the land now owned by the plaintiff, where he then lived. In 1872 he posted and caused to be recorded another notice of appropriation, in which he claimed one-half of the water flowing from the different springs, amounting to 12 inches under a 4-inch pressure, and the ditch already constructed. Chambers sold his possessory claim to R. K. Ferguson, the defendant's predecessor in interest, who in 1885 obtained a United States patent to the land, "subject, however, to any vested and accrued water-rights for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes, and rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water-rights." Jamison continued to live on the land now owned by the plaintiff, and to use the water carried to it by his ditch for irrigating and other purposes, until 1872, when he conveyed the land with its appurtenances to one White, who in 1878 obtained a United States patent therefor. White conveyed to Getz in 1879, and Getz to the plaintiff in 1883, who has ever since been the owner of the land. Each of these deeds described the land and granted the title thereto, with its appurtenances. Each of the plaintiff's grantors, while they respectively owned the land, and afterwards the plaintiff, continued to claim and use thereon one-half of the water flowing from the springs until June, 1887, when the defendant obstructed the ditch, and thereby prevented any of the said waters from flowing through the same to plaintiff's land.

Only two points are made for a reversal of the judgment. It is claimed—First, that water flowing from springs cannot be appropriated, citing section 1410 of the Civil Code, which provides: "The right to the use of running water flowing in a river or stream, or down a canon or ravine, may be acquired by appropriation;" and, second, that, if Jamison did acquire a right to the use of the water of the springs and marsh, the land to which he conducted it was then unsurveyed public land, to which he had no semblance of title, and hence the water-right did not become appurtenant to the land, and could not be passed to another except by deed. We do not think either of these claims can be sustained. Water flowing from springs, as the evidence showed and the court found that this water did, may be appropriated. Cross v. Kitts, 69 Cal. 222, 10 Pac. Rep. 409; De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397, 20 Pac. Rep. 563, and 22 Pac. Rep. 198. And the fact that the ditch was constructed up to the mouth of the largest spring, as testified by some of defendant's witnesses, cannot affect the result.

So the fact that the land to which the water was taken by Jamison was at the time unsurveyed public land did not prevent the water from becoming appurtenant thereto. He was not a trespasser on the land, but a rightful occupant. All public lands are open to occupation and settlement by citizens of the United States, or those who have declared their intention to become such. He was living on the land, having an orchard and garden thereon, and farming a part of it. And from the earliest times in this state it has been customary to divert water onto the public lands for mining, agricultural, and other purposes, and this right was, in 1866, confirmed and approved by act of congress. See act and authorities cited in De Necochea v. Curtis, supra. The Civil Code provides: "A thing is deemed to be incidental or appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit; as in the case of a way or water-course, or of a passage for light, air, or heat, from or across the land of another." Section 662. And see Farmer v. Water Co., 56 Cal. 11. It follows, in our opinion, that the court below rightly granted the injunction, and that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

MARSTON v. WHITE et al. (No. 14,323.)

FORECLOSURE—SALE EN MASSE.

Where distinct parcels of land have been separately offered at a foreclosure sale without bids being received therefor, a sale en masse is not invalid under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 694, providing that when the sale is of real property, consisting of several known lots or parcels, they must be sold separately, and that the judgment debtor, if present, may also direct the order in which the property shall be sold, when it consists of several parcels, or of articles which can be sold to advantage separately; and the sheriff must follow such directions.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN R. AITKEN, Judge.

Action by George W. Marston against Arville A. White and others to foreclose a mortgage. There was a decree of foreclosure, and a sale thereunder, which defendants afterwards moved to set aside. The court denied the motion, and defendants appeal from the order. Affirmed.

Conklin & Hughes, for appellants. Luce, McDonald & Henderson, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal from an order refusing to set aside a sale of real property under a decree of foreclosure of mortgages upon the property. It appears from the bill of exceptions that the property described in the mortgages and decree of foreclosure consisted of two parcels of land known as "Lot D" and "Lot I" in block G, of Horton's addition to the city of San Diego. The decree was duly rendered on the 12th day of October, 1889, and thereafter, on the 3d day of March, 1890, when the sheriff of San Diego county, after due notice, was about to sell the property under an order of sale issued in pursuance of the decree, the appellant directed the sheriff, both orally and in writing, to sell the lots separately, and as to the order in which they should be sold. The sheriff offered the lots for sale separately, as directed, but received no bids for either of them, and he then offered them as a whole, and they were struck off and sold to the respondent, who was the highest bidder, and one of the mortgagees. A return to this effect was made on the writ, and a certificate of sale given to the purchaser. On the 14th of August, 1890, the appellant served upon the respondent her affidavit and notice of motion to set aside the sale upon the ground that the lots were not sold separately as required by section 694 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and as directed by her. When this motion came on to be heard, the appellant introduced in evidence her notice of motion and affidavit in support thereof, a copy of the notice served on the sheriff prior to the sale, the order of sale and the sheriff's return thereon, and then rested. After argument by counsel for the respective parties, the court denied the motion, and the appellant excepted to the ruling.

Section 694 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "when the sale is of real property, consisting of several known lots or parcels, they must be sold separately; or, when a portion of such real property is claimed by a third person, and he requires it to be sold separately, such portion must be thus sold. The judgment debtor, if present at the sale, may also direct the order in which property, real or personal, shall be sold, when such property consists of several known lots or parcels, or of articles which can be sold to advantage separately; and the sheriff must follow such directions." It has been held that this section is applicable to sales under a decree of foreclosure, when the decree is silent as to the manner or order in which the separate parcels shall be sold. Improvement Co. v. Bedford, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 39. It does not, however, render a sale of separate parcels en masse, in disregard of its requirements, absolutely void. Such a sale is voidable, and, on timely application, will ordinarily be set aside. San Francisco v. Pixley, 21 Cal. 57; Blood v. Light, 38 Cal. 654; Browne v. Ferrea, 51 Cal. 552; Vigoureux v. Murphy, 54 Cal. 346. But while the rule declared by the Code as above is controlling, and should be strictly followed, still it cannot be held to apply where each distinct parcel is first offered for sale separately, and no bids are received. In such case the property may then be offered and sold as a whole, and the sale will be upheld unless other reasons appear for setting it aside. The rule applicable to such cases is stated, and, as we think, correctly, in Freeman on Executions, § 296, as follows: "The rule that distinct parcels should be separately sold is not generally enforced to the extent of denying the right to sell when the sale can be made in no other way. Hence the officer, after offering the parcels separately, and in various combinations, without receiving any bids, may then offer and sell them en masse." And see authorities cited. Here the lots were offered separately, as directed by the appellant, and the only ground urged for setting aside the sale was that they were then sold together. This, as we have seen, was not a valid ground, and hence it follows that the order appealed from was proper, and should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

MILLER v. SEARS et al. (No. 14,371.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 19, 1891.)

ESCROW—INCOMPLETE CONTRACT.

Where a contract for the exchange of lands was not to be complete until the parties were satisfied as to the title, the deposit of a deed with a third person by one party for delivery to the other "when everything is all right and perfected," does not constitute a delivery in escrow.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by Miller against Sears to recover possession of certain deeds and mortgages. Plaintiff was nonsuited, and appeals. Reversed.

Gould & Stanford, for appellant. E. W. Sargent and Albert M. Stephens, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action to recover the possession of certain described instruments, consisting of a note, mortgage, and two deeds, each signed by the plaintiff, and alleged to have been deposited with the defendants. The plaintiff was nonsuited, and the question before us is whether the testimony of plaintiff was such as to show that the documents in controversy were delivered by him to defendants in escrow, as claimed by them.

We think the fair import of the testimony is to the effect that plaintiff had made an agreement, subject to further consideration as to title, with one Stimson and a Mrs. Buttner for the purchase of certain property from them, and the sale by him of certain lots to them, and as part of this transaction the note, mortgage, and deeds of plaintiff and the deed of Stimson and Mrs. Buttner for plaintiff were signed and left with defendants to be delivered "when everything was all right and perfected." Upon this point the plaintiff testified: "I said to Mr. Sears: 'You take these papers, and when everything is all right and perfected, you give these papers to me, and these others to him.' That was the agreement. * * * The transaction was not completed on that day because we had no abstract of title at the time. We knew nothing about the titles, and we had to leave that to after-consideration. If it had been perfect, of course we should have handed over the papers." Upon this state of facts it cannot be held that plaintiff's papers were delivered to the defendants as an escrow. There was no contract of sale concluded between the plaintiff and the other parties to the negotiation, as the question of title remained to be settled to the satisfaction of the contracting parties. This fact alone is fatal to the contention of respondents that they held the documents in controversy as an escrow. The law upon this point is very clearly stated by Mr. Justice RHODES in delivering the opinion of this court in Fitch v. Bunch, 30 Cal. 209, as follows: "An escrow differs from a deed in one particular only, and that is the delivery. Not only must there be sufficient parties, a proper subject-matter, and a consideration, but the parties must have actually contracted. * * * The actual contract of sale on the one side and of purchase on the other is as essential to constitute the instrument an escrow as that it be executed by the grantor; and until both parties have definitely assented to the contract the instrument executed by the proposed grantor, though in form a deed, is neither a deed nor an escrow; and it makes no difference whether the instrument remains in the possession of the nominal grantor or is placed in the hands of a third party pending the proposals for the sale or purchase." But, in addition to this, we do not think that it can be held, upon the facts above stated, that the defendants were given the right to deliver these papers without further direction from the plaintiff. The delivery was not absolute and beyond the control of the plaintiff. There was to be no delivery to the other parties until "everything was all right and perfected;" and, as there is nothing in the evidence to indicate that this matter was to be determined except by the future agreement of the parties themselves, it follows that defendants held the documents in controversy as mere depositaries, subject to the future direction of the plaintiff, and were not authorized to do anything with them until notified by plaintiff that he was satisfied with the title he was to receive. For this reason also it must be held that the evidence does not show a delivery of these instruments in escrow. James v. Vanderheyden, 1 Paige, 386. It follows from the foregoing views that the court erred in granting the motion for nonsuit. Judgment and order reversed.

SAPPENFIELD v. MAIN ST. & A. P. R. Co.
(No. 14,155.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 5, 1891.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYE — DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES — OPINION EVIDENCE.

1. Where the pin holding the single-tree to the draw-head of a street-car came out, releasing the horse, and the driver was dragged over the dash-board, it was error, in an action for the resulting injury, to charge that it is the duty of a master to furnish such appliances "as combine the greatest safety with practical use," since a master need only furnish appliances reasonably safe. Enough better ones exist; and a subsequent charge, given at the master's request, which correctly states the law, does not cure the error.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1870, subd. 9, which provides that a witness may give his opinion "on a question of science, art, or trade, when he is skilled therein," it is error to allow a witness, who for about two years has been a driver and conductor on the railway, to testify whether in his opinion the pin was "safe," since he should have testified only as to facts, leaving it to the jury to draw inferences therefrom.

3. Evidence that soon after the accident the railway company substituted a new and safer pin in all its cars, is incompetent as an admission of prior negligence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by one Sappenfield against the Main Street & Agricultural Park Railroad Company. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Stephen M. White, for appellant. Dupuy & Bentley and R. Dunnigan, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant is the proprietor of a street railroad in the city of Los Angeles, and the plaintiff was employed by it as a driver upon one of its cars. On the 22d of November, 1888, while engaged in the service of the defendant, the plaintiff was driving a horse called "Dan," which was hitched to car No. 4 of the defendant's line of street-cars, and while driving along Main street, near Tenth, the horse became detached from the car, and dragged the plaintiff over the dash-board, throwing him upon the track, where he was run over by the car, and received serious injury, necessitating the amputation of one of his legs. For the damage thus sustained he brought this action against the defendant, alleging that it had been caused by its negligence in furnishing him with an unsafe and ungovernable horse, and a car "whose appliances and attachments" were in an unsafe and dangerous condition. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff. From the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed to this court.

For the purpose of establishing that the appliances and attachments of the car were unsafe and dangerous, it was shown that the single-tree by which the horse was hitched to the car was fastened to the draw-head of the car by a straight pin. This pin had a ring at the top, through which a chain kept it attached to the draw-head, and was five and five-eighths inches in length and three-fourths of an inch in diameter, and the holes in the two bars in the draw-head, through which it was inserted for the purpose of holding the single-tree, were thirteen-sixteenths of an inch in diameter. Testimony was given at the trial to the effect that on a few occasions the straight pin had worked out of its hole while the car was in motion, letting loose the single-tree, and giving the horse an opportunity to escape; but it was not shown that any accident or injury had ever resulted therefrom prior to the present instance, although the cars made several hundred trips each day. It was also shown that there was another kind of pin in use, called a "safety-pin," which was provided with a device to prevent it from working out of the holes in the draw-head. This safety-pin was upon two of the cars of the defendant which it occasionally used, that had been manufactured for it in St. Louis a few months previous to the accident, and upon two other of its cars, which had recently been manufactured for it in Los Angeles. It was also shown that the straight pin had been in use by the defendant for several years, and was the same kind of pin that was generally in use upon street-cars, as well in San Francisco as in Los Angeles, although two of the lines in Los Angeles had a short time previously adopted the safety-pin upon a few of their cars.

1. The theory upon which the plaintiff's case was tried was that the defendant was negligent in continuing the use of the straight pin, and in not having furnished the car in question with the safety-pin; and at the close of the testimony the court, at his request, gave to the jury the following instruction: "It is the duty of one who employs another in his business to furnish to such employee such tools, implements, appliances, and machinery as may be needed in the work to be done for the employer, in good order, of sound material, and in safe condition for use, such as will be reasonably best calculated to insure safety in their use by the employee, and such as combine the greatest safety with practical use. The employee has the right to expect this, and in using such implements, appliances, or machinery the employee has the right to, and may, rely upon it that the tools, implements, and machinery given and furnished to him by his employer to use in his business are such as are required by the law." This instruction was erroneous in declaring that the obligation upon the master required him to furnish such appliances "as combine the greatest safety with practical use." By this the jury were told that the appliances required must be such as in practical use will be found to afford the greatest safety,—that is, those appliances which from experience are found to combine all the provisions for safety that are capable of being used. The instruction is substantially the same as one given in the case of Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 599, 22 Pac. Rep. 266, which was approved by this court; but the circumstances which rendered such instruction proper in that case do not exist here. The court in that case was defining the duties of the proprietor of a passenger elevator, and likening them to the duties imposed upon the carrier of passengers, which require him to keep pace with modern improvement and invention, and adopt such newly-invented appliances as will secure the safety of those whom he carries. The relations of the defendant to the plaintiff in this case differ materially from those existing between the carrier and its passengers, for, instead of being in any respect an insurer of his safety, the defendant held to the plaintiff only the ordinary relations of a master to his servant. The relative liability of a carrier to its passengers and to its employees is stated by the court of appeals in New York in Warner v. Railroad Co., 39 N. Y. 471, as follows: "We are not now dealing, it must be remembered, with the liability which a railroad corporation assumes in respect to the safety and security of passengers transported on their road for a compensation, and in regard to whom they become absolute insurers against all defects which the highest degree of vigilance would detect or provide against. The liability here, if there is any, is measured by that lower standard which all the authorities recognize in the case of an employee, and which is answered if the care bestowed accords with that skill and prudence which men exercise in the transaction of their accustomed business."

The ground of the plaintiff's cause of action is negligence of the employer in failing to supply him with suitable appliances, with which to do the work for which he is employed. This liability of the master is based upon personal negligence,—that is, a negligence by himself or those to whom the matter has been delegated in the selection of suitable appliances for the use of the servant. He is not required to furnish appliances which are absolutely safe, nor is he bound to furnish the best that can possibly be obtained. He is, however, under obligation to exercise reasonable and ordinary diligence in their selection, and to furnish to his servant such as are reasonably safe, and adapted to perform the work for which they are designed, and which, with ordinary care and prudence on the part of the servant, render it reasonably probable that they can be used by him in the ordinary exercise of his employment without danger to himself. If the master has exercised proper care in their selection,—such care as a prudent man would exercise if his own person or life were exposed to the danger that would result from their use,—and has thereafter kept them in suitable condition and repair, he is not liable for an accident that may happen to the servant from their ordinary use. After the master has exercised this care, the incidental risks that result from the use of such appliances are assumed by the servant, and are supposed to have been taken into account in fixing the amount of his wages. Whether in any case the employer has been negligent in the selection or care of the appliances furnished by him to those in his service is a question of fact to be determined from all the circumstances and surroundings of that case. The burden is on the plaintiff to show some fault on the part of the master. The mere fact of the injury or accident does not raise a presumption of negligence; and, as his negligence is to be measured by his knowledge or means of knowledge, it must be shown that the master knew or had notice that the appliance was defective. It is not sufficient to show that there were better or safer ones to be had, but it must be shown that the one supplied had some radical fault, or that its use had become so generally obsolete, or supplanted by others of superior character, that its adoption or retention would itself indicate negligence. The master is not bound to adopt every latest improvement in machinery, nor is he liable for an accident which would not have occurred if such improvements had been adopted. If, at the time of its selection, the appliance in question was the only one in general use, or was the one which was generally used, and was reasonably adapted to the purpose for which it was employed, its selection or its subsequent retention would not of itself indicate negligence; nor would the fact that better ones were used by others, or that later devices had overcome defects that experience had shown this one possessed, be proof of negligence in the continuance of its use. Nor does the circumstance that the appliance has defects, which do not render it positively unsafe, indicate any negligence in its selection, unless it be also shown that when selected ordinary care would have either disclosed or could have obviated these defects. It is a well-settled rule that when an appliance or machine, not obviously dangerous, has been in daily use for a long time, and has uniformly proved safe and efficient, its use may be continued without the imputation of imprudence or carelessness. *Wonder v. "When a master employs a servant to do a particular kind of work with particular kinds of implements and machinery, the master does not agree that the implements and machinery are free from danger in their use, but he agrees that such implements and machinery to be used by such servant are sound and fit for the purpose intended, so far as ordinary care and prudence can discover, and that he will use ordinary care and prudence in keeping them in such condition and fitness; and the servant agrees that he will use such implements with care and prudence; and if, under such conditions and circumstances, harm or injury come to the servant, it must be ranked among the accidents, the risks of which the servant must be deemed to have assumed when he entered into such service." Railroad Co. v. McCormick, supra. "An employer is not bound to furnish for his workmen the 'safest' machinery, nor to provide the 'best methods' for its operation, in order to save himself from responsibility for accident resulting from its use. If the machinery be of an ordinary character, and such as can with reasonable care be used without danger to the employe, it is all that can be required from the employer. This is the limit of his responsibility, and the sum total of his duty." Payne v. Reese, supra. "A master is not bound to change his machinery in order to apply every new invention or supposed improvement in appliances; and he may even have in use a machine or an appliance for its operation shown to be less safe than another in general use, without being liable to his servants for the consequences of the use of it. If the servant thinks proper to operate such machine, it is at his own risk, and all that he can require is that he shall not be deceived as to the degree of danger that he incurs." Wonder v. Railroad Co., supra.

The error in giving the foregoing instruction was not obviated by the instruction subsequently given at the instance of the defendant, wherein the law applicable to the case was properly presented. The jury could not determine which of the two propositions was correct. They were bound to accept all the propositions that the court instructed them upon as a correct statement of the law by which they were to be guided; and, if the several instructions are inconsistent or contradictory, it is impossible to tell which was adopted by them in reaching their verdict. Brown v. McAllister, 39 Cal. 573; Chidester v. Ditch Co., 53 Cal. 56.

2. One McNally was called as a witness by plaintiff, and testified that he had worked for the defendant about two years, mostly as driver and conductor, commencing in July, 1887, and continuing until the latter part of March, 1889; and, having testified with reference to the different kinds of coupling-pin used by the defendant, was asked by the plaintiff the following question: "From your experience in driving those cars and using those pins, would you say that was a safe pin,—the straight pin?" The defendant objected to this interrogatory, upon the ground that no foundation had been laid therefor, and because it was not a proper subject for expert testimony. The objection was overruled, to which the defendant excepted, and the witness thereupon answered: "It is not safe, for the reason that there is nothing to hold it in the draw-head of the car. They are liable to work out or bulge out at most any time, and in that case the chances are that the horse gets away." The defendant's counsel thereupon moved to strike out the answer of the witness to the effect that the chances are that the horse gets away, upon the ground that the matter therein involved is not a proper subject for expert testimony, and that the answer was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The court overruled the objection, to which the defendant excepted. Section 1870, Code Civil Proc., (subd. 9,) provides that the opinion of a witness may be given "on a question of science, art, or trade, when he is skilled therein." The general rule, however, is that witnesses must testify to facts, and not to opinions, and that, whenever the question to be determined is the result of the common experience of all men of ordinary education, or is to be inferred from particular facts, the inference is to be drawn by the jury, and not by the witness. When the inquiry relates to a subject whose nature is not such as to require any peculiar habits or study in order to qualify one to understand it, or when all the facts upon which the opinion is founded can be ascertained and made intelligible to the court or jury, the opinion of the witness is not to be received in evidence. If the relation between the facts and their probable results can be determined without any special skill or training, the facts themselves must be given in evidence, and the conclusions or inferences must be drawn by the jury. If the circumstances out of which the negligence is said to arise have been established by proof, or can be shown, the ultimate fact of negligence is an inference to be drawn therefrom by the jury, and is not to be established by the opinions of others. Shaffer v. Evans, 53 Cal. 32; Enright v. Railroad Co., 33 Cal. 236; Ferguson v. Hubbell, 97 N. Y. 507; Hart v. Bridge Co., 84 N. Y. 56; City of Chicago v. McGiven, 78 Ill. 349; Glass Co. v. Lowell, 7 Cush. 321; White v. Ballou, 8 Allen, 408; Muldowney v. Railroad Co., 36 Iowa, 473. Whether this pin was "safe"—that is, unattended with personal risk to the driver—was an issue in the case for the jury to determine from all the circumstances that might be shown. All the facts upon which the opinion of the witness was founded could be readily laid before the jury, and they could draw the conclusion from these facts as readily and correctly as he. It required no special training or experience to determine whether a straight pin, put through the holes of the draw-head, was adapted to perform the duties for which it was intended. The pin, single-tree, and draw-head were all before the jury, and, as men of ordinary experience, they were capable of determining their sufficiency and safety. It required no peculiar education to determine the effect of the constant tension which the ordinary pulling of the horse would produce upon the pin while it was in the holes of the draw-head. It had been testified that while driving the car it had at times come out by working up under such tension, and it was open to their observation that it might work out, and the jury was capable of determining what would be the effect if it should come out. Whether, if it did come out, it was safe or unsafe, was a conclusion to be drawn by them, and the opinion of the witness was not to be substituted for theirs, nor was their verdict to be based upon his opinion. The fact that the court should allow the witness to give this testimony would of necessity have great weight with the jury, and have a tendency to overcome any doubt they might entertain as to the capacity of the pin, thus prejudicing the defendant by giving to the jury this inadmissible evidence as a ground for their verdict.

3. Against the objections of the defendant the court permitted the plaintiff to offer testimony that shortly after the accident the defendant caused the straight pin to be replaced by the safety-pin upon its several cars. There are some authorities, chiefly in Pennsylvania, which hold that evidence of this kind is admissible as being an admission by the defendant of his negligence in not having previously provided appliances of a suitable character; but the weight of authority is against its admissibility, and the reasons urged in its favor do not commend themselves to our judgment. The employer is chargeable with negligence in this regard only upon proof that he knew or had notice that the appliance which he had furnished was unsafe or unsuitable to its purpose, and it might be that the very accident which gave occasion for the suit first brought to his notice the defect or insecurity of the appliance. If, however, it be held that the fact of his immediately seeking to obviate this defect, or remove this insecurity, by a change in the character of the appliance, is evidence that the accident resulted from his negligence, we would have the contradiction of imputing to him a knowledge of such defect prior to the occurring of the accident, which he did not acquire until after the accident had occurred. The negligence of the employer, which renders him responsible for the accident, depends upon what he did and knew before the accident, and must be established by facts and circumstances which preceded it, and not by acts done by him after its occurrence. The knowledge on his part from which negligence is to be inferred must be established by evidence, independent of any subsequent act in changing the appliance; and any defect in such evidence cannot be supplemented by such act. It would be unjust to hold that, because the employer seeks by all the aid he gets from the light of experience to make his implement free from danger, he is therefore to be charged with negligence in the use of all prior appliances, even though they were adopted with the best light then under his control. We have seen that the employer is not chargeable with negligence merely because he does not adopt every new invention immediately upon its production, but the rule contended for by the appellant would make such adoption an admission that he was negligent prior thereto, although the improvement may have been for the first time thus brought to his knowledge, and its adoption may have had no connection with the accident. Such a rule puts an unfair interpretation on human conduct, and virtually holds out an inducement for continued negligence. It would be a harsh rule to hold that in all cases of accident resulting from defective appliances the employer is to be held accountable for a negligence which is established solely by his efforts to avoid its recurrence; that precautions taken subsequent to an accident are admissions that he was previously negligent. He may have exercised all the care which the law requires, and yet, in the light of a new experience, after an unexpected accident has occurred, he may adopt additional safeguards. To hold that the adoption of such new appliances, which experience has demonstrated are more efficient than those previously in use, or which invention has developed from observing the defects in those originally adopted, shall be an admission that he was negligent prior thereto, would prevent the very conduct in employers which they should be urged to follow. Nalley v. Carpet Co., 51 Conn. 524; Morse v. Railway Co., 30 Minn. 465, 16 N. W. Rep. 358; Corcoran v. Peekskill, 108 N. Y. 151, 15 N. E. Rep. 309. This subject and the authorities bearing thereon are very fully discussed in Nalley v. Carpet Co., supra, in which the court uses the following language: "The fact that an accident has happened, and some person has been injured, immediately puts a party on a higher plane of diligence and duty, from which he acts with a view of preventing the possibility of a similar accident, which should operate to commend, rather than to condemn, the person so acting. If the subsequent act is made to reflect back upon the prior one, although it is done upon the theory that it is a mere admission, yet it virtually introduces into the transaction a new element and test of negligence, which has no business there, not being in existence at the time." For these errors the judgment of the court below and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

HINCKLEY et al. v. FIELD'S BISCUIT & CRACKER CO. et al. (No. 13,230.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 10, 1891.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—"OWNERS" OF PROPERTY—WHO ARE CONTRACTORS.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183, relative to mechanics' liens, provides that, if the amount of a written contract between the "owner" and his "contractor" exceeds $1,000, the contract must be filed with the county recorder; otherwise it shall be wholly void. Held, that a trustee who holds the legal title to land under a contract whereby he is to build a factory on the land, and then convey the whole property to the cestui que trust, is the "owner," within section 1183, though he has already received the consideration of the contract.

2. A person who agrees to set up a steam plant in a factory under a written contract is not a "contractor" within section 1183, where the only work to be done on the premises is incidental to the delivery of the machinery and placing it in position.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by one Hinckley and another against Field's Biscuit & Cracker Company and another to enforce a mechanic's lien. Demurrer to the complaint sustained. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. H. H. Hart, (Aylett R. Cotton, of counsel,) for appellants. Pillsbury & Blanding, R. Percy Wright, and Willard T. Barton, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. In the court below a demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment thereupon entered in favor of the defendants. The plaintiffs appeal.

The question to be considered here is whether the ruling of the court in sustaining the demurrer was correct. The demurrer was upon the general ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and also for ambiguity. The allegations of the complaint, so far as necessary to be stated, are: That on February 28, 1887, the defendant Field was the owner of record of the land upon which stands the building against which it is sought to enforce the lien, but that he held the same in trust for the Field's Biscuit & Cracker Company, a defendant herein; that upon that day said Field entered into a contract with said company, whereby, in consideration of the issuance to him of 800 shares of its capital stock, he agreed to complete and deliver to the company, equipped and furnished with the latest improvements, a factory, to be under his direction, constructed on said land, and, as soon as completed, the same, with its appurtenances, to be conveyed to it; that immediately after the execution of this contract the company issued and delivered to Field 800 shares of its capital stock in full payment for said land and for the building and machinery to be constructed thereon by him, and on November 5, 1887, the said Field conveyed to the company the land and improvements thereon. The complaint further avers that upon April 11, 1887, the said Field, "as such contractor of and for the said defendant Field's Biscuit and Cracker Company, employed plaintiffs herein to build, manufacture, and construct at their own works, and deliver and put in place upon foundations prepared by said Arthur Field in said structure, building, and factory," a steam plant, consisting of boilers, engine, heater, feed-pipes, etc., for the agreed price of $5,600, and that said contract was duly performed by plaintiffs. It is not alleged that this contract was recorded, but it is averred that the agreement between Field and the Field's Biscuit & Cracker Company was never recorded. Plaintiff's claim of lien was filed for record within the time given by law. The respondents insist that Field was the owner of the property upon which a lien is claimed at the time he contracted with plaintiffs to furnish for said factory the steam plant referred to in the complaint; and, as the price agreed upon to be paid therefor exceeded $1,000, and the contract was not recorded, that the contract was wholly void, under section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and no recovery can be had by plaintiffs thereunder.

1. Section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "mechanics, materialmen, contractors, subcontractors, artisans, architects, machinists," etc., shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials; and, "in case of a contract for the work between the reputed owner and his contractor, the lien shall extend to the entire contract price, and such contract shall operate as a lien in favor of all persons except the contractor to the extent of the whole contract price; and, after all such liens are satisfied, then as a lien for any balance of the contract price in favor of the contractor." The section then provides that all such contracts (that is, those between the owner and his contractor) shall be in writing when the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds $1,000, and before work is commenced thereunder must be filed in the office of the recorder of the proper county; "otherwise they shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto." The position assumed by respondents in support of their demurrer rests upon these two propositions: (1) That Field was the owner of the building he was constructing; and (2) that plaintiffs were contractors within the meaning of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, —and the failure to sustain either is fatal to the judgment appealed from. We agree with respondents upon the first point, that Field was the owner, and not a contractor, as that word is used in the section of the Code just referred to. His relation to the Field's Biscuit & Cracker Company was that of vendor, and the factory was constructed for himself, that he might convey it, and the land upon which it stood, in accordance with his agreement to do so. It is very true that the Field's Biscuit & Cracker Company was the equitable owner, having paid the agreed price therefor, but, as the building was erected by its consent, and under agreement that its vendor should retain the legal title until its completion, he was, for all practical purposes pertaining to its construction, the owner within the meaning of the law relating to mechanics' liens, and the equitable estate was equally bound with the legal title to satisfy the liens of mechanics or material-men, growing out of contracts made with him in the construction of the building.

2. But, assuming this to be so, the question still remains, were the plaintiffs contractors, as that word is used in section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where it speaks of a "contract for the work between the owner and his contractor?" If so, their contract, not having been recorded, was wholly void, and the demurrer was properly sustained. We are of the opinion that upon the facts alleged plaintiffs were not such contractors, but were material-men. Although one may furnish materials to be used in the construction of a building under an express contract, he does not become a contractor, as that term is used in the law relating to mechanics' liens. That law recognizes a clear distinction between contractors, subcontractors, material-men, and mechanics, and these different words to designate distinct classes of persons. All are referred to as being entitled to liens, and the priority of their several liens is declared; and it is quite clear to us that the word "contractor," in sections 1183 and 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, does not refer to a material-man. The section, in requiring the contract "between the owner and his contractor" to be in writing, and recorded, has for its object the giving of notice of the terms of the contract to those who may be employed by or furnish materials to the contractor in the course of its performance, so as to enable them to judge whether the contract price to which they have a right to look for their security is sufficient for that purpose. But the reason for giving this notice does not apply to the case of one who contracts only to furnish materials, as his employees have no lien upon the price which he is to receive therefor, and for that reason the statute does not require that contracts under which materials are furnished shall be in writing and recorded. And this view of the law is sustained by the reasoning of Mr. Justice SHARPSTEIN, in the case of Sparks v. Mining Co., 55 Cal. 392, in defining the words "original contractor," as found in section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In this case there can be no doubt that the plaintiffs were simply material-men. Under their contract they were to manufacture at their own shop the boiler, engine, heater, feed-pipes, and necessary attachments, and deliver them finished and complete, and properly set them in the building; but the work done by them on the premises of defendants in placing them in position was only the completion of their contract to deliver such finished machinery, and did not convert them into contractors for the erection of the factory, or any part of it, within the true intent of the statute. The contract was essentially one to furnish materials for the factory, and not a building contract.

3. What has been said disposes of the second ground of demurrer, to the effect that the contract was void because not complying with section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as that section only refers to the contract of the contractor.

4. We do not think the complaint is ambiguous in the respects pointed out by the demurrer. We are satisfied that the complaint states a cause of action, and if the defendants have any defense to the action it is not disclosed by the complaint. In reaching this conclusion we have not overlooked the fact that the plaintiffs allege in general terms that Field was a contractor, and as such contracted with plaintiffs. But the complaint avers specifically all the facts in regard to the ownership of the property, and the relation to it of defendants Field and the Field's Biscuit & Cracker Company, and the allegation that Field was contractor may be disregarded. Judgment reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrers interposed by defendants.

We concur: MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

PEOPLE v. AH JAKE. (No. 20,738.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 8, 1891.)

HOMICIDE — INSTRUCTIONS — BURDEN OF PROOF — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

1. In a prosecution for murder the court instructed that the burden of proof was on the defendant to show the absence of malice, unless the prosecution "shows that the crime only amounted to manslaughter, or that defendant was justifiable or excusable." Held, that while, standing alone, the instruction ignored the question of mitigating circumstances which may have been proved, yet, as the charge as a whole stated the law correctly, and that the evidence of the prosecution "tends to show" manslaughter, it was not erroneous.

2. The court instructed that "when the people rely upon circumstantial evidence to convict the defendant, every link in the chain of circumstances, necessary to a conviction, must be established by the people to a moral certainty, and beyond all reasonable doubt." Held that, where the instruction covered the subject-matter of a special instruction asked for, relating to the particular facts in the case, it was not error to refuse to give the special instruction.

3. Where the evidence upon which defendant was convicted is unsatisfactory, but was substantially conflicting, the verdict will not be disturbed on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to support it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; EDWIN SHEARER, Judge.

Prosecution against Ah Jake for murder. Verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree, and judgment thereon. Defendant moved for a new trial, which being denied, he appeals from the judgment and the order denying the motion. Affirmed.

Gillis & Tapsgott, for appellant. I. A. Reynolds and Att. Gen. Hart, for the People.

FITZGERALD, C. The defendant, who was accused by information of the crime of murder, was convicted of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state-prison for the term of 13 years. This appeal is taken from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The errors complained of relate to the rulings of the court upon the admission and rejection of testimony against the objections and exceptions of the defendant, and upon the giving of the second instruction for the people and the refusal of the fourth instruction asked for by the defendant.

The first of these instructions is claimed to be erroneous on the ground "that it does not state the law correctly," and the objection is especially urged against that part of it which reads as follows: "The burden of proof will be thrown on the defendant to show the absence or want of malice unless the proof on the part of the prosecution shows that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable." While it is true that this isolated instruction ignores the circumstances of mitigation which may have been proved on the part of the prosecution, tending to show "that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable," yet the charge of the court must be considered as a whole, and when so considered, will be found, as we think, to state the law correctly, and to be clearly applicable to the facts of the case. The words "tends to show" were twice used in this same connection by the court in other portions of its charge to the jury.

The fourth instruction asked by the defendant, and refused by the court, is as follows: "Where circumstantial evidence is depended on by the people to convict a defendant, it is necessary for them to establish every link in the chain of circumstances, beyond all reasonable doubt, and to the entire satisfaction of the jury. Therefore, if the jury believe from the testimony that one of the necessary links in the necessary chain of circumstances in this case was that the deceased was killed without any club in his hand, then, before you can convict the defendant, you must be entirely satisfied that the deceased at the time he was killed had no club in his hand; and if you should find that he did have a club in his hand at the time he was killed then you will acquit the defendant, or if you should be in reasonable doubt as to whether or not he had a club in his hand at the time he was killed, then you will give the defendant the benefit of the doubt and acquit him. Or if you should find that one of the necessary links in the chain of circumstances necessary to convict in this case was that the defendant was seen running away from the deceased at the time of the killing, then you will have to be satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that the witness Sing was the party who was in the house at the time of the killing, and who ran to the door immediately after the killing, and that he is the party who ran down to the claim and gave the alarm, and that he was not in the claim at the time of the shooting; or if you have any doubts as to his being the said party,—then you should give the defendant the benefit of the doubt and acquit him." This instruction was properly refused, as the subject-matter thereof was given to the jury in instruction No. 9, to-wit: "When the people rely upon circumstantial evidence to convict the defendant, every link in the chain of circumstances, necessary to a conviction, must be established by the people to a moral certainty, and beyond all reasonable doubt." It was for the jury to decide whether or not any special piece of evidence or circumstance was a necessary link in the chain, and, if decided that such evidence or circumstance was a necessary link, then the instruction just quoted plainly told them that to their minds as jurors such link must be established to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt. The exceptions taken by appellant to the rulings of the court upon the admission and rejection of evidence, and assigned as error, are very numerous; but, as they are either harmless or untenable, we do not deem it necessary to notice them. We are constrained to say, however, that the evidence upon which the defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the second degree is not to our entire satisfaction, but, as it is on the whole substantially conflicting, the verdict, under the well-established rule of the court, will not be disturbed on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support it. We therefore recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

GRANT V. OLIVER. (No. 13,104.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 12, 1891.)

LOST DEED—PRELIMINARY PROOF—ACKNOWLEDGMENT—MEXICAN GRANT—RECITAL IN PATENT.

1. The record of a deed could not properly be received in an action tried in 1888 without the preliminary proof then required by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1951, which provided that a certified copy of the record of an instrument affecting real estate, duly acknowledged, may be read in evidence with like effect as the original, on proof by affidavit or otherwise that the original is not in the possession or under the control of the party producing the certified copy; the preliminary proof having been dispensed with by an amendment of section 1951 in 1889.

2. Where the execution of a deed is proved, and there is no question of actual or constructive notice involved, it is immaterial that the certificate of acknowledgment was not made by the notary until two years after the acknowledgment was taken, since the deed would be valid as between the parties without such certificate.

3. The fact that the lands on which a homestead claim was filed were within the exterior limits of a private Mexican grant will not invalidate the claim where it appears that the grant was a float, which was finally so located within such limits as to exclude the land claimed.

4. Where the land department has jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter, its determination of their rights is final.

5. An offer by defendant to show that the land in controversy was within the exterior boundaries of a Mexican grant when the declaratory statement of plaintiff's grantor was presented, and not, therefore, subject to homestead entry, was properly excluded as too indefinite.

6. A recital in a patent that plaintiff's claim to the land in controversy was established "pursuant to the act of congress of May 20, 1862, to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain, and the acts supplemental thereto," does not impose on him the burden of showing that the homestead was not acquired under laws requiring actual settlement and residence by the claimant.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; NOBLE HAMILTON, Judge.

Action by Grant against Oliver to recover possession of real estate. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. W. Ashby, (Thompson & Thompson, of counsel,) for appellant. Moore & Reed, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to recover the possession of 80 acres of land situated in the county of Alameda. The answer denies all the allegations of the complaint. Defendant filed a cross-complaint, setting forth that he settled on the lands in controversy with his family, claiming the same under the pre-emption laws of the United States, prior to July 8, 1878, and continuously since that date has resided and made valuable improvements thereon. The defendant then proceeds to show that Thomas' application for a homestead was filed at a time when the lands in controversy were not subject to sale under the land laws of the United States because they were within the exterior boundaries of a Mexican grant; but, notwithstanding this fact, the claim of Thomas, plaintiff's grantor, was approved by the officers of the land department, in violation of law. It is alleged that the name of Thomas was fraudulently used for the benefit of one Benson, and that the commissioner of the general land-office and the secretary of the interior, in violation of the legal and equitable claim of the defendant, neglected to read, examine, or weigh the evidence taken before them on appeal from the decision of the register and receiver, awarding the land to Thomas, and without an examination of the record signed and filed written opinions adverse to the claim of defendant, which had been compiled and fabricated by clerks and subordinates. It is further alleged that Thomas never executed any power of attorney to Dey, who as attorney in fact executed and delivered to the plaintiff the deed upon which he relies. The prayer is that plaintiff take nothing by this action; that the patent from the United States to Thomas be declared void, and that, upon defendant making payment to the receiver of $200, the purchase price of the land in controversy, the president of the United States be required to issue and deliver to him a patent for the land.

There is no merit in the cross-complaint, and the plaintiff's demurrer to the same was properly sustained. There is nothing in the cross-complaint which takes the case out of the general rule that the action of the land department, acting within the scope of its authority, is binding. The land in controversy was within the jurisdiction of the land-officers; the merits of the defendant's claim were presented to the commissioner of the general land-office on appeal from the decision of the register and receiver awarding the lands to Thomas, and to the secretary of the interior on appeal from the decision of the commissioner, and both of those officers decided adversely to the claim. On July 8, 1878, the official plat of the township was filed in the land-office of the district in which the lands were situated; and on that day the application of Thomas for an additional homestead was filed with the register and receiver. Defendant's pre-emption claim was filed July 12, 1878. It is alleged that the lands were not subject to sale under the laws of the United States when Thomas' application was filed, because they were "within the granted and confirmed exterior boundaries of the well-known private Mexican grant, Laguna de los Palos Colorados;" but subsequent allegations show that on appeal to the circuit court from the decree of confirmation entered in the district court the grant was held to be a float of three square leagues, and no more, and that it did not attach to any specific land until it was located by the surveyor within the exterior boundaries of the larger tract described, and the survey was finally approved by the officers of the land department. The decree of the circuit court was entered December 4, 1874, and the field-notes and plat of the survey were approved by the commissioner of the general land-office in April, 1878, and by the secretary of the interior on August 10, 1878. The land in controversy was excluded from the survey. The grant being a float, only the quantity actually granted was reserved during the examination as to the validity of the grant, "the remainder was at the disposal of the government as part of the public domain." U. S. v. McLaughlin, 127 U. S. 428, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1177.

The allegations of the cross-complaint with respect to the conduct of the officers of the land department are so absurd that we do not deem it necessary to notice them. If they were true, and could be proved, the defendant would not be entitled to the relief he claims in this action.

It is claimed that defendant's continuous possession of the land from a date prior to the filing of the homestead claim on behalf of Thomas prevented the initiation or acquisition of any homestead claim. These are matters, however, which the land department heard, considered, and determined. That department of the government had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the persons, and its adjudication is final. It is not a case of an entire want of power, like the cases cited by appellant.

The patent from the United States to Thomas recites that the claim of Thomas to the land was established "pursuant to the act of congress approved the 20th of May, 1862, 'to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain,' and the acts supplemental thereto." If the homestead was acquired under section 2306, Rev. St. U. S., as the defendant states in his cross-complaint, the court did not err in overruling the objection to the power of attorney, and the title of Thomas passed by the deed from his attorney in fact to plaintiff. Rose v. Lumber Co., 73 Cal. 385, 15 Pac. Rep. 19. While we cannot consider the matters alleged in the cross-complaint in determining whether the court erred, we may safely assume, as the case must be reversed on another point, that defendant has stated the facts correctly. Furthermore, "pursuant to the act of congress approved May 20, 1862, * * * and the acts supplemental thereto," is a general recital, which doubtless was intended to cover all the acts of congress relating to homesteads. Certainly the recital did not throw upon the plaintiff the burden of showing that the homestead was not initiated and acquired under the laws requiring actual settlement and residence by the claimant.

The offer of the defendant to prove "that this property was within the exterior boundaries of a Mexican grant at the time of the presentation of a declaratory statement by Thomas," was properly rejected. Assuming that a patent can be attacked under the general issue of ownership in actions of this kind, the offer was too uncertain and indefinite to entitle it to consideration. If the Mexican grant was a float, as defendant has shown it to be in the cross-complaint, which was put out of the pleadings on demurrer, the fact he offered to show could have no effect. Standing alone it was immaterial.

Plaintiff, at the trial, offered in evidence the record of the deed from Thomas and wife, by Dey, their attorney in fact, to plaintiff. The county recorder was called as a witness, and identified the book as a record of his office. Defendant objected to the admission of the evidence on the ground that the original deed had not been accounted for, and on the further ground that the certificate of acknowledgment showed that the deed was acknowledged on August 24, 1885, and the certificate of the notary was not made until October 11, 1887. We do not think that the second ground of the objection stated was well taken. If the original deed had been offered in evidence, and its execution had been proved, as it was proved by the testimony of the notary and Dey, it would have been immaterial if there had been no certificate of acknowledgment whatever; the deed would be valid as between Thomas and the plaintiff, and there is no question of notice, actual or constructive, involved in the transaction. We think, however, that the court erred in admitting the record in evidence without proof of the loss of the original, or the inability of the plaintiff to produce it. In 1889 the legislature amended section 1951, Code Civil Proc., so as to permit proof of a private writing, acknowledged or proved by the introduction of the original record of such writing, "without further proof;" but at the time this action was tried—April 18, 1888—such a record was admissible in evidence only "on proof, by affidavit or otherwise, that the original is not in the possession or under the control of the party producing the certified copy." Sections 1919, 1920, Code Civil Proc., cited by respondent, are not in point. They relate to proof of public writings. Where a private writing is required for any purpose to be recorded, proof of the public recordation may be made by the introduction in evidence of the record itself, or by a certified copy thereof, under section 1919, supra; but proof of the writing itself, where there is a question as to its existence or validity, must be made in the manner required by section 1951. Sections 1919 and 1920 have been in the Code from the time of its adoption. Section 1951 was added as a new section in 1874. Before the adoption of the new section—1951—in 1874, it was held that section 1919 applied to cases of this kind. Vance v. Kohlberg, 50 Cal. 348. As section 1951 applies specifically to "every instrument conveying or affecting real property, acknowledged or proved and certified," it is apparent that it was intended to change the rule laid down in the case cited. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

DYER v. LEACH et al. (No. 13,844.)

TRUSTEE—NOTICE OF APPOINTMENT—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

1. Civil Code Cal. § 2287, provides that the "superior court may appoint a trustee whenever there is a vacancy and the declaration of trust does not provide a practical method of appointment." Held, that notice of an appointment by the court to fill a vacancy occasioned by the death of a trustee in a deed of trust was within the discretion of the court, and failure to give such notice to the trustor did not invalidate a sale by the trustee so appointed.

2. Whether the trial court erred in excluding the pleadings in another action will not be considered on appeal, where the nature of the action and the parties to it are not shown.

Action of ejectment by O. T. Dyer against George Leach and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Paris & Fox and W. J. McIntyre, for appellants. H. C. Hibbard and Curtis & Otis, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Action of ejectment to recover a certain tract of land. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

George Leach, being the owner of the land in question, executed a deed of trust of the same to E. Conway, trustee. The object of the trust was to secure a promissory note for $3,358, made by Leach to the Riverside Banking Company, as well as certain other moneys. It was provided in the deed that, if the money should not be paid when due, the trustee should sell the land, after notice, and in the manner provided therein, and execute a deed to the purchaser. It also provides that there shall be a trustee assessor of said Conway, in case of the death, resignation, or removal of the latter; but it does not provide for the manner in which such successor shall be appointed. Afterwards said Conway died; and, the money secured by the trust being due and unpaid, said banking company made written application to the superior court for the appointment of a trustee, and the court appointed as such trustee H. C. Hibbard. Hibbard proceeded under the trust and sold and conveyed the land to one Rosenthal, who conveyed to plaintiff Dyer. The defendants, other than Leach, are persons who claim parts of the land under him.

It is not contended by appellants that Hibbard did not sell the land in accordance with the deed of trust, or that he in any way violated it. It is contended, however, that all proceedings by him, and his sale of the land, were invalid, because his appointment was made by the superior court without notice to the trustor, Leach, or his grantees. It does not appear that any injustice has been done, and the point seems to be entirely technical. As the attack made here upon the order of the court appointing Hibbard trustee is collateral, it cannot be successful unless such order is absolutely void. But we do not think it void. The current of authorities is to the point that in such a case it is discretionary with the court what, if any, notice shall be given. Our Code requires no notice. Section 2287 of the Civil Code provides that "the superior court may appoint a trustee whenever there is a vacancy, and the declaration of trust does not provide a practical method of appointment." Section 2251 provides that "the mutual consent of a trustor and trustee creates a trust of which the beneficiary may take advantage at any time prior to its rescission." Section 2252 provides that "when a trustee is appointed by a court * * * such court * * * is the trustor within the meaning of the last section." These are the only provisions applicable to the question to which our attention has been called. The theory of the law is that upon the death of the trustee the trust vests in the court, and, in the absence of a statutory provision, notice is not necessary to confer jurisdiction. In Milbank v. Crane, 25 How. Pr. 193, it is said that the jurisdiction in such a case is "a quasi jurisdiction in rem, a power over the trust, and is not acquired by the service of process upon the cestui que trust or other person interested in the trust fund or its preservation. It is undoubtedly proper and usual in most cases to call those more immediately interested before the court, that they may be heard in the appointment of a new trustee; but this is in the discretion of the court. * * * This being so, the appointment of the new trustee is valid, even though it should be thought to be irregular, or even improvident or indiscreet, to make the appointment without formal notice to and summons to those interested." To the same point are the cases of Hawley v. Ross, 7 Paige, Ch. 103, and In re Robinson, 37 N. Y. 261. We have considered the point upon the theory that no notice was given of Hibbard's appointment, but it is doubtful if the record shows such want of notice.

Appellants contend that the court erred in sustaining an objection to their offer to introduce the pleadings in a certain action entitled "Riverside Banking Company vs. George Leach et als.;" the objection made being that it was not between the same parties and was irrelevant and incompetent; that there was no lis pendens, etc. As to this point it is sufficient to say that there is nothing in the record to show the character of that action, what it was about, or who the parties were. There are no other points necessary to be noticed. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

CARTY v. CONNOLLY. (No. 14,340.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 3, 1891.)

SETTING ASIDE DEED — CONSTRUCTIVE FRAUD — CAPACITY OF GRANTOR — CONSIDERATION.

1. In an action to set aside a deed for inadequacy of consideration it may be shown in defense that the consideration was different in kind from that recited therein.

2. A few days before her death, the grantor, in consideration of natural affection, executed a deed to her brother to all of a tract of land in which he owned an equitable half interest, the title being in her name, in order that he might then and there acquire an indefeasible title thereto. There was no expressed reservation in the deed or otherwise of any right in the property conditioned on the grantor's recovery or otherwise, nor any restriction as to its operation. Held, that it was not a gift causa mortis.

3. Where the grantor, at the time of executing a deed to her brother, was in full possession of her faculties, understood what she was doing, made the deed voluntarily and without persuasion or coercion, and because of her uninfluenced desire to do so, the deed will not be deemed constructively fraudulent as to other brothers and sisters because the grantor was in a weak physical condition, and the deed transferred all of her property to the brother then living with her, to the injury of the others, who resided at a distance.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. WADE, Judge.

Action by Ellen Carty against Patrick Connolly to set aside a deed executed by Mary Connolly to defendant. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Foote and Henley, Swift & Rigby,

(James D. Thorton, of counsel,) for appellant. S. M. White, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an equitable action by the plaintiff, a sister of the defendant, asking that a certain deed to the premises described in the complaint be set aside upon the ground that at the time it was executed by Mary Connolly, another sister of defendant, she was acting under undue influence, and was also of such feeble mind as to be unable to understand the nature of the transaction. Upon August 26, 1887, Mary Connolly sustained serious injuries from an accidental burning, from which injuries her death resulted upon the 13th day of the following month. The deceased and her brother Patrick, the defendant, had resided upon the land in dispute for many years, and it had been acquired by their mutual efforts. The legal title to the entire property was vested in Mary, though Patrick had paid for one-half of it, and was the equitable owner thereof. At the time of the transfer to Patrick, which was the 7th day of September, a mortgage rested upon the property in the sum of $14,000, which by the terms of the deed the respondent assumed to pay. The value of the realty was $56,000, and there was no pecuniary consideration for the transfer other than the assumption of the payment of the aforesaid mortgage. The deceased died intestate, and the plaintiff is one of the heirs at law. Findings of fact were entered in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff has appealed from the judgment and order denying her motion for a new trial.

The grounds upon which she relies to set aside this conveyance are (1) constructive fraud; (2) undue influence. Constructive fraud is defined by section 1573 of the Civil Code to consist "(1) in any breach of duty which, without an actual fraudulent intent, gives an advantage to the person in fault, or any one claiming under him, by misleading another to his prejudice, or to the prejudice of any one claiming under him; or, (2) in any such act or omission as the law specially declares to be fraudulent, without respect to actual fraud." The foregoing definition is in substantial accord with the views of standard authors upon the question. Appellant insists that constructive fraud is apparent in this transaction from the gross inadequacy of the consideration. The pecuniary consideration recited in the deed is five dollars, and, if we understand appellant's position, it is that, where a deed is attacked upon the ground of inadequacy of consideration, the party in defense of the deed will not be allowed to show the true consideration to be love and affection; or in other words a consideration different in specie cannot be proved. There is no merit in appellant's position upon this point, and the case of Coles v. Soulsby, 21 Cal. 81, cited in her brief, is conclusive against her. In that case, referring to this identical question, the court says: "It is not a valid objection to the admissibility of the evidence that it showed a consideration different from that expressed in the deed. The consideration clause of a deed is not conclusive. It estops the grantor from alleging that he executed the deed without consideration. It cannot be contradicted, so as to defeat the operation of the conveyance according to the purposes therein designated, unless it be on the ground of fraud; but with this exception it is open to explanation, and may be varied by parol proof. A limitation, it is true, is placed by some adjudicated cases upon the character of the proof admitted; that it must be restricted to establishing a consideration of the same species with that expressed, (citing cases.) The limitation, however, does not appear to rest upon any sound principle." In addition, it might be added, the defendant, grantee in the deed, assumed the payment of a $14,000 mortgage, and a promise to pay the debt due from the grantor to a third party is a valuable consideration. Gladwin v. Garrison, 13 Cal. 332; Saunderson v. Broadwell, 82 Cal. 133, 23 Pac. Rep. 36. The trial court found that the consideration for the deed to defendant was love and affection, and the assumption of the aforesaid mortgage. There is nothing, either in the facts or the law, to undermine the force and effect of such finding.

Appellant insists that the deed is of a testamentary character, and is inoperative unless proved as a will; in other words, the transaction was in the nature of a donatio causa mortis,—and insists that the following allegation of respondent's answer is an admission to that effect: "That on the 7th day of September, 1887, said deceased, believing that an injury from which she was then suffering would terminate fatally, and for the purpose of fully conveying to this defendant all of the interest in said property which was his as a matter of right, and for the purpose of further vesting in him all her interest in said property, did, in consideration of the premises, and in view of the circumstances surrounding said deceased and this defendant, make, execute, and deliver to defendant a grant," etc. We have serious doubts whether the complaint is broad enough to justify such proof. The theory of the complaint is that the deceased had not sufficient mental capacity to make the deed, and was acting under undue influence at the time, and no intimation can be found in any allegation thereof that the delivery of the deed was incomplete, or that the transfer was in the nature of a gift causa mortis, or that the instrument was intended as a will; but, aside from that, this allegation of the answer does not justify the effect insisted upon by appellant, and certainly is not sufficient to raise the implication that, in case of a recovery from such illness, the deed was to be void, or, in case of death, the instrument was to be deemed and treated as a last will and testament. The authorities are not in line with such conclusion, and we might advance our position to the point of saying that we know of no reason, either in equity or law, why a person of perfect mental capacity, acting freely and voluntarily, who is sick with mortal illness, is not entirely competent to make a voluntary conveyance of his property as fully and completely as when experiencing the enjoyments of perfect health, even though such conveyance should seem to the world unreasonable, unjust, and unnatural. It is not a question of physical condition, of pain or absence of pain, of long life or short life, but it is a question of mental capacity, and the free and untrammelled action of the mind. Those are the ultimate facts; and the belief existing in the grantor's mind that he is suffering from a mortal illness is but an incident throwing whatever light it may possess upon the true solution of the ultimate facts, and the power and brightness of that light will fluctuate with the varied circumstances and surroundings of each particular case. The findings of the court are full and complete, and upon this branch of the case, under present investigation, the court found "she [meaning the grantor] executed said deed to said defendant in consideration of the love and affection she bore him, and because it was her will and wish that he should own in fee-simple the whole of the property therein described, and that he should then and there acquire an indefeasible title thereto;" and again, the court found "there was no expressed reservation, either in said deed or by words used at the time of delivery, or prior or subsequent to the execution thereof, of any right in or to the property conveyed conditioned upon the grantor's recovery or otherwise." Nor was there any restriction of any character with reference to the operation of said deed, but the same was, upon being executed, duly delivered to defendant, and accepted by him, and the title to all the property therein described did thereupon vest in said defendant." The foregoing findings are fully supported by the evidence and completely dispose of this question, although, if authority were necessary, the case of Mowry v. Heney, 86 Cal. 471, 25 Pac. Rep. 17, and the authorities therein cited, conclude the subject.

If we clearly understand appellant's third position, it is that constructive fraud should be inferred in this case from the fact of the physical weakness of the deceased at and prior to the date of the deed; that she transferred all her property to the one brother who was living with her at the time, to the injury of brothers and sisters who were residing in distant places; indeed, that constructive fraud should be inferred from the conditions and relations of the immediate parties to the transaction. The law upon this subject of constructive fraud, so far as it bears upon the questions involved in this case, is clearly and concisely stated in 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 928: "The fact that a conveyance or other transaction was made without professional advice or consultation with friends, and was improvident, even coupled with an inadequacy of price, is not of itself a sufficient ground for relief, provided the parties were both able to judge and act independently, and did act upon equal terms, and fully understood the nature of the transaction, and there was no undue influence or circumstance of oppression. When the accompanying incidents are inequitable, and show bad faith, such as concealments, misrepresentations, undue advantage, oppression on the part of the one who obtains the benefit, or ignorance, weakness of mind, sickness, old age, incapacity, pecuniary necessities, and the like on the part of the other, these circumstances, combined with inadequacy of price, may easily induce a court to grant relief, defensive or affirmative. It would not be correct to say that such facts constitute an absolute and necessary ground for equitable interposition. They operate to throw the heavy burden of proof upon the party seeking to enforce the transaction or claiming the benefits of it, to show that the other acted voluntarily, knowingly, intentionally, and deliberately, with full knowledge of the nature and effects of his acts, and that his consent was not obtained by any oppression, undue influence, or undue advantage taken of his condition, situation, or necessities. If the party upon whom the burden rested should succeed in thus showing the perfect good faith in the transaction, it would be sustained; if he should fail, equity would grant such relief, affirmative or defensive, as might be appropriate." In this case the court found, among other things: "The deceased, at the time of the execution of the deed last named, was in full possession of her mental faculties, and thoroughly understood what she was doing; made said deed voluntarily, and without any solicitation, coercion, influence, or persuasion; nor was said deceased, at the time of the making of said deed, or ever, under the control or dominion of this defendant or of any one, nor under any duress or fear occasioned by or through him, or otherwise, but she was at such time perfectly free, and knew she was perfectly free, to do what she wanted, and she did make said deed acting for herself, and because it was her uninfluenced desire so to do." There were other findings of a similar import, and they were all supported by the evidence, which largely preponderated in their favor. Under the law as laid down by Pomeroy, supra, when taken in connection with the findings of the court, which are warranted by the evidence, we conclude that the element of constructive fraud is no longer in the case, and as to actual fraud in the matter of undue influence the record fails to disclose it either in the evidence or findings. We have examined the errors of law relied upon by appellant as having occurred during the progress of the trial, and find them not well taken. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

ATTACHING MORTGAGED PROPERTY—LIABILITY OF SHERIFF—DAMAGES.

1. Under Civil Code Cal. §§ 2968, 2969, which provide that an officer cannot attach mortgaged personal property at the suit of a creditor of the mortgagor without first tendering to the mortgagee, or depositing for him, with the county clerk or treasurer, the amount due on the mortgage, a sheriff, who, at the suit of the mortgagor's creditor, attaches a mortgaged crop of grain, and places a keeper in charge thereof, makes himself liable as for a conversion, although he does not remove the same, and releases the attachment two days after an action commenced against him by the mortgagee.

2. The measure of damages in an action by the mortgagee against the sheriff is the value of the property at the time it was taken and compensation for time and money expended in recovering it under Civil Code Cal. §§ 3336, 3338.

3. Where the findings of the court do not disclose whether or not the mortgagee had the benefit of the property after it was released from the attachment a judgment in his favor for one cent damages will be set aside.

Action by I. I. Irwin against S. A. McDowell, a sheriff, for conversion. Judgment in the court below being rendered in favor of the plaintiff on one count only, he appeals. Reversed.

M. S. Babcock and M. L. Short, for appellant. Huasaker, Britt & Goodrich, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover from the defendant the sum of $3,000 and interest thereon, the payment of which is alleged to have been secured by a chattel mortgage. The facts stated in the complaint are in substance as follows: On the 23d day of November, 1889, one Robert L. Coutts executed to the plaintiff a mortgage on a crop of wheat, barley, and oats, then being planted on land in San Diego county, and to be harvested in the year 1890. The mortgage was properly verified, acknowledged, and recorded, and was given to secure payment of the mortgagor's promissory note for $1,600 and interest, and such further advances as the mortgagee might make to the mortgagor, not exceeding $1,400. Further advances were made to the amount of $1,400, thus making the whole debt secured $3,000, no part of which, except a portion of the interest, had been paid. On the 13th day of August, 1890, the defendant, as sheriff of the county of San Diego, wrongfully and unlawfully levied upon the mortgaged crop a writ of attachment issued in favor of one Cave J. Coutts against the mortgagor, and before making the levy he did not pay or tender to plaintiff, or to any one for him, nor deposit with the county clerk or treasurer, the amount of the mortgage debt, or any part thereof, nor had he ever done so. Therefore judgment was asked for $3,000 and interest. The defendant, by his answer, admitted most of the averments of the complaint, and then set up facts to excuse the levy, and exonerate him from damages. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and, among other things, the court found that there was due and unpaid on the mortgage debt, for principal and interest, the sum of $3,126.49; that the levy was made on the property by the defendant's deputy, and a keeper placed in charge thereof, on the 13th day of August, 1890; that on the next day the plaintiff demanded of the deputy the possession and return to him of the property attached, and that the deputy admitted he knew the property was mortgaged to the plaintiff, but refused to release it; that the action was commenced on the 15th day of August, 1890, and thereafter, on the 16th or 17th day of the same month, defendant directed his deputy to release the property, and thereupon it was delivered to the mortgagor, Robert L. Coutts, and defendant notified one of the attorneys of the plaintiff that he had released it; that at the time the levy was made the property was situate in an open field where raised, and was never removed therefrom by defendant or by his authority, and that he had then no actual personal knowledge that it was covered by the mortgage; that the total value of the property attached did not exceed the sum of $650; and, as a conclusion of law, that plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for one cent damages and costs. Judgment was accordingly so entered, and the case is brought here for review on the judgment roll.

The appellant contends that personal property covered by a mortgage cannot lawfully be taken under process against the mortgagor without first paying or tendering to the mortgagee, or depositing for him, the amount of his mortgage debt, and that, if it be so taken, the detriment proximately caused by the seizure is the full amount of the debt; and hence that damages should have been awarded to the plaintiff for the sum found by the court to be due and unpaid, namely, $3,126.49. The statutory provisions bearing on the subject are found in the Civil Code, and are as follows: "Sec. 2968. Personal property mortgaged may be taken under attachment or execution issued at the suit of a creditor of the mortgagor. Sec. 2969. Before the property is so taken, the officer must pay or tender to the mortgagee the amount of the mortgage debt and interest, or must deposit the amount thereof with the county clerk or treasurer, payable to the order of the mortgagee." "Sec. 3336. The detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be: (1) The value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest from that time; or, where the action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, the highest market value of the property at any time between the conversion and the verdict, without interest, at the option of the injured party; and, (2) a fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property." "Sec. 3338. One having a lien on personal property cannot recover greater damages for its conversion from one having a right thereto superior to his, after his lien is discharged, than the amount secured by the lien, and the compensation allowed by section 3336 for loss of time and expenses." From these sections it clearly appears that an officer has no right to take mortgaged personal property under process against the mortgagor, unless he first complies with the requirements of section 2969; and if he does so he makes himself liable as for a conversion. In Rider v. Edgar, 54 Cal. 127, which was an action of this kind, it was held that any unlawful interference with the property, or exercise of dominion over it, by which the owner is damaged, such as the levy of an attachment upon it and the appointment of a keeper, was a taking which made the officer liable, although the property was not moved or otherwise disturbed and though it was released before any demand from the plaintiff.

Assuming, then, as we must, that the defendant in this case made himself liable by his levy, the question is, what is the measure of the damages which can be recovered against him? In ordinary cases the measure of damages for a conversion is the full value of the property converted, with interest, compensation, etc. This rule, however, does not apply to its full extent in a case like this. When, as here, the action is brought by a mortgagee, he can recover only "the amount secured by the lien and the compensation allowed by section 3336 for loss of time and expenses," though the property may be of much greater value. What is the amount secured by the lien? The answer must be, the full amount of the mortgage debt, if the property is worth enough to pay it, and, if not, then such sum or amount only as it is worth. It would seem absurd to say, if the mortgage debt was a thousand dollars and the mortgaged property was worth only a hundred dollars, that the full amount of the debt was secured. As the court found that the total value of the property attached did not exceed the sum of $650, it follows, in our opinion, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover from the defendant the full amount of the debt. The cases of Wood v. Franks, 56 Cal. 217; Wood v. Franks, 67 Cal. 32, 7 Pac. Rep. 50; and Sherman v. Finch, 71 Cal. 68, 11 Pac. Rep. 847,—relied upon by appellant, are not in conflict with what has been said. In neither of those cases was any question raised as to the value of the mortgaged property, or its sufficiency to pay the mortgage debt in full.

The plaintiff was, however, entitled to a judgment against the defendant, if he was damnified by the taking, for the amount of damages which he actually sustained. The levy of the attachment and the appointment of a keeper were sufficient, as we have seen, to constitute a conversion; and the action was commenced before the release. What became of the property after it was released does not appear. The court finds only that it was delivered to the mortgagor, and was never removed from the open field, where it was situate, by the defendant or by his authority. The plaintiff may have taken it back and applied its proceeds to the payment of his debt, or he may have refused to do so, and relied on his claim for damages. If he took it back he sustained no damages; and, if not, the damages could not have exceeded the value of the property. In the absence of any finding as to whether the plaintiff had the benefit of the property after its release or not, the judgment cannot be sustained. In our opinion, the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment and in the reasoning of the foregoing opinion. I think, however, the decision in this case cannot be reconciled with the cases of Wood v. Franks, 56 Cal. 217, and Sherman v. Finch, 71 Cal. 68, 11 Pac. Rep. 847. In my judgment, those cases were wrongly decided, and I have no hesitancy in concurring in this judgment, which, in effect, overrules them.

BOGART v. CROSBY et al. (No. 14,169.) 91 Cal. 278

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—AMENDMENT OF COMPLAINT—MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED.

1. A real-estate agent by verbal authority negotiated a sale of defendant's land to plaintiff, which was afterwards rescinded by mutual consent, and plaintiff demanded the return of the money deposited on the contract. To avoid controversy with the agent as to his commission, defendant returned the money to him, telling plaintiff that he must settle with the agent. Held, that defendant was liable to plaintiff for the money deposited.

2. The complaint in an action against a firm of real-estate agents to recover money deposited on a verbal contract of sale which had been rescinded was amended by making the owners of the land defendants, and alleging that defendants were an association of two or more persons doing business under a common name. A second amended complaint was filed, alleging that only the agents constituted the association, and both amendments charged all the defendants with having received the deposit from plaintiff, and to his use. Held, that the last amendment did not state a new cause of action, and was not barred because not filed in two years from the time the cause of action accrued, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 339, subd. 1, providing that an action on an unwritten contract, obligation, or liability shall be brought within two years.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN R. AIKEN, Judge.

Action by Bogart against Crosby & Van Haren and others to recover money received by defendants to plaintiff's use. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. D. Cassidy, for appellants. Dakin & Story, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This appeal is by the defendants Remondino, Daggett, and Witfield from a judgment against them in favor of plaintiff. It appears that defendants Crosby & Van Haren were verbally authorized by appellants to sell for them a certain tract of land in San Diego, and, acting under this authority, they agreed to sell the same to plaintiff, and received from him the sum of $300 as a deposit on the contract. No deed could be made at the time on account of the absence of the appellant Remondino, the plaintiff being assured by defendant Van Haren that he would return within two weeks. After waiting about three weeks, the plaintiff notified Witfield, one of the appellants, that owing to the long delay and uncertainty as to the time when Remondino would return he would not complete the purchase, and demanded a return of the money paid by him as a deposit. Witfield made no objection to the refusal of the plaintiff to complete the purchase, for the reason, as he states, that he considered the land worth more than plaintiff was to pay for it, and so informed plaintiff that he would return his check to Crosby & Van Haren, and he might settle with them. The reason for this action seems to have been that appellants did not wish to pay their agents commissions for their services, and, to avoid controversy upon this point, turned the money over to them, and left the plaintiff to settle with such agents. The appellants soon thereafter sold the land to another person, and it does not appear that it was sold for any less than plaintiff was to pay, or that defendants have suffered any damage by reason of the refusal of plaintiff to complete the purchase. This action was first brought against Crosby & Van Haren alone. On October 19, 1889, an amended complaint was filed, by which appellants were also made defendants; this complaint alleging that "defendant is an association of two or more persons doing business * * * under the common name of Crosby & Van Haren." On October 24, 1889, a second amended complaint was filed, in which only Crosby & Van Haren were alleged to be an association under the name of Crosby & Van Haren, and all of the defendants were charged with having received from plaintiff, and to his use, the sum of $300.

It is claimed by appellants that the cause of action stated in the last amended complaint is, as against appellants, essentially different from that alleged in the first amended complaint, and that, as it was not filed within two years after the cause of action accrued, the same is barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We do not agree with appellants in this contention. The difference between the first and second amended complaints is not so marked that the latter can be deemed the statement of an entirely new and different cause of action against the appellants. In both amended complaints the appellants are charged with having received from plaintiff, and to his use, the money sued for, and with a refusal to pay it to plaintiff when demanded.

Upon the facts of the case there can be no doubt of plaintiff's right to maintain this action against appellants. The money of plaintiff came into their hands, and we know of no principle of law which will justify them in their refusal to return it to him upon the state of facts disclosed by the evidence in this case. The appellants were never legally bound to make any conveyance to plaintiff at all, and he certainly had a right to withdraw his offer to purchase at the time and under the circumstances shown, and was under no obligation to settle any claim for commissions which Crosby & Van Haren might have against appellants, growing out of their part in the transaction. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; MCFARLAND, J.

CITY OF PASADENA v. STIMSON et al. (No. 13,938.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 16, 1891.)

EMINENT DOMAIN — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — NUISANCE—APPEAL.

1. Civil Code Cal. § 1001, provides that any "person" may, without further legislative action, acquire private property for any use specified in Code Civil Proc. § 1238, either by consent of the owner or by condemnation proceedings had under the provisions of Code Civil Proc. §§ 1238-1263. Civil Code, § 14, provides that the word "person" used in the Code shall include a corporation. St. 1883, p. 93, relative to cities of the sixth class, provides (section 870) that when it shall become necessary for the city or town to take private property for public use, "and the board of trustees cannot agree with the owner thereof," the trustees may direct proceedings to be taken under Code Civil Proc. §§ 1237-1263, to procure the same. Held, that St. 1883, p. 93, by prescribing a condition precedent to the exercise of eminent domain by cities of the sixth class, destroys the uniform operation of Civil Code, § 1001, in contravention of Const. Cal. art. 1, § 11.

2. Such statute is also repugnant to Const. Cal. art. 4, § 25, which provides that "the legislature shall not pass local or special laws in cases where a general law can be made applicable." People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 442, 13 Pac. Rep. 413, and Abel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 223, 24 Pac. Rep. 383, distinguished.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1244, providing that the complaint in condemnation proceedings for a right of way must show the "location, general route, and termini, and must be accompanied with a map thereof," a complaint to condemn land for a sewer already partially built, which states the termini of the whole sewer, need not state the exact spot to which it has been already constructed; and the phrase "along and east of the center line" of a certain avenue sufficiently shows the location of the proposed sewer.

4. Under Code Civil Proc., which provides (section 1238, subd. 8) that private property may be taken for sewerage in any city or town, whether incorporated or unincorporated, and (section 1241, subd. 2) that before property can be taken it must appear that the taking is necessary to a use authorized by law, it is only necessary to show that the property to be taken is necessary for the sewer, and not that the sewer is necessary for the town.

5. Under Civil Code, § 3482, providing that "nothing which is done or maintained under the express authority of a statute can be deemed a nuisance," a sewer, the construction of which is authorized by section 1238, though a necessary evil, is not a nuisance per se; and in proceedings to condemn land for a right of way therefor it is unnecessary to show that the proposed route is least injurious to private rights.

6. Where no motion for a new trial was made, and a specification of particulars does not appear in the bill of exceptions, but only in the brief of counsel, the supreme court will not consider the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the judgment.

7. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1241, subd. 3, providing that before property already appropriated to some public use can be taken it must appear that the public use to which it is to be applied is a more necessary public use, does not apply to condemnation proceedings to subject a highway to a right of way for a sewer, since the second servitude will not disturb the first.

8. In condemnation proceedings by a city of 8,000 inhabitants the court will take judicial notice that the city was incorporated, and, though it was averred, it need not be proved.

9. Failure to show that the city attorney and special attorneys for the city who commenced such proceedings had no authority therefor, is immaterial when there is abundant evidence that their action was afterwards ratified.

10. Under the original complaint, which failed to specify the kind of man-holes with which the proposed sewer was to be furnished, evidence was introduced that perforated man-holes allowed noxious and dangerous gases to escape. The complaint was then amended so as to provide that the man-holes should be so constructed as to prevent the escape of such gases "unless temporarily in making repairs." Held, that it was error to then strike out the above evidence, and direct a verdict of nominal damages only in favor of adjoining property, since the property might be substantially injured by the temporary escape of sewer-gas.

11. Evidence that the city had agreed to allow an hotel outside the city limits to use the sewer was properly excluded, since that fact would not render the proposed use less a public use.

12. Evidence that a witness had surveyed a route 1,432 feet shorter than that proposed, on a better grade, through lands not thickly settled, was admissible.

13. Evidence that the sewer farm to which the sewer was to extend would become a nuisance was inadmissible, as involving a question not in this proceeding.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Proceedings by the city of Pasadena against Charles W. Stimson and another to condemn a right of way for a sewer. Decree for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland, for appellants. Haynes & Mitchell, A. R. Metcalfe, and F. J. Polley, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. Proceeding under section 1237 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, to condemn a right of way for an outfall sewer from the city of Pasadena to a tract of land outside of the city limits, known as the "Sewer Farm." Appeal by defendants from a decree of condemnation.

The city of Pasadena, a municipal corporation in the county of Los Angeles, for the purpose, as it alleges, of promoting the health, comfort, and convenience of its inhabitants, is engaged in constructing a system of sewerage, whereby it proposes to discharge the city sewerage upon a farm distant about four and a half miles from the city limits. It has obtained from the county of Los Angeles the right of way for the necessary outfall sewer along certain county roads, from the boundaries of the city to a point at or near the intersection of the Monterey road and Garfield avenue, which is the principal, or one of the principal, streets of the neighboring town of Alhambra. From this point the proposed route of the sewer is along said Garfield avenue, east of its center line, through the town of Alhambra, to another county road, and thence along said road to the sewer farm. This proceeding is against the owners of lots fronting on the east side of Garfield avenue, who, in support of their appeal from the decree of condemnation, assign numerous errors in the rulings of the superior court. They contend that the court erred in overruling their demurrer to the complaint, in denying their motion for a nonsuit, in admitting and excluding testimony at the trial, in permitting an amendment of the complaint after the plaintiff had closed its case, and in instructing the jury. Under each of these heads various particulars are specified.

We shall not, however, be compelled to notice these separate points seriatim, as our views with respect to one or two general propositions will dispose of most of them, either by deciding them or demonstrating their immateriality.

One main proposition upon which the appellants rely is that a municipal corporation of the fifth or sixth class must, as a condition precedent to invoking the exercise of the power of eminent domain, make an unavailing effort to agree with the owner of the property or right which it seeks to acquire; and, consequently, that it must, in any condemnation proceeding, allege and prove that it has made such effort. The complaint in this case contained no allegation as to the class of corporations to which the plaintiff belongs, nor did it contain any allegation of an effort to agree. On the trial no evidence was offered to show how plaintiff was incorporated,—whether by special charter or under the general law,—nor to what class it would belong if incorporated under the general law; but the court, without evidence, took notice of the fact that Pasadena is a city of the sixth class, duly incorporated under the general law. St. 1883, p. 93. By section 870 of that law—which is one of the sections relating to cities of the sixth class—it is provided as follows: "Whenever it shall become necessary for the city or town to take or damage private property for the purpose of establishing, laying out, extending, and widening streets and other public highways and places within the city or town, or for the purpose of rights of way for drains, sewers, and aqueducts, and for the purpose of widening, straightening, or diverting the channels of streams and the improvement of water-fronts, and the board of trustees cannot agree with the owner thereof as to the price to be paid, the trustees may direct proceedings to be taken under section one thousand two hundred and thirty-seven and following sections, to and including section one thousand two hundred and sixty-three of the Code of Civil Procedure, to procure the same." The defendants, relying upon the condition mentioned in this section,—an inability to agree with the owner,—demurred to the complaint, specially for uncertainty, because it did not set forth the manner in which plaintiff was incorporated, nor to what class of corporations it belonged; and generally, on the ground that it did not state sufficient facts, because, assuming that it was a corporation of the sixth class, it did not allege an effort to agree. They also moved for a nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's case, upon the ground, among others, that there was no evidence of an effort to agree.

From this statement it is apparent that all these various points arising upon the orders of the court overruling the demurrer and denying a nonsuit will be effectually disposed of if it is held that the plaintiff was not bound to make an effort to agree with the owners of the land before instituting its proceeding to condemn. There is no doubt of the authority of the legislature in regulating the exercise of the power of eminent domain to make an unavailing effort on the part of the person in charge of the use, to agree with the owner of the property it seeks to acquire,—a condition precedent to the institution of any proceeding to condemn; and there is no doubt that an intention to impose such a condition has been inferred in many instances, in this state and elsewhere, from language no stronger than that which is contained in section 870 of the municipal incorporation act above quoted; so that, if the solution of the question before us depended solely upon the construction of that section, we should have no hesitation in holding that the superior court erred in overruling the demurrer and the motion for a nonsuit. But there is a question whether said section, in the sense in which appellants seek to apply it, is constitutional,—whether, in other words, it is not a special law, by which the legislature has attempted to make a forbidden discrimination against two classes of municipal corporations, by imposing upon them alone a burdensome condition to the exercise of a right common to all public and private corporations, and to all natural persons sui juris in the state. By section 1001 of the Civil Code it is provided as follows: "Any person may, without further legislative action, acquire private property for any use specified in section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure, either by consent of the owner or by proceedings had under the provisions of title 7, pt. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure; and any person seeking to acquire property for any of the uses mentioned in such title 'is an agent of the state,' or a 'person in charge of such use,' within the meaning of those terms as used in such title." A corporation, whether private or public, is a person. Civil Code, § 14.¹ It follows, therefore, that under this general law—general in the widest and fullest sense of the term—any public or private corporation, or any natural person, may, for any of the uses defined in section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure, acquire private property without the consent of the owner, by means of the proceedings prescribed in part 3, tit. 7, of said Code. Sections 1237–1263. It is conceded that there is no provision in this law requiring a previous effort to agree; and apparently it is not controverted that every person in the state, natural and artificial, is exempt from such condition, excepting only municipal corporations of the fifth and sixth classes. Can the legislature make such a discrimination? "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." Const. art. 1, § 11. "The legislature shall not pass local or special laws in cases where a general law can be made applicable." Id. art. 4, § 25. It seems to us perfectly clear that the clause of the incorporation act requiring cities of the fifth and sixth classes to make an effort to agree, while all other persons are exempt from such condition, is in plain and direct conflict with both of these constitutional inhibitions. It destroys the uniform operation of a general law, and is special in a case where a general law not only can be made applicable, but in which a general law had been enacted, and in which there is no conceivable reason for discrimination. It is true that the legislature is empowered by section 6 of article 11 of the constitution to classify cities and towns in proportion to population for the purpose of incorporation and organization, and it is undoubtedly true that a law limited to these purposes is not unconstitutional, because it makes different regulations for the different classes. But the mode of exercising the power of eminent domain, and the conditions upon which it may be invoked, are no part of municipal organizations. They are the subject of general laws applicable to every person alike, and the legislature has no power to make arbitrary discriminations in this respect between different classes of persons.

We do not regard the decision in People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 442, 18 Pac. Rep. 413, as being at all in conflict with this view. The only point involved in that case that touches the question under discussion was made in support of the proposition that the "Whitney Act"—so called—was local and special, for the reason that it applied to some cities and not to others. The author of the prevailing opinion answered this point by reference to the power conferred upon the legislature by the constitution to classify cities and towns according to population. He assumed that the class of cities to which the Whitney act was made applicable was identical with the second class, as defined in the general incorporation act, and upon that assumption concluded that, as cities having a large population require different legislation from those containing fewer inhabitants, the Whitney act, though applying to only one class, was nevertheless constitutional. But it must be borne in mind that the subject of the Whitney act (a police court) was peculiarly a matter pertaining to municipal organizations, and still more peculiarly a matter as to which cities of large population require different provision from that suitable to cities or towns of small population. It is to be observed, also, that the care taken by the court to distinguish People v. Henshaw from those cases in which laws had been held unconstitutional on account of arbitrary discriminations between persons standing in the same relation to the subjects of legislation, is an emphatic recognition of the doctrine we have announced.

Neither is the vaccination case—Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 226, 24 Pac. Rep. 383—opposed to our views. A single expression in the commissioner's opinion in that case, separated from its context, and considered without reference to the point to be decided, might seem to warrant the proposition for which appellants are contending here, viz., that a law is not special if it applies equally to all members of any single class defined by the legislature, no matter how arbitrary and senseless the classification may be. But it is a familiar rule that expressions used in judicial opinions are always to be construed and limited by reference to the matters under consideration, and that they cannot be safely applied in their largest and most universal sense to dissimilar cases. Now, in Abuel v. Clark the court was considering the constitutionality of a law making previous vaccination a condition of admission to the public schools of the state. The public schools are an institution, the existence of which is recognized by the constitution itself. Those who attend the public schools stand in a relation to the institution different from that of persons who do not attend. This difference exists independent of legislation. In the nature of things, attendance upon the public schools must be subject to regulations necessary for the safety and welfare of the whole body of pupils, and a law which applies equally to all who seek admittance is in the fullest sense a general law, because it applies to all who bring themselves into the same relation with the state. There is a broad and palpable distinction between such a law and one which annexes to the exercise of a universal right by a particular class of persons, arbitrarily selected, conditions from which all other persons similarly situated are exempt. This distinction is, I think, clearly recognized in Ex parte Smith, 38 Cal. 710, and is entirely consistent with the decision in Brooks v. Hyde, 37 Cal. 366, where it was held that laws must operate uniformly upon all persons standing in the same relation to the law in respect to the privileges and immunities conferred by it or the acts which it prohibits. In Earle v. Board, 55 Cal. 489, and in Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 142, 8 Pac. Rep. 813, the decision went upon the ground that the legislature has no power to exempt classes of persons arbitrarily defined from the operation of a general law; and these cases were both carefully distinguished from People v. Henshaw, in the prevailing opinion in that case. The conclusion is that, although a law is general and constitutional when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction, it is not general or constitutional if it confers particular privileges, or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions in the exercise of a common right, upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law. From this conclusion it necessarily follows that cities of the fifth and sixth classes, equally with all other natural and artificial persons, may maintain proceedings to condemn private property for public use without a previous effort to agree.

In reaching this conclusion we have not overlooked the argument of appellants that, since the plaintiff in such proceedings is always a mere agent of the state, and acting in its behalf, he cannot question the conditions upon which his principal authorizes him to act. We think this rather a fanciful argument, and that it is based upon a supposed analogy which has no real existence. It is, in a very modified sense, that the state is the principal and the plaintiff the agent in cases like this. Such may be the theoretical view, but practically it is the reverse of the truth. The party directly and beneficially interested is the person in charge of the use, or the particular community affected by the improvement; and the attitude of the state is merely passive. The law is designed for the benefit of local communities, and they have a right to enjoy it on equal terms.

Another ground upon which it is contended that the superior court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint is that the complaint does not show with certainty, so that the same may be identified, the location of the general route, or the termini, or either of them, of said sewer. But the complaint does clearly show that the termini of the sewer are the city of Pasadena and the sewer farm, which is described as consisting of certain subdivisions of the government survey. It also shows not only the general route, but the particular route, and is accompanied by a map of so much of the route as is involved in this proceeding. Code Civil Proc. § 1244, subd. 4.¹ The particular specifications of insufficiency under this head seem to rest upon the points—First, that the exact spot at or near the intersection of the Monterey road and Garfield avenue, to which the outfall sewer has already been constructed, is not described in the complaint, or delineated on the map; second, that the name of the county road from the opposite extremity of Garfield avenue to San Marino avenue is not given; and, third, that "along and east of the center line" of the avenue is not a sufficiently exact description of the location of the proposed sewer. We think these objections are without merit. There is no law and there is no reason requiring such minute exactitude in these particulars.

One ground of the motion for the nonsuit was that the necessity of the proposed sewer had not been shown. The legislature has defined the public uses for which private property may be taken, and, among others, is "sewerage of any incorporated city, city and county, or of any village or town, whether incorporated or unincorporated," etc. Code Civil Proc. § 1238, subd. 8. When a city or town decides for itself—as it may do—that a sewer is desirable, it is not bound to prove that such sewer is necessary, but only that the taking of the property it seeks to condemn is necessary for the construction of the sewer. When it shows that the use to which the property is to be applied is a public use, (and that is shown by the statute in this case,) the inquiry on that head is closed. Id. § 1241.² But the point of the objection here is that it does not appear from any official record of the proceedings of the board of trustees of Pasadena that they have ever adopted the plan of an outfall sewer from the city to the sewer farm. We think, however, that the terms of the two ordinances, Nos. 66 and 69, the matters submitted to the vote of the people, and the result of the voting, contain ample proof of the adoption of the system of sewerage described in the complaint. The first ordinance declares the necessity, among other things, of acquiring, constructing, and completing a system of sewers, and of borrowing money for the purpose. The second ordinance recites the passage and substance of the first, sets forth in detail the system of surveys which has been adopted, embracing the sewerage farm, and proceeds: "(4) Outfall sewer, to be located on Garfield avenue, or any other street to the track of the Southern Pacific Railway Co., south of Alhambra; thence running in a southeasterly direction to the sewerage farm." After setting forth the full details of the various proposed improvements, and an itemized estimate of their cost, the ordinance provides for a special election, at which the question of issuing bonds of the city shall be submitted. The evidence shows that such election was regularly held, and resulted in a vote of 197 for and 5 against the proposition. This, we repeat, furnishes ample proof of the adoption of the system described in the complaint. It was not necessary that the ordinance should be more specific than it was as to the route of the sewer from the city to the sewer farm. Indeed, it would have been improper for the city and its electors to tie themselves to a particular route, if, as appellants contend, the final selection of a route does not rest with them.

Another ground of the motion for a nonsuit was that the proposed sewer will be a nuisance affecting injuriously the health of the people of Alhambra, and that there was no evidence tending to show that the proposed route along Garfield avenue was most compatible with the public good, and least injurious to private rights. There was no evidence that the sewer, as it was proposed to construct it, would be more of a nuisance than any sewer would be. So far as appears, the sewer was well planned, according to current sanitary views. Certainly there was nothing tending to show that it was an improper kind of sewer, and therefore it could not be regarded as a nuisance per se. A sewer in the neighborhood of dwellings may be an evil, but it is evident that the legislature regards it as a necessary evil, since it allows private property to be taken for the construction of sewers. Sewers are in fact a necessary evil; but when they are planned and constructed with reasonable regard to the results of sanitary teachings they are authorized by statute, and "nothing which is done or maintained under the express authority of a statute can be deemed a nuisance." Civil Code, § 3482. In short, the plaintiff, being a city with sewage to dispose of, and having a sewer farm to which it has apparently a right to conduct it, has necessarily the right to construct such a sewer as the statute (section 1238, Code Civil Proc.) contemplates, and such a sewer cannot be a nuisance in the strict sense of the term. That it may occasion loss or injury to others for which they will be entitled to compensation is a different proposition, which will be considered in another connection.

We do not think a failure to prove that the location of the sewer was most compatible with the greatest public good and least private injury was a ground for a nonsuit. The state or its agents in charge of a public use must necessarily survey and locate the land to be taken, and are by statute expressly authorized to do so. Code Civil Proc. § 1242. Exercising, as they do, a public function under express statutory authority, it would seem that in this particular their acts should, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be presumed correct and lawful. The selection of a particular route is committed in the first instance to the person in charge of the use, and unless there is something to show an abuse of the discretion, the propriety of his selection ought not to be questioned, for certainly it must be presumed that the state or its agent has made the best choice for the public; and if this occasions peculiar and unnecessary damage to the owners of the property affected the proof of such damage should come from them. And we think that when an attempt is made to show that the location made is unnecessarily injurious the proof ought to be clear and convincing, for otherwise no location could ever be made. If the first selection made on behalf of the public could be set aside on slight or doubtful proof, a second selection would be set aside in the same manner, and so ad infinitum. The improvement could never be secured, because, whatever location was proposed, it could be defeated by showing another just as good. We think there was no error in denying the motion for nonsuit.

As to the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the judgment, we find no specification of particulars in the bill of exceptions, and do not think such specifications can be made for the first time in the brief of counsel, even if they could be reviewed in the absence of a motion for a new trial. But, waiving this objection, we do not think any of the exceptions of the appellants to the sufficiency of the evidence are valid.

1. It is not necessary to prove the incorporation of the plaintiff. Being a city or town of 8,000 inhabitants, it was immaterial whether the plaintiff was incorporated or not; and, if it had been material, the court was correct in taking notice of the fact without proof, and even without averment. Here, however, it was averred. St. 1889, p. 372.

2. This point—that there was no evidence that the taking was necessary—has been disposed of.

3. It was clearly shown that the sewer, when constructed, would not interfere with the use of the highway, and that during its construction such use would not be seriously interrupted. Therefore it was not necessary to show that the new use was superior to the one to which the property was already appropriated. Section 1241, subd. 3, Code Civil Proc.,¹ has no application to a case where the same land can be subjected to a second servitude without disturbing the first.

4. This point—that there was no evidence that the route proposed was most compatible with the greatest public good and least private injury—has already been discussed, and we have held that, as to this matter, the burden of proof is on the defendants. We cite, as bearing upon this point, Railroad Co. v. Kip, 46 N. Y. 553.

5. It is objected that there is no evidence that the trustees of the city of Pasadena directed the commencement of these proceedings. But the proceeding was commenced by the city attorney and special attorneys for the city, whose authority need not be shown unless properly drawn in question. The attorney for a party is never required to prove his retainer or his instruction to commence a proceeding unless his authority is directly attacked, and this rule is just as applicable to suits instituted in the name and on behalf of municipal corporations as to suits by private corporations or natural persons. Besides, there is abundant proof of circumstances tending to show that, if the attorneys of plaintiff were not formally authorized in advance by resolution of the board of trustees to commence this proceeding, their action in so doing has been fully ratified.

As to the alleged errors in the rulings of the court upon offers of evidence, most of them have been disposed of in what has been already said. Some, however, remain to be noticed. It is unnecessary to decide whether the court erred in permitting the amendment to the complaint relating to man-holes. If it was an error we cannot see how defendants were injured by it, unless it operated as a surprise, which entitled them to a continuance. But it does not appear that they asked for any continuance on that ground, and it is to be presumed they were entirely willing to go on with the trial under the amended complaint.

But we think the superior court did err in striking out the evidence offered by the defendants of damages to abutting property. This ruling was made after the amendment to the complaint just referred to. The original complaint did not specify the character of man-holes with which the proposed sewer was to be furnished, but it seems to have been assumed at the trial that perforated man-holes, designed for ventilation of the sewer, were to be constructed, and the defendants introduced testimony of experts to prove that through these man-holes sewer-gas would escape and flow over the adjoining premises, producing effects certainly offensive, and probably dangerous. In view of this testimony, and for the purpose of obviating its effect, the plaintiff offered and was allowed to amend its complaint by adding the following: "That in the construction of said sewer along Garfield avenue from the Monterey road to the line of the Southern Pacific Railroad, man-holes will be constructed at reasonable distances, for the purpose of necessary repairs, or removing obstructions from the sewer, but such man-holes are to be constructed in such manner, and so closed, as to prevent the escape of noxious gases and odors, unless temporarily in making such necessary repairs, or in removing obstructions from the sewer, and for such time only as may be reasonably necessary for such purpose."

The court thereupon struck out all the evidence of damage from sewer-gas, and by various rulings held that no question as to damages to adjoining property remained in the case, and instructed the jury to find a verdict for nominal damages to the land to be taken for the laying of the pipe. The error in this ruling did not, however, consist, as appellants contend, in assuming that the plaintiff could and would construct such a sewer as it described; for in this proceeding the plaintiff can acquire no right to construct any other sort of a sewer, and by the decree its right is strictly limited to the laying of a sewer in exact accordance with the specifications contained in the complaint. The court was so far right, therefore, in holding, as it did in effect, that the damage to the defendants could not be estimated upon the assumption that the sewer, when constructed, would cause greater discomfort or inconvenience than the sewer described in the complaint and in the decree. The plaintiff, in order to justify its future proceedings under any decree of condemnation in this suit, must construct its sewer in accordance with the terms of the decree, and it must operate it in a careful, skillful, and proper manner. If it does not, it will be liable for damages for its neglect in these particulars, and the persons damaged, though parties to this proceeding, will not be concluded by the damages allowed herein. Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 481, 482; 1 Rorer, R. R. pp. 323, 324. The error of the court was in assuming that no damage to abutting property could arise from the construction and proper operation of the sewer proposed. The temporary escape of sewer-gas during the time reasonably necessary for making repairs to the sewer or removing obstructions may occasion substantial injury. At least it cannot be said as matter of law that it will not, and therefore it was error to strike out the testimony adduced by the defendants as to the offensive and dangerous properties of sewer-gas, and to instruct the jury to find merely nominal damages.

The court did not err in excluding evidence that the proposed sewer was to be used by the Raymond Hotel. The use is none the less a public use because the city has arranged to allow an hotel outside the corporate limits to share in the benefit of its improvement.

We think the court erred also in excluding the testimony of Gervaise Purcell. It would certainly have tended to prove that the route selected for the proposed sewer was not so good as one that might have been selected, and that it would cause a greater private injury. The offered testimony was to the effect that the witness had surveyed a route 1,432 feet shorter than that proposed, upon a better grade, through lands not thickly settled. We do not say that this testimony would have been conclusive, but it was competent and relevant to a material issue in the case, and should have been admitted, subject to the right of the plaintiff to introduce evidence in rebuttal.

The superior court did not err in excluding the testimony offered for the purpose of showing that the sewer farm would become a nuisance by being made the receptacle of the sewerage of Pasadena. That is a question not involved in this proceeding. If the sewer farm ever becomes a nuisance, the decree in this proceeding will not stand in the way of its abatement.

Neither did the court err in refusing the request of certain defendants to decree to the plaintiff a limited use of the sewer in common with those whose lands were to be taken. The pleadings and proofs in the case would not have justified such a decree. For the errors above specified the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; HARRISON, J.; PATERSON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal for the reasons which are given for such reversal in the opinion of the chief justice, but I am not prepared to concur in the whole of said opinion.

PEOPLE ex rel. ROBERTS v. BEAUDRY et al.
(No. 14,172.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 16, 1891.)

STREETS—DEDICATION—POWERS OF ATTORNEY GENERAL—EVIDENCE.

1. The attorney general has authority to maintain an action in the name of the people to abate a nuisance caused by obstructions in the streets of a city.

2. The record of an action by the city to recover possession of a street, in which the title was adjudged against it, is competent evidence in a subsequent suit by the attorney general against the same defendants and their grantees to declare such street a public highway, and to abate a nuisance caused by alleged obstructions therein maintained by defendants.

3. A city ordinance adopting an official map of the city in which a certain street is clearly marked out and defined through land owned by the city is sufficient evidence of the dedication of such street as a public highway in the absence of a contrary showing, though it was not actually constructed and made ready for travel at the time.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by the people of California, by George A. Johnson, attorney general, ex rel. John Roberts, against Prudent Beaudry and others, to declare a certain street in Los Angeles to be a public highway, and to abate an alleged nuisance, caused by obstructions therein. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Chapman & Hendrick, for appellants. W. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., R. Dunnigan, and Andrew Glassell, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. It is alleged in the complaint in this case that a certain described strip of land was on the 1st day of October, 1868, and ever since has been, a part and portion of a public street in the city of Los Angeles, now commonly known as "Buena Vista Street;" that defendants, on or about the 1st day of April, 1871, erected and maintained, and still do maintain, on that part of the street described, certain buildings, posts, fences, and other things, which ever since they were so erected have obstructed, and still do obstruct, the said street, and hinder and prevent the people of the state of California from the free use thereof as a public street, and are public nuisances, and illegal obstructions thereon; and the prayer is that the strip of land described as being a part of Buena Vista street be declared and decreed to be a common public street and highway, free for the travel of all persons, and that the defendants be ordered and decreed to remove therefrom the buildings, houses, and fences and all obstructions whatsoever now obstructing or that may obstruct the free use of said street, and be enjoined from again erecting the same or any other obstructions thereon. The defendants Beaudry and Ramsaur alone answered. They deny that the land described in the complaint, or any portion thereof, is now or was on the 1st day of October, 1868, or ever was, any part or portion of the public street in the city of Los Angeles known as "Buena Vista Street," or of any public street or highway whatever; deny that on the 1st day of April, 1871, or at any other time, they erected and maintained, or still do maintain, on any part of Buena Vista street, or on any other street in the said city, any buildings, posts, fences, or other things; deny that any buildings, posts, fences, or other things erected or maintained by them have obstructed or do obstruct the said street or any other street, or hinder or prevent the people of the state, or any of them, from the free use of the same as a common public street, or at all.

When the case was called for trial, the defendants objected to the introduction of any evidence on the part of the plaintiff, on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The objection was overruled, and an exception reserved. It was then admitted that a patent had been issued by the United States to the city of Los Angeles, conveying the lands within the city limits, upon confirmation of the claim of the city authorities that the city was the successor of a Mexican pueblo, and that the strip described in the complaint was within the boundaries of the lands so conveyed; also that the city was incorporated by an act of the legislature, passed April 4, 1850, according to the provisions of the general law for the incorporation of cities, and with all the rights which had formerly pertained to the said pueblo. The plaintiff then introduced in evidence a map, and an ordinance passed by the mayor and common council of the city, and approved November 17, 1868, adopting the map, and declaring it to be an official map of the city. There is written on the map: "Official map, No. 3, of Los Angeles city," and "map of a tract of land situate between Temple, Buena Vista, Eternity, and Short streets and the land of the Protestant Cemetery, in the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California, subdivided in July and August, 1868, by order of the mayor and common council of Los Angeles city." As represented, Buena Vista and Eternity streets are continuations of the same street, and the tract of land referred to lies on the westerly side of them, and is intersected by other streets, and subdivided into blocks and lots. All the streets are marked out by colored lines, and Buena Vista street has written on it, "N. 43 $\frac{1}{4}$, E. 60 feet wide." The map also shows another street called "New High Street," which runs parallel with Buena Vista and Eternity streets, and is easterly therefrom, but the land between the last-named streets is not subdivided or marked. The plaintiff also introduced in evidence a diagram, made by the city engineer, showing Buena Vista street as laid down on map No. 3, and the strip in controversy, on which defendants are alleged to have intruded. The strip is on the eastern side of the street, and at its south end extends into the street 21.97 feet, and at other points about the same distance. It was proved by the engineer that the diagram was a correct representation of the premises, and by him and other witnesses that the defendants had had the portions of the strip respectively claimed by them inclosed as parts of their adjacent lots for a considerable number of years. Upon this evidence the plaintiff rested, and it was claimed that the adoption and filing of map No. 3 constituted a dedication to the public as a public street of all the land represented thereon as Buena Vista street.

The defendants then introduced in evidence two deeds, made by the "mayor and common council of the city of Los Angeles" to Hiram McLaughlin, one in 1856 and the other in 1857. The deeds conveyed two adjoining parcels of land on the west side of New High street, which were described, and for a more particular description reference was made to a map made by one Waldemar, deputy county surveyor. And in connection with the deeds it was proved that defendant Beaudry, in April, 1868, succeeded through sundry mesne conveyances to the title of McLaughlin to the two parcels, and that about the same time he inclosed them with a fence. It was proved that the land was then hilly, wild, and unimproved, and that there was then no road of any kind where Buena Vista street is now located. The defendants next introduced in evidence the copy of a map of the tract of land conveyed to McLaughlin, as aforesaid, showing that the same had been subdivided into lots, two of which were marked lots 13 and 15. At the head of this map is a statement that the land was "subdivided August 29, 1868, under the direction of Mr. P. Beaudry, by George Hanson," the county surveyor; and at the foot of it is a certificate, signed by the county recorder, that the map is "a true copy of the original, recorded November 11, 1868, at 10 hrs., at request of P. Beaudry." It was then admitted that the defendant Beaudry still retained whatever title he had acquired to lots 13 and 15 in the tract which is now called the "Arcadia tract," and that the fence referred to as inclosing the said property claimed to be a part of Buena Vista street ran along the western boundary of the said lots. It was also admitted that defendant Ramsaur had succeeded to the title to another lot described on the map. The defendants next offered in evidence the judgment roll in an action commenced in the superior court of Los Angeles county on the 31st day of March, 1884, by the city of Los Angeles against Prudent Beaudry and Victor Beaudry. The complaint was in the ordinary form in ejectment to recover possession of lots 13 and 15 of the Arcadia tract. The defendants, by their answer, denied all the averments of the complaint, and to show that the plaintiff had no title to the demanded premises set up the conveyances to McLaughlin, heretofore referred to. They alleged that these conveyances were intended to and did include the demanded premises, and that they and their grantors had owned, possessed, and paid taxes on the same since the date of the deeds to McLaughlin. They further alleged that in one of the deeds to McLaughlin there was a mistake in one of the courses named, and they asked to have the deed reformed and corrected in this respect. After trial the court found all the facts as alleged in the defendants' answer, and on the 17th of April, 1885, judgment was entered reforming one of the deeds to McLaughlin as prayed for, and adjudging that one of the defendants was the owner of the lots sued for, and that the plaintiff take nothing by its action. In connection with the offer of this judgment roll in evidence counsel stated that "the defendants proposed to show that lots 13 and 15 of the Arcadia tract included the property, or a considerable portion of the property, in controversy in this action, and being the property next to Mr. Glassell's lot; that the line of the Arcadia tract on the westerly side corresponded with Mr. Beaudry's fence as it was located in 1868, and has been there ever since." The plaintiff objected to the offered evidence, upon the ground that the parties and the issues in that action were not the same as in this, and hence the evidence was inadmissible. The court sustained the objection, and the defendants excepted to the ruling. The case was then submitted for decision, and the court found that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and all the allegations of the answer were untrue, and entered judgment accordingly. From that judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the defendants Beaudry and Ramsaur appeal.

1. The appellants contend that the attorney general had no authority to institute the action, and hence that it should have been dismissed. But the obstructions complained of, if they were upon a public street, and of the character alleged, constituted public nuisances; and it has often been held that the attorney general may bring an action in the name of the people to enjoin or abate such nuisances. People v. Davidson, 30 Cal. 388; People v. Mining Co., 66 Cal. 138, 4 Pac. Rep. 1152; People v. Pope, 53 Cal. 437; People v. Blake, 60 Cal. 497; People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 70, 22 Pac. Rep. 474; People v. Loan Society, 84 Cal. 634, 24 Pac. Rep. 295. The four cases last cited were similar to this one, and this contention cannot, therefore, be sustained.

2. It is also contended that there was no evidence showing that Buena Vista street was ever dedicated to the public as a public highway. But the city had power to lay out and dedicate streets, and on map No. 3 Buena Vista street was clearly marked out and defined. It would seem, therefore, that when the ordinance was passed and the map adopted and filed as an official map of the city, it must have been intended that the streets represented on the map should thereafter be public streets of the city. It was not necessary that they should have been actually constructed and made ready for travel at that time. We think, therefore, if the city owned the land represented as Buena Vista street, that the ordinance and map, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, should be held sufficient evidence of a dedication of the land to the public as a public street.

3. It is further contended that the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence the judgment roll offered by appellants. The ruling seems to us erroneous for the following reasons: The principal question involved in that case was as to whether or not the deeds made by the city to McLaughlin in 1856 and 1875, conveyed the demanded premises, and it was conclusively determined by the judgment that they did. The reformation of one of the courses related back to the date of the deed, and made it read as it would have read if correctly written at the time. Now, if the land so conveyed included, as claimed, the strip of land in controversy here, then it necessarily follows that the city could not in 1868 dedicate that strip as a part of a public street, because it had no title to it. One of the issues in this case was whether or not the strip was a part of the street, and its determination depended upon whether the city owned the land at the time of its attempted dedication. Upon this issue the judgment roll in the other case, as it seems to us, was relevant evidence, and should have been admitted. In legal effect the parties and the issues in the two cases were the same. But counsel for respondent say: "It will be observed that this point only affects the case of the appellant Beaudry, as the other appellant, Ramsaur, was not in any respect a party in or to that judgment roll." It is true that Ramsaur was not a party to the former action, but he holds another lot of the same tract, under Beaudry, and his right to it depends upon the title which was then litigated. Under these circumstances, we think the record admissible in his favor as well as in Beaudry's. We advise that the judgment and order be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PATERSON, J., (concurring.) It is unnecessary to determine in this action whether a judgment entered in an action between the city and an individual is a bar to an action by the people against another or the same defendant, where the question at issue in each case is whether the land in controversy has been dedicated to public use as a street. The judgment referred to in the foregoing opinion was admissible, because it was one of the muniments of defendants' title.

BONETTI v. TREAT et al. (No. 14,353.)

ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE — LIABILITIES OF PARTIES.

1. Where the assignee of a lessee covenants "to pay all rent that may fall due from time to time by virtue of the provisions of the lease," and enters into possession of the premises by consent of the lessor, the relation of landlord and tenant is created between him and the lessor, and his holding is by privity of estate; and, his liability being created by the covenant of the lease, he cannot, by an abandonment of the premises, divest himself of such liability.

2. Nor does the acceptance by the lessor of the assignee as a tenant release the lessee from his covenant to pay rent, but his liability continues by privity of contract until the lease is terminated.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. COPE, Judge.

Action by Bonetti against Treat and Porter for rent. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Porter appeals. Affirmed.

Philip Stewart and Richards & Carrier, for appellant. B. F. Thomas, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. Action for rent alleged to be due and unpaid on certain demised premises described in the complaint. The answer specifically denies the material allegations of the complaint, and avers the neglect and refusal of plaintiff to obtain his lessor's consent to the assignment, after having expressly agreed to do so, rescission of the lease, and surrender of the premises by the defendant Treat, and the acceptance of and entry thereon by plaintiff.

The facts disclosed by the testimony of the witnesses for the plaintiff are as follows: On the 9th day of January, 1889, the plaintiff executed to the defendant Treat, in conjunction with one Pierce, a written lease of the premises therein described for the term of five years from the 1st day of August, 1888, at the annual rent of $1,800 for the first year, and $2,000 for each and every year thereafter, payable in two equal installments, semi-annually, in advance, on the 1st days of February and August of each year during the term of the lease. Subsequent to the execution of the lease, but on the same day, Pierce executed, with the consent of the plaintiff, a written assignment of all his right, title, and interest in the demised premises to the defendant Porter, who, as part of the consideration "of such sale or transfer, agreed to pay all rent that may fall due from time to time by virtue of the provisions of said lease." Porter immediately entered into possession of the premises as assignee under the assignment of the lease, and paid by his individual check a part, if not all, of the first installment of rent. Treat and Porter continued their joint occupancy of the premises until the latter part of July of that year, when they, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, wholly abandoned the possession of the same; and afterwards, upon demand being made for the rent due and payable on the 1st day of August, 1889, they refused to pay the same. The reason given by the defendant Treat to plaintiff for the abandonment of the possession of the premises and the refusal to pay the rent when it became due was to the effect that Porter declined to pay any further rent until plaintiff obtained the consent of his lessor to the assignment, and that he (Treat) could not do anything alone. The evidence shows that plaintiff never promised or agreed to furnish such consent to Porter or to anyone for him. In the early part of August, 1889, the defendant Treat delivered the keys of the house and surrendered the premises to plaintiff, in pursuance of an agreement entered into between them, by which Treat agreed to turn over to him the "dairy fixtures" on the place, and to pay in addition thereto the sum of $200. Treat having failed and refused to perform any part of his agreement, the plaintiff handed the keys to his attorney, with instructions to turn them over to Treat, unless he complied with his agreement. The attorney called upon Treat, and made the demand of him, in accordance with such instructions, and, upon Treat failing to accede thereto, offered to return to him the keys, which he refused to accept, saying "that he did not want them; that he had surrendered them, and had no use for them." Afterwards, on the 2d day of September following, plaintiff served written notice on Treat and Pierce, mailed another to Porter, and posted one on the dairy-house on the premises, demanding the payment of the rent or the delivery to him of the possession of the premises on or before the 8th day of September, 1889. Plaintiff re-entered into possession about the last of October following.

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony the defendant Porter moved for a judgment of nonsuit upon the following grounds: "The evidence shows that he is not a party to the lease of plaintiff to Treat and Pierce; that plaintiff refused and never did release Pierce from said lease as lessee, and defendant Porter never executed the same; that the plaintiff never accepted defendant Porter as lessee upon the original lease; that the defendant Porter, as well as the defendant Treat, surrendered the premises within one year from the date of their occupation of said premises upon the terms specified in said lease, having first paid all rents for the use and occupation thereof during said period; that defendant Porter's tenancy as assignee of said Pierce, if the court holds that he was such, before the 1st day of August, 1889, terminated, and he had then ceased to be beneficially or in any way interested in said leasehold, or said premises, the subject thereof; that by mutual consent of the parties the relations of landlord and tenant existing between plaintiff and defendants was determined, and said lease rescinded, and defendants surrendered possession of all the premises, and plaintiff went into possession thereof; that the plaintiff himself elected to rescind and work a forfeiture of said lease, and notified defendants to pay the accruing rent in advance, or to surrender possession of the premises, and did consummate and execute said rescission, and did take possession of said premises; that at the time of the commencement of this action said lease set forth in the complaint was fully rescinded, determined, and canceled, and no cause of action existed for the enforcement of its covenants. The court denied the motion, and the defendant Porter excepted." The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict found in favor of the plaintiff, and from the judgment rendered thereon this appeal is taken by the defendant Porter upon the judgment roll alone.

The only error complained of relates to the ruling of the court denying the motion of the defendant Porter for judgment of nonsuit. Porter's covenant, contained in the assignment to him, "to pay all rent that may fall due from time to time by virtue of the provisions of the lease," and his entry into possession as assignee under the assignment, created the relation of landlord and tenant between him and the lessor, and his holding was by privity of estate, and not by privity of contract, as claimed by respondent. The lessor was not a party to, nor was he in any way benefited by, the contract of assignment. The liability of Porter to the lessor was, therefore, created solely by the covenant of the lease to pay the rent, which is a covenant running with the land, and not by the contract of assignment, the non-performance of which is enforceable only by the lessee. The assignee is answerable for the rent during his ownership of the term under the assignment, and his liability therefor arises out of the privity of estate, and this without reference to any obligation assumed by him in the contract of assignment. Nor did the assignment to Porter and the acceptance by the lessor of him as tenant release Pierce from his covenant to pay the rent, but his liability to the lessor continues, notwithstanding the assignment by privity of contract, to the end of the term of the lease, unless sooner terminated.

The evidence shows that Porter, shortly before the installment of rent sued for became due, abandoned the possession of the premises, and refused to pay the rent, upon the pretext that the plaintiff had failed to furnish, as he agreed to do, the consent of his lessor to the assignment. This, of course, was a mere subterfuge. The contention that by the abandonment of the possession of the premises by Porter he parted with the beneficial interest, and yielded the possession to the beneficial owner, is unsupported by reason or authority. The legal title and the possession of the leasehold were in Treat and Porter, and he (Porter) could only divest himself thereof and dissolve the privity of estate by a reassignment in writing to the lessee, or by assignment of his interest to another, accompanied by surrender of possession, or by the working of a forfeiture of the lease for breach of its covenants, and re-entry for such breach, as provided for by the terms thereof. The surrender of the premises by Treat was conditional, and the condition was never fulfilled, nor was it in writing, as required by the statute of frauds; therefore such surrender did not operate as a dissolution of the tenancy. As the tenancy was only terminated by the lessor's notice to quit or pay the rent, and re-entry of possession under the right reserved by the lease for breach of its covenants, the motion for judgment of nonsuit was properly denied, for the reason that there was evidence tending to show the liability of appellant for that part of the rent at least which had accrued up to the time of the re-entry, and the sufficiency of it was properly left to the jury.

The only error assigned, as we have stated, was the refusal of the court to grant the motion for a nonsuit. As the case was one which had to be submitted to the jury on the evidence, if defendants desired to limit the recovery in any event to the amount of rent which had accrued at the time of the re-entry, it was their duty to ask the court to submit to the jury proper instructions upon that matter. Upon the record before us no error can be predicated. We therefore recommend that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

I concur: VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE V. CHUM CUM YOOK. (No. 20,668.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 2, 1891.)

APPEAL—FAILURE TO FILE BRIEFS—AFFIRMANCE.

Where an appeal is submitted upon briefs to be filed, and the time for filing them has passed, and no briefs are filed by appellant, the judgment appealed from will be affirmed.

BEATTY, C. J. This cause having heretofore been submitted upon briefs to be filed by counsel, and the time within which such briefs were to be filed having long since passed, and no briefs on behalf of appellant having been filed, it is now, therefore, ordered the judgment and orders appealed from be affirmed.

HUGHES v. DUNLAP. (No. 14,114.)
(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 26, 1891.)
TRIAL—REJECTING FINDINGS OF JURY—INJUNCTION AND DAMAGES.

Since, in California, where a legal and an equitable remedy are sought in the same action, each remedy must be governed by the same law that would apply if the other remedy had not been asked, it is error for the court, in an action for an injunction and for past damages, to reject, without motion for a new trial, the findings of the jury as to both remedies, since, in so far as damages are asked, the remedy is legal, and plaintiff is entitled to a jury trial.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; R. E. ARICK, Judge.

Action by Hiram Hughes against Calvin Dunlap for an injunction and damages. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Alvin Fay, for appellant. B. Brundaze, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. In the complaint plaintiff avers that he is the owner and in possession of a large tract of land, valuable mainly for pasturage, for which purpose he has it inclosed by a substantial fence; that "during the last two months" defendant has torn down and destroyed said fence at various points, and threatens to continue to do so, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $5,000. It is further averred that defendant is insolvent, and that if he continues to destroy and keep open said fence, he will cause plaintiff irreparable damage. The prayer is for judgment for $5,000 damage, and an injunction to restrain defendant from continuing said acts. The answer of defendant contains a denial of the averments of the complaint, and for a separate defense avers that there are, and for more than 25 years have been, certain public roads over and through said land; that recently plaintiff had built fences across said public roads; that defendant is road-overseer of the district; and that in discharge of his duties as such he had removed the said fences where they crossed and obstructed said roads, but had not interfered with said fences at any other place. At the trial a jury was impaneled on motion of defendant, and certain issues of fact were referred to the jury concerning the existence of public roads over the land; what damage, if any, was done plaintiff by the acts of defendant, etc. The jury returned a verdict on all such issues favorable to defendant, and found that there were certain public roads where defendant had removed the fences, and that plaintiff had suffered no damage. Afterwards the court made findings in which it states that it "refuses to adopt said findings of the jury, and rejects each and every thereof," and proceeds to find all the issues which had been passed on by the jury the other way and favorably to plaintiff, and finds that plaintiff was damaged by said acts of defendant in the sum of $100. Upon these findings judgment was rendered against defendant for $100 damage and costs, and perpetually enjoining him from opening or interfering with said fences. From this judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

The first point made by appellant is that the court erred in disregarding the verdict of the jury and setting it aside without the proceeding of a motion for a new trial. This point is certainly well taken; so far, at least, as the issue of damages is concerned. It has long since been held that under our system a legal and equitable remedy may be sought in the same action; but each remedy must be governed by the same law that would apply to it if the other remedy had not also been asked for. An action to recover damages for past trespasses is as clearly a legal remedy as any that could be named, and it is an action in which a party cannot be deprived of a jury trial. For this reason, therefore, the judgment and order must be reversed.

The question whether or not the defendant was entitled to have other issues in the case submitted to a jury has not been discussed by counsel for appellant; and it is a question too important to be finally disposed of without the fullest argument and consideration. There is a disposition to assume that the right to a jury trial is determined entirely by the form of action which the plaintiff chooses to adopt. We had occasion, in Donahue v. Meister, (Cal.) 25 Pac. Rep. 1096, to say that such a position is not tenable. If two coterminous owners of land have a dispute about the ownership of a piece of land lying along the common boundary, and one brings an action of ejectment to recover it, undoubtedly the other would be entitled to a jury on the trial of the cause. But suppose he chooses to bring an action for an injunction, averring that the other party is cutting timber, or committing some other waste, on the disputed territory, and praying to have him enjoined from so doing, without asking for damages; would the defendant, in that case, be deprived of the right to a jury trial? In the case at bar, if the plaintiff had merely asked for damages caused by the alleged acts of the defendant, the action would have been the common action of trespass; in which defendant, of course, would have been entitled to a jury. Does the fact that he also prayed for an injunction take away from him the right to have the real issues of fact tried by a jury? Of course, it is always for the judge sitting as a chancellor to determine whether, when certain rights are established, he will grant an equitable remedy prayed for, or compel a party to be satisfied with his legal remedy; but when the asserted rights upon which any remedy must rest are legal rights, and cognizable in a court of law, must not those rights be determined according to the methods of a common-law court? And, in such a case, can a party be deprived of his constitutional privilege of a jury? "The writ of injunction, being largely a preventive remedy, will not ordinarily be granted when the parties are in dispute concerning their legal rights, until the right is established at law; and if the right for which protection is sought is dependent upon disputed questions of law which have never been settled by the courts of the state, and concerning which there is an actual and existing dispute, equity will withhold relief until the questions of law have been determined by the proper courts." High, Inj. § 8. In Pom. Eq. Jur. § 116, it is said, on the subject of the blending of legal and equitable remedies under our system, as follows: "A complete amalgamation, however, is not possible, so long as the jury trial is retained in legal actions. There is certainly no impossibility, nor even difficulty, in requiring a jury to decide the issues of fact upon which the right to many kinds of equitable remedies depends. This is the province of a jury in legal actions; the court pronouncing the judgment upon their verdict. A jury is clearly incompetent to frame and deliver a decree according to the doctrines and methods of equity; but there can be no real obstacle in the way of its ascertaining the facts by its verdict, and leaving the court to shape the decree and award the relief based upon these facts, in many species of equitable remedies."

We have made the above remarks and quotations for the purpose of calling attention to the subject; for the right of a jury trial in cases in form equitable has not been very clearly defined. The action for trespass upon real property, with a prayer for an injunction, was very common in the early history of this state. It was frequently used to determine mining and water rights, and it was generally conceded that either party had the right to a jury trial. See Gates v. Kieff, 7 Cal. 124; Mining Co. v. Clarkin, 14 Cal. 543; More v. Massini, 32 Cal. 594. The general subject is, no doubt, full of difficulties, and we have thus alluded to it, so that we may not be considered as holding, in the case at bar, that the issue of damages is the only one as to which the appellant was entitled to a jury. There are no other points in the case necessary to be noticed. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

JOHNSON v. KING et al. (No. 14,321.)

FORECLOSURE—DEFICIENCY JUDGMENT—APPEAL—BOND—LIABILITY OF SURETY.

Where a deficiency judgment on foreclosure was rendered against the mortgagor, and an appeal was taken by a defendant who was in possession and desired to prevent a sale pending the appeal, the surety on an appeal-bond, stipulating that appellant will pay any deficiency arising on the foreclosure sale, is liable for such deficiency under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 945, providing that a judgment of foreclosure shall not be stayed unless there be an undertaking "on the part of the appellant" that he will not commit waste during his possession of the property, and that, "when the judgment is for the sale of mortgaged premises, and the payment of a deficiency arising upon the sale, the undertaking must also provide for the payment of such deficiency."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge.

Action by Nat Johnson against King and others on an appeal-bond. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. R. Gray, for appellants. Harris & Gregg, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action against the sureties on an undertaking on appeal. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff on the pleadings, and defendants appeal. The action on which the undertaking was given was brought by plaintiff herein against one Winders, one McDuffee, and several other defendants, to foreclose a mortgage executed by said Winders to plaintiff. McDuffee was in possession of the mortgaged premises at the time the action was commenced. Judgment was rendered in that action, foreclosing the mortgage against all the defendants, with the usual provisions for a deficiency judgment against the mortgagor. McDuffee appealed from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial; and for the purpose of staying execution the defendants in the present action executed an undertaking in the statutory form on the part of said McDuffee, in which they undertook that, if the judgment should be affirmed, or the appeal dismissed, "said appellant will pay any deficiency arising upon the sale of the premises described in said judgment." The judgment and order appealed from were afterwards affirmed, and after the sale of the premises there was a deficiency within the penal sum of the undertaking, for which the judgment in the case at bar was rendered.

The only point made by appellant which seems necessary to be noticed is that, because McDuffee was not the mortgagor in the foreclosure suit, and because no deficiency judgment could be rendered against him, therefore the parties on the undertaking are not liable to pay such deficiency. It seems to be contended that such an undertaking can be legally given only by the party against whom the deficiency judgment could be rendered. But the undertaking is an independent obligation, founded on the provisions of the statute which apply to the "appellant," whoever he may be. Section 945, Code Civil Proc. provides that a judgment of foreclosure shall not be stayed unless there be an undertaking "on the part of the appellant * * * to the effect that during the possession of such property by the appellant he will not commit waste," etc.; and that, "when the judgment is for the sale of mortgaged premises and the payment of a deficiency arising upon the sale, the undertaking must also provide for the payment of such deficiency." This language clearly applies to a defendant who appeals, whether he be the mortgagor or a party who claims the mortgaged premises and desires to prevent a sale and enjoy the property during the pendency of the appeal. There are no other points made by appellants which require special notice. Judgment affirmed.

FOSS et al. v. HINKELL. (No. 14,014.)

PUBLIC LANDS—MEXICAN GRANTS—LANDS SUB JUDICE.

Where the claim to the Mexican grant of Rancho San Jose was confirmed in 1854, and its boundaries established, the lands, being within the exterior limits of the claimed grant, but outside the fixed boundaries, were not sub judice, because the patent was not issued until 1875; and a patent of such outlying lands, issued to the S.

P. R. Co., under Acts Cong. July 27, 1866, and March 3, 1871, is valid. McFARLAND, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action of ejectment by Carrie L. Foss and Frank Foss against Joseph Hinkell. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs moved for a new trial, which being denied, they appealed from the judgment and the order denying the motion. Reversed.

Edwin Baxter, for appellants. Will D. Gould and James H. Blanc, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Upon the former appeal in this case (78 Cal. 158, 20 Pac. Rep. 393) the cause was remanded, with directions to the court below "to find on the testimony already introduced, and such further testimony as may be introduced by either party, whether or not the land in suit was, on the 3d day of April, 1871, within the exterior boundaries of the Rancho San Jose, as granted by the Mexican government, and on such findings to enter judgment." In pursuance of this direction, the court, upon such evidence as was offered upon this issue at the subsequent trial, found "that the land in suit was, on the 3d day of April, 1871, within the exterior boundaries of the Rancho San Jose, as granted by the Mexican government," and rendered judgment for the defendant. Plaintiffs moved for a new trial, and from the order denying their motion, as well as from the judgment, they have appealed to this court.

It is insisted upon the part of the respondent that this court, by the following language, used in its opinion upon the former appeal, viz.: "What the exterior limits of such granted rancho were must be determined by the expediente of the grant issued by the Mexican government, including petition, diseño, and grant, the boundaries designated in which may be identified by parol evidence,"—thereby limited the testimony upon which the court below was to make its finding upon this issue. These were, however, words of definition, rather than of enumeration, and must be read in connection with the subsequent direction to the court to make its finding "on the testimony already introduced, and such further testimony as may be introduced by either party." The former appeal was taken upon the judgment roll alone, and, as the "testimony already introduced" was not then before this court, it cannot be presumed that it intended to make any reference to the character of the evidence already taken, or to limit the character of the "further testimony" which might be introduced by either party for the purpose of enabling the court below to make its finding upon this issue. It then appeared from the findings that on the 3d day of April, 1871, the date when the route of the Southern Pacific Railroad was definitely located, the land in question was within the "claimed exterior limits" of a valid Mexican grant of the Rancho San Jose, and by reason thereof was sub judice. This finding was based upon another finding that by the Thompson survey, made in 1868, the lands in controversy were included within the exterior limits of said rancho until said survey was rejected in 1875: while by the Hancock survey, which had been previously made, and which was afterwards substantially approved, and a patent thereon issued in 1875, the lands were excluded from the exterior limits of the rancho. This court, in its opinion, held that whether the land in controversy was sub judice was the ultimate fact which the court below should have found, saying: "The exterior limits of the rancho do not depend on any survey made of it." The record then before this court did not disclose the character of the grant,—whether it was a grant of quantity within exterior limits, or a grant of a specific tract, either by name or with definite boundaries; and the court, in its direction, did nothing more than indicate that the issue could be found upon any competent evidence.

By the record which is now brought before us on this appeal it appears that the grant was of a specific tract of which juridical possession had been given by the Mexican government, and that the final decree of confirmation by the United States was of the land embraced within the boundaries described in said juridical possession. From the testimony before the court it appeared that in April, 1837, the Mexican government made a grant to Ygnacio Palomares and Ricardo Vejar of the "place called 'San Jose,'" and that in August of that year juridical possession thereof was given them, with the following specific boundaries, viz.: "Commencing at the foot of a black willow tree, which was taken for a corner, and between the limbs of which a dry stick was placed in the form of a cross; thence from east towards the west 9,700 varas to the foot of the hills called 'Las Lomas de la Puente,' taking for a landmark a large walnut tree on the slope of a small hill on the side of the road which passes from the said San Jose to La Puente, making a cut [caladura] on one of its limbs with a hatchet; thence in a direction about from south to north 10,400 varas to the arroyo [creek] of San Jose, opposite a high hill, where a large oak was taken as a boundary, in which they fixed the head of a beet, and chopped some of its limbs; thence in a direction from west to east 10,600 varas to the arroyo [creek] of San Antonio, taking for a corner some young cotton-wood trees which are near each other, marking crosses in the bark; thence about from north to south 9,700 varas to the foot of the black willow, the place of beginning." In 1852 the grantees presented to the land commission their petition for a confirmation of the grant, and on the 31st of January, 1854, the commission adjudged the claim to be valid. From this decision the United States took an appeal to the district court for the southern district of California, and that court affirmed the decision of the land commission, in its decree specifically designating the lands of which confirmation was made by the same boundaries as those given by the act of juridical possession. The attorney general having given notice that the United States would not prosecute an appeal therefrom, the district court, at its December term, 1858, decreed that the claimants might proceed upon its said decree as upon a final decree, and thereafter, viz., January 20, 1875, a patent for said lands was issued to the claimants.

Upon this testimony, as soon as it was shown to the court that the land in controversy is not included within the lines of the patent, the court should have found that it was not, on the 3d day of April, 1871, "within the boundaries of the Rancho San Jose, as granted by the Mexican government." The only lands which were "granted" by the Mexican government are those which were included within the natural boundaries fixed by the juridical possession. That was a segregation or location by the Mexican government, and a determination by that government of the land within the limits of the diseño, which it had granted, and was binding upon this government. "By this proceeding—called in the language of the country 'the delivery of juridical possession'—the land was separated from the public domain, and what was previously a grant of quantity became a grant of a specific tract. The record of a proceeding of this nature must necessarily control the action of the officers of the United States in surveying land claimed under a confirmed Mexican grant." Graham v. U. S., 4 Wall, 259. "This proceeding involved an ascertainment and settlement of the boundaries of the lands granted by the appropriate officers of the government specially designated for that purpose, and has all the force and efficacy of a judicial determination to bind the former government, and is equally binding upon the officers of our government." U. S. v. Pico, 5 Wall, 536. "Where the original grant does not locate the subject of the grant, as where a number of square leagues is granted to be located within a certain district, the delivery of possession within the district renders the title complete, and defines the location of the grant. The cases referred to by the plaintiff were grants of specific ranches, plantations, or places having well-known names; and the boundaries designated in the acts of possession ascertained their actual extent and limits, and hence were controlling when a question of title arose." Pinkerton v. Ledoux, 129 U. S. 346, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 399. In the decree of confirmation, rendered by the district court, these lands were specifically described by the same natural boundaries as those designated in the act of juridical possession; and this decree was a final determination by the United States that these boundaries were the exterior limits of the grant, and that the lands outside of those limits were, so far as the claimants were concerned, public land. "Where the grant was by metes and bounds, or where proceedings before the Mexican authorities, such as took place upon a juridical delivery of possession, had established the boundaries, or where from any other source, pending the proceedings for a confirmation, the boundaries were indicated, it was proper for the board to declare them in its decrees." U. S. v. Sepulveda, 1 Wall. 104. Where the decree of confirmation is by metes and bounds, the survey must conform to the decree. Higuera v. U. S., 5 Wall. 827. "The decree is a finality, not only on the question of title, but as to the boundaries which it specifies." U. S. v. Halleck, 1 Wall. 439. The subsequent survey, upon which the patent was issued, was the ascertainment of these natural boundaries. It was necessary that they should be delineated upon the surface of the earth with their relation to the sectional lines of the government surveys before the patent could issue, but the issuance of the patent upon the lines of that survey became the authentic record that those lines were the correct boundaries of the grant as made by the Mexican government. Although the patent was not issued until 1875, yet the boundaries of the land for which it was issued were definitely fixed when the district court rendered its decree of confirmation, and at no time thereafter was the land in question sub judice.

This evidence, viz., the act of juridical possession, the decree of confirmation, in which the land confirmed was specifically described, and the patent issued thereon, was conclusive upon the court in determining the issue before it. All the other evidence that was offered could have no weight or effect in impairing its conclusiveness. By the expediente it appeared that the land granted was a place within the boundaries of the diseño; and after the juridical possession was given, the diseño ceased to have any function in determining the land that was granted, but for all purposes connected with the grant was merged in the act of juridical possession. Neither the Hancock survey nor the Thompson survey, nor the evidence of any surveyor, was competent to defeat the effect of the patent, or to show that any lands not included therein had been granted by the Mexican government, for the reason that it had already been established by the decree of the court that only the lands embraced in the patent had been so granted. It may be observed with reference to the testimony of the surveyors Moore and Bernell, that they did not testify that the land in question was within the boundaries of the juridical possession, or of the land described in the decree of the district court; their testimony being that it was within the limits of the diseño, the map of partition, and the Thompson survey.

It is urged by the respondent that notwithstanding it appears from the terms of the decree of confirmation, as well as from the patent, that the Rancho San Jose, "as granted," did not include the land in controversy, yet the grant including this land was sub judice until the final rejection of the Thompson survey, for the reason that it was included therein, and therefore was claimed to be within the exterior limits of the grant. We cannot assent to this proposition. Lands are not sub judice unless the claim to them is pending and undetermined before some tribunal competent to pass upon their validity. The question of the extent to which a claim for lands under a Mexican grant would render them sub judice was discussed in Doolan v. Carr, 125 U. S. 618, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1228, and in the opinion of the court in that case Justice MILLER says: "Those Mexican claims were often described, or attempted to be described, by specific boundaries. They were often claims for a definite quantity of land within much larger out-boundaries, and they were frequently described by the name of a place or ranch. To the extent of the claim, when the grant was for land with specific boundaries, or known by a particular name, and to the extent of the quantity claimed within out-boundaries containing a greater area, they are excluded from the grant to the railroad company. Indeed, this exclusion did not depend upon the validity of the claim asserted, or its final establishment, but upon the fact that there existed a claim of a right under a grant by the Mexican government which was yet undetermined, and to which, therefore, the phrase 'public lands' could not attach, and which the statute did not include, although it might be found within limits prescribed on each side of the road when located." From this opinion it will be seen that the claim, in order to render the land sub judice, must be based upon a right yet undetermined, and must also be limited to the lands within the boundaries of the grant, whether it be for quantity or for a specific tract. The mere claim that lands are within the exterior limits of a grant, after there has been a final determination that they are not so included, will not make them sub judice. As a claim for lands outside of the exterior boundaries of a grant of quantity would have no effect, so, where the grant is for a place with specific boundaries, no right can be created by a claim for lands not included within those boundaries. In the ordinary case of a grant of quantity within exterior limits the claim will embrace all the lands within those boundaries until the segregation of the quantity which was granted by the Mexican government, for until then, although the validity of the claim has been established, its extent has not been fixed. In U. S. v. McLaughlin, 127 U. S. 428, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1177, it was held that in such a case the treaty obligations of the government are satisfied so long as it reserves within these exterior limits a quantity sufficient to satisfy the claim, and that in the mean time the United States may make valid grants of the residue. When, however, the grant is of all the land within certain natural boundaries, or when juridical possession with natural boundaries has been given of the land granted, the claim must be limited to the land within those boundaries; and when the boundaries, as well as the validity of the grant, have been determined by the decree of confirmation, the claim is thereafter limited to those boundaries. By such decree the claim passes into a judgment, and the subsequent survey is but the execution of that judgment. The Fossat Case, 2 Wall. 649. In the present case the lands in controversy are more than a mile distant from the lines established in the decree, and there could be no bona fide claim that they could be included within any survey of the grant as defined in the decree of confirmation. It follows that after the decree of confirmation of the Rancho San Jose became final, in 1858, no claim under that grant to any lands outside of the boundaries named in the decree would render them sub judice, or prevent their passing to the railroad company on the 3d day of April, 1871, as a portion of the public land granted to it by the United States. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to make the finding directed by this court at the former trial, in conformity with the principles contained in this opinion, and thereupon to enter judgment.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; PATERSON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

MCFARLAND, J. I dissent, and adhere to the opinion rendered in department, February 2, 1891, affirming the judgment. 25 Pac. Rep. 762. On the former appeal (78 Cal. 158, 20 Pac. Rep. 393) this court reversed the judgment, with directions to the court below to find on the one issue whether the land in contest was within the exterior boundaries of the Rancho San Jose, as granted by the Mexican government; and it stated certain principles by which the lower court should be governed in determining that issue. The court below followed those directions, and was governed by those principles, and found that said land was within said boundaries; and I do not think that the evidence was insufficient to support that finding. It may be the law that the exception in railroad grants applies only to Mexican grants, which expressly designate a certain quantity of land within larger exterior boundaries; and it may be that in other cases, where the boundaries named in the original grant are uncertain and vague, although the grant has been in good faith claimed, possessed, and recognized up to certain lines for more than a quarter of a century, still the railroad grant will take all that is excluded from the final United States patent. The opposite views of this question are fully presented in the two separate opinions of Judges SAWYER and ROSS (involving this same San Jose grant) in U. S. v. Railroad Co., 14 Sawy. 620, 45 Fed. Rep. 596; and I do not think that it has been yet definitely settled by Doolan v. Carr, or any other adjudicated case. But that question need not be discussed in the case at bar, for the law of this case was declared on the former appeal. I think that the judgment should be affirmed.

MARSH v. HENDY, (LANGLEY et al., Interveners. No. 14,147.)

SWAMP LAND—APPLICATION BEFORE SEGREGATION—ACTUAL SETTLERS.

1. The swamp lands granted to the state are not subject to application for purchase until they have been segregated to the state by a United States survey, and an application filed prior to such segregation confers no rights on the applicant. Buchanan v. Nagle, 26 Pac. Rep. 512.

2. Const. Cal. art. 17, § 3, providing that state lands which are "suitable for cultivation" shall be granted only to actual settlers, applies to swamp lands granted to the state when such lands are suitable for cultivation, and can be reclaimed and cultivated by an actual settler. Fulton v. Brannan, 26 Pac. Rep. 506, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Action by Archibald Marsh against John H. Hendy to determine a contest as to the right to purchase from the state certain swamp lands. J. R. Langley and others intervene. Judgment being entered in the court below against both plaintiff and defendant, each moved for a new trial, which being refused, they appeal from the judgment and orders denying the motions. Affirmed.

Freeman & Gates, for appellant. Garber & Bishop, for respondent. W. B. Wallace, for interveners.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to determine a contest, arising in the state land-office, as to the right to purchase from the state a certain section of swamp and overflowed land in Tulare county. During the pendency of the action other parties were permitted to intervene for the purpose of showing that neither the plaintiff nor defendant was entitled to make the purchase. After trial the court below found, among other things, that when the defendant made his application to purchase the section in controversy the land had not been segregated as swamp and overflowed land by authority of the United States; that when the plaintiff made his application to purchase the section the land was, and ever since had been, suitable for cultivation; that neither the plaintiff nor defendant had ever been an actual settler upon the land; and, as a conclusion of law, that neither of them was entitled to purchase the same from the state. Judgment was accordingly so entered. Both parties moved for a new trial, and their motions were denied, and they then appealed from the judgment and orders denying their motions. Since the appeals were taken several other cases involving all the questions arising herein have been considered and passed upon by this court. See Wren v. Mangan, 88 Cal. 274, 26 Pac. Rep. 100; Fulton v. Brannan, 88 Cal. 454, 26 Pac. Rep. 506; McNee v. Lynch, 88 Cal. 519, 26 Pac. Rep. 508; Buchanan v. Nagle, 88 Cal. 591, 26 Pac. Rep. 512; Belcher v. Farren, 26 Pac. Rep. 791. These cases are decisive of this, and upon their authority we advise that the judgment and orders appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C., VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

MONTGOMERY v. SAYRE. (No. 13,911.)
(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 15, 1891.)

SETTING ASIDE SPECIAL FINDINGS.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 625, provides that, in an action for the recovery of money only, or specific real property, the jury, in their discretion, may render a general or special verdict. Section 624 declares that a special verdict is that by which the jury find the facts only, leaving the judgment to the court. Section 662 provides that the verdict of a jury may be vacated and a new trial granted by the court on its own motion, when there has been such a plain disregard by the jury of the instructions of the court or the evidence in the case as to satisfy the court that the verdict was rendered under a misapprehension of such instructions, or under the influence of passion or prejudice. Held, that where, in an action on a note, the record shows that, after the jury had made special findings fatal to plaintiff's recovery, the trial proceeded before the judge upon issues not submitted to the jury, and more evidence was introduced, the judge had no authority, in the absence of an express waiver of the findings by defendant, to set them aside, and render judgment for plaintiff, without first granting a new trial. 25 Pac. Rep. 552, reversed.

In bank. On rehearing.

Action on a promissory note by A. Montgomery against A. L. Sayre, executor. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed. A rehearing was granted. Reversed. For prior report, see 25 Pac. Rep. 552.

GAROUTTE, J. This cause was originally decided by the court in department, and, a rehearing having been granted, it is now before the court in bank. It was an action on a promissory note executed by defendant's testator to the plaintiff. It was given to secure the payment of the note of the Pioneer Gold Mining Company to the plaintiff for $110,000. This last note was indorsed by William S. Chapman. It was further secured by a mortgage on the Pioneer mine, executed by said company. The above facts appear, and are not disputed. It further appears that there was a prior mortgage executed by the company on the Pioneer mine, on which a suit for foreclosure was brought, and in this suit the plaintiff, who was one of the defendants therein, filed a cross-complaint, asking that his mortgage be foreclosed. This was done, and an order of sale issued directing the proceeds of the sale of the mine under the decree to be applied, first, to the payment of the prior mortgage, and the remainder upon the plaintiff's mortgage. The sheriff's return of sale showed a deficiency due on the second debt to plaintiff amounting to $61,534.13. Judgment for this deficiency was docketed against the mortgagor company and W. S. Chapman. This action was brought on the note to recover the amount claimed to be due thereon, to be paid by defendant in due course of administration. It is set up in the answer that the $110,000 note had been fully paid, and it was denied that any sum remained due and unpaid thereon. Other allegations of the complaint were denied. These need not be stated.

As an affirmative defense, the defendant set up by his answer the following: "(1) That a transcript of the docket of the deficiency judgment docketed against the Pioneer Mining Company and W. S. Chapman, the maker and indorser of the mortgage note, was filed with the recorder of Fresno county in November, 1887, and thus the judgment became a lien upon all the real property of said W. S. Chapman in said Fresno county. (2) That at and before the filing of said transcript Chapman owned certain real property described, situated in said county, which was held in the name of W. F. Goad, trustee for plaintiff, Montgomery, for further security for debts due Montgomery from Chapman. (3) That the said lien of said judgment was never enforced against said property of said Chapman, but that said Montgomery, Chapman, and Goad, after the death of said A. L. Sayre, sold and conveyed by deed to Thomas E. Hughes all of said real property for $95,000, paid by Hughes to Montgomery, which was received by Montgomery as payment from Chapman to him in full for all obligations, except the judgment aforesaid, which then amounted to less than $36,000, and that Montgomery thereupon released said land from the lien of said judgment. (4) That said real estate was then worth $140,000, and if sold at its real value would have realized enough to pay all debts due Montgomery from Chapman, including said deficiency judgment. (5) That said Montgomery released said land from the lien of said judgment, and released said Chapman from the obligation of said judgment, without the consent of defendant."

The case was tried by a jury on the 24th of April, 1889, and the following verdict rendered: "Question 1. What was the value, May 15, 1888, of the following lands, viz., [referring to the lands of Chapman in Fresno county]? Answer. $136,800. C. C. HARRIS, Foreman. Q. 2. Did the plaintiff, A. Montgomery, on or about May 15, 1888, release W. S. Chapman from all liability under the judgment in the complaint herein mentioned? A. Yes. C. C. HARRIS, Foreman."

This verdict, it appears, was in answer to special questions, embracing special issues, submitted to the jury by the questions above given. There was no other verdict, and no general verdict, nor does it appear that any general verdict was demanded by either party. It appears from the record that the trial proceeded after the return of the verdict, both parties introduced evidence, and on the 24th and 25th of April, 1889, it is stated, "said trial was completed, and submitted to the court for decision and judgment, with the privilege to the parties to file briefs herein, which was done." The court subsequently rendered its decision finding on all the issues in the case, disregarding the verdict, treating it as non-existent, and in fact finding contrary to the answers of the jury on the questions submitted to them, and rendered judgment for plaintiff for a sum of money. The defendant appeals from such judgment.

The foregoing facts are taken from the record, and upon them the merits of this appeal must be determined. The findings of fact by the court upon which the judgment in this action is based are directly opposed to the special findings of the jury. The jury found that the lands of Chapman in Fresno county were worth $136,800. The court found that $95,000 was the reasonable value of said lands. The jury found that plaintiff, A. Montgomery, did release W. S. Chapman from all liability under the judgment in the complaint mentioned. The court found that plaintiff, Montgomery, did not agree to release, and did not release, said Chapman from all or any liability under said judgment. These are vital issues in the action, for Sayre was in law a surety, and "a guarantor is exonerated, except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal, in respect thereto, in any way impaired or suspended." Section 2819, Civil Code. And section 2840, subd. 1, provides that "a surety is exonerated in like manner with a guarantor."

If the court had the power to make the findings that it made upon these questions, then the judgment has ample support, but, if the verdict rendered is to be given any effect, then the judgment must be for the defendant. This is an action for the recovery of money, an action strictly at law, the defenses are legal defenses, and the verdict cannot be deemed as merely advisory to the court, as is the practice in equity cases. It seems from the record that all the issues involved in the case were not submitted to the jury, and for that reason the verdict may be termed an incomplete and imperfect special verdict. Section 624, Code Civil Proc.¹ If the court had adopted the special findings of the jury, and then had proceeded to take evidence and make findings upon the remaining issues in the case, and had made its judgment based upon all of such findings, it would have been presumed that a jury had been expressly waived as to the issues tried and determined by the court. This was the status of the record in Shepherd v. Jones, 71 Cal. 224, 16 Pac. Rep. 711, and the court said: "Conceding that this method of procedure was irregular, still no objection appears to have been taken to it by either side, and we must presume that it was adopted by consent." This being an action at law, the defendant was entitled to have the issues made tried by a jury. A jury was impaneled, tried some of these issues, and found facts fatal to plaintiff's right of recovery; and it is only upon the one theory that, after this verdict was rendered, defendant stipulated that it should be set aside, a jury trial waived, and the entire cause tried by the court, that the judgment in this action can be sustained. If the question were, did the defendant waive his right to a trial by jury? the record being silent upon the question, and the case having been tried and determined by the court, there would be no difficulty, for the authorities are explicit to the end that such would be the presumption. Tunnel Co. v. McKenzie, 67 Cal. 490, 8 Pac. Rep. 22. But this is not a question of a waiver of a jury trial, for a jury was had, evidence taken, and a verdict rendered upon vital issues. This court will indulge in all proper intendment necessary in order to support the validity of a judgment where an appeal is presented to us solely upon the judgment roll; but we think upon the face of this record there is sufficient to indicate that this trial in the lower court took not only a novel, but inconsistent and unlawful, course. To support this judgment we are required to presume that defendant voluntarily relinquished the verdict of a jury, which verdict formed a perfect legal defense to plaintiff's right of recovery, then waived a trial by jury, and risked the chances of adverse findings upon the same issues with others by the judge. We think the presumption violent, and entirely too weak to form a foundation upon which to test the merits of a cause involving large property rights.

A fair interpretation of the recitals in the record is that both parties proceeded and introduced evidence upon the issues not submitted to the jury, but which were necessary to a full and final determination of the cause, in accordance with Shepherd v. Jones, supra. If such were the fact, this verdict was alive at the conclusion of the evidence, and could only have been rendered nugatory by some act of the court subsequent to that event, and, allowing the court all the power that the law allows, it was still wanting in power to render a judgment at the time contrary to the verdict. Section 662 of the Code of Civil Procedure¹ provides "that a verdict of a jury may be vacated and a new trial granted by the court in which the action is pending on its own motion, when," etc. In this case a jury was impaneled, and a verdict rendered as to certain issues, and it is unnecessary to closely scrutinize that verdict to ascertain whether it is defective and informal, or complete and perfect. It was the verdict of a jury placed in the box to try the cause, and it cannot be disregarded until set aside and vacated by the court. And we have already seen the court made findings directly contrary to this verdict, and this action of the court was, in effect, to vacate and set it aside. It is immaterial whether such action was had by reason of defects and informalities in the verdict, or whether the evidence was such as to indicate that it was rendered through passion or prejudice; the result would be the same, and that result would be that a new trial should have been ordered. Such is necessarily the law, for if it were otherwise parties would be deprived of their right to a trial by jury. When the court set aside and vacated the verdict it was its duty to order a new trial. It had no power to proceed to determine the cause. "As the court cannot enter a verdict contrary to the will of the jury," (Hine v. Robbins, 8 Conn. 347,) so it cannot substitute its judgment for theirs, and assume the power to decide issues of fact once submitted to the jury. We conclude, therefore, that the verdict was set aside and vacated by the court, and that the court had no power to proceed and determine the cause, but should have ordered a new trial. Let the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

VISHER V. SMITH et al. (No. 14,104.)

CLAIM AND DELIVERY—PLEADING—TITLE AND POSSESSION.

1. In an action against warehousemen to recover a quantity of barley, the complaint alleged that plaintiff delivered the barley to defendants for storage, and set out the warehouse receipt, which recited that the barley was deliverable to plaintiff on return of the receipt; that plaintiff tendered the storage charges; and that on a certain day he presented the receipt to defendants, and demanded a return of the barley, which defendants refused, without giving any reason therefor. Held, that the complaint was not objectionable on the ground that it did not allege that plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession, since it stated the particular facts which entitled him to possession, and thus specially pleaded his title.

2. Where the complaint set forth the receipt and contract of defendants to deliver the barley, and alleged defendants' refusal to redeliver on demand without their offering any excuse, the complaint is not subject to the objection that it does not allege that, at the commencement of the action, defendants were actually or constructively in possession of the property.

Commissioners' decision. Department

1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; JOSEPH H. BUDD, Judge.

Action by P. Visher against J. W. Smith and H. E. Wright, copartners, for the possession or price of a quantity of barley stored with the defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Carter & Smith, for appellant. Loutitt, Woods & Levinsky, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, C. The complaint in this action substantially alleges that the defendants were at the times named therein engaged as copartners in the business of warehousemen, and as such doing a general storage business. That "prior to the 3d day of July, 1888," plaintiff delivered to the defendants for storage, and stored with them, 1,040 sacks of barley, in consideration and acknowledgment of which the defendants then and there executed to plaintiff a receipt and contract in the words and figures following, to-wit:

"No. 36. Stockton, Cal., July 3, 1888.

"Received on storage in Bagg's warehouse, awaiting transportation for account of P. Visher, the following described merchandise, at the rate of $0.75 per ton, for the season ending June 1, 1889, deliverable (damage by the elements excepted) only on the return of this receipt and charges paid.

¹ Code Civil Proc. § 662, provides that the verdict of a jury may also be vacated and a new trial granted by the court on its own motion, "where there has been such a plain disregard by the jury of the instructions of the court, or the evidence in the case, as to satisfy the court that the verdict was rendered under a misapprehension of such instructions, or under the influence of passion or prejudice."

—That plaintiff is now, and ever since its delivery to him by defendants has been, the owner and holder of said receipt. That storage was paid by plaintiff on the barley for the season ending June 1, 1889. That on or about the 2d day of September, 1890, he produced said receipt, and presented it to the defendants, without any indorsement thereon, and in the same condition as when executed, and at the same time tendered to them all charges due for storage on said barley for the seasons ending June 1, 1890, and June 1, 1891, and then and there demanded the delivery of the barley to him, also offering to surrender and give up the receipt upon the delivery thereof. The defendants refused to deliver the barley without giving any excuse or reason therefor. Plaintiff demands judgment against the defendants for the recovery of the possession of the barley, or for the sum of $1,350, the alleged value thereof, in case delivery cannot be had. The complaint was demurred to on the ground that it "does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The demurrer was sustained by the court, and, upon plaintiff refusing to amend his complaint, judgment final was rendered in favor of the defendants. The case comes here by appeal upon the judgment roll alone. It is objected by respondents that the complaint is insufficient, "because it contains no averment that at the time of the commencement of the action plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property claimed." The complaint, instead of alleging generally that plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the immediate and exclusive possession of the barley, states the particular facts which entitle him to such possession, and thus specially pleads his title thereto.

It is further objected "that the complaint does not allege that defendants at the time of the commencement of the action were in the possession, either actually or constructively, of the property claimed." The possession of the barley by the defendants, and their obligation to redeliver, is shown by the receipt and contract set out in the complaint, from which, and their subsequent refusal to deliver it upon plaintiff's demand without giving any excuse or reason therefor, the law will presume the barley to have been in the defendants' possession at the time of the commencement of the action, and the wrongful detention thereof follows as a necessary conclusion from the refusal to deliver under such circumstances. While the complaint is not in all respects as artificially drawn nor as precise and direct in its statement of facts as it might have been, and while there are defects of form that could have been taken advantage of by special demurrer, still, upon the facts stated, we are of the opinion that the complaint is sufficient as against a general demurrer. We therefore recommend that the judgment be reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

McDANIEL et al. v. PATTISON et al. (No. 14,280.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 16, 1891.)

EQUITY JURISDICTION—PROBATE OF WILL—SETTING ASIDE DEED.

A bill in chancery by certain devisees of a will alleged that another devisee fraudulently suppressed the will, and altered a deed, whereby testator had conveyed to him a small portion of land, so as to include the entire property of the testator, and demanded that the deed be set aside and the property distributed in accordance with the will, which, it was alleged, could not be probated under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1339, providing that no will shall be proved as lost or destroyed unless its provisions are clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses. Held, that the chancery court has no jurisdiction to probate a will, though such relief is sought only incidentally to the main equitable relief; and the fact that the devisees are also heirs at law will not enable them to obtain the relief demanded, since, having alleged a will, their rights arise only from it.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKINLEY, Judge.

Action by Sarah E. McDaniel and others against J. H. W. Pattison and another, to set aside certain deeds, etc. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. L. Murphey and Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, for appellants. Chapman & Hendricks, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiffs are the daughter and children of another daughter of A. M. Pattison, deceased, and the defendants are the widow and son of said deceased. This was an action to cancel and annul certain deeds, to-wit: (1) A deed executed by A. M. Pattison (now deceased) to J. H. W. Pattison, except as to two certain lots in the Orchard tract; (2) a deed executed by defendant J. H. W. Pattison and wife to defendant Mary Pattison, widow of A. M. Pattison, deceased; (3) a deed executed by Mary Pattison, widow, to J. H. W. Pattison. In addition to the foregoing, plaintiffs also asked that the property belonging to A. M. Pattison at the time of his death be declared vested in the plaintiffs and defendants, as follows: "That said Mary Pattison, widow, shall have a life-estate therein, and after her death that the same shall vest in the children of herself and said deceased in equal undivided one-third interests." There is other relief prayed for, concerning an accounting for moneys of the said deceased, held by J. H. W. Pattison, unnecessary to mention in detail.

Among other matters, the complaint alleges "that A. M. Pattison died April 5, 1885, a resident of Los Angeles county, Cal., and plaintiffs and defendants are his heirs at law; that upon the 4th of March, 1885, said Pattison was seised in fee of valuable real estate in Los Angeles city, and in Carthage, Mo.; that on the 5th day of September, 1884, said Pattison made a will, by which all of his property was left to his widow for life, and after her death to pass in three equal shares, one to plaintiff McDaniel, one to plaintiffs the children of a deceased daughter, and the third to defendant J. H. W. Pattison; that said will was his last will and testament, was unrevoked at the time of his death, and has not been probated, but was fraudulently destroyed or suppressed by defendant J. H. W. Pattison; that upon the 4th day of March, 1885, said deceased made a deed to defendant J. H. W. Pattison, conveying two lots in the Orchard tract, and said defendant fraudulently altered said deed, so as to include all the real estate of his father, said Pattison, deceased, both in Missouri and California; that afterwards, said defendant Pattison made a deed to his mother, defendant Mary Pattison, purporting to convey all of the property fraudulently inserted in the said prior deed, and that subsequently thereto the mother, Mary Pattison, made a deed purporting to convey a portion of said property back to her son, the said defendant; that the said mother was old and feeble, under the influence of her son, and that these deeds were altered, made, and procured to be made by said son, J. H. W. Pattison, for the purpose of defrauding plaintiffs; that said defendant has taken possession of six thousand dollars in money of the estate, and has made no account thereof," etc. The defendants jointly answer, and deny the allegations of the complaint, especially those pertaining to the alleged fraud of the defendant J. H. W. Pattison. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs as prayed for, and this is an appeal from that judgment, and the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

We have in the complaint in this case an allegation that plaintiffs are heirs at law of the deceased, Pattison, and also the further allegation that they are devisees under an unprobated fraudulently destroyed last will and testament. In this cause plaintiffs appear to have relied chiefly upon their standing as devisees under this alleged will, rather than as heirs at law, and it is from this position that the trial court viewed the action, for we find its decree vesting title to the property of A. M. Pattison, deceased, according to the alleged provisions of the will. Counsel for appellants, with great vigor and learning, assail the jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine the matters involved herein, "insisting that an adjudication of such matters necessarily involves the probate of a will and distribution thereunder; that the trial court did in fact probate the will, and according to its provisions decreed title thereunder; that these are matters solely and exclusively within the jurisdiction of the superior court as a court of probate; and that a court of equity had no jurisdiction whatever to adjudicate upon them."

Respondents insist "that this action is not brought for the purpose of probating a will; that is a matter, while necessary for the determination of the case, merely incidental to the main relief sought, to-wit, the annulment of certain deeds and a decree quieting title. They insist that an heir has fraudulently destroyed or suppressed a will and fabricated a deed, and thereby made it appear that the testator has conveyed to him all the property he had in the world; that owing to the peculiar facts of this case, as disclosed by the evidence, it is impossible that this destroyed will could ever be proved in the probate court; that the title of these plaintiffs, as devisees, vested immediately upon the death of the testator, and without the probate of the will; and when the defendant J. H. W. Pattison, by fraud, attempts to deprive them of it, under the circumstances as here disclosed, a court of equity has jurisdiction to administer relief."

Thus it will be seen that the jurisdiction of a court of equity to hear and determine these matters is the pivotal point in the case. While there was no demurrer filed to the complaint, yet appellants insist that plaintiffs do not state a cause of action, and that, therefore, the decree has not sufficient support upon which to stand. The evidence is much broader than the pleading, and conditions often arise where an inherently defective pleading may be cured by the evidence and findings of the court, but such is not the present case, for the findings of fact follow the pleading rather than the evidence. Plaintiffs rely upon their status as devisees under the will of A. M. Pattison, deceased, for the right to maintain this action. Their title to the realty, their right of action, the relief demanded and decreed, are all based by the complaint and judgment upon the alleged will, yet the complaint alleges that the will was not probated; neither does it give any reason or excuse why probate had not been had. To be sure it states that defendant J. H. W. Pattison had destroyed and suppressed it, but that adds no weight to their position, for the law expressly provides for the probating of lost and destroyed wills. Code Civil Proc. § 1338 et seq. In Wood v. Mathews, 53 Ala. 1, it was decided that "courts of law and equity in this country will not take cognizance of testamentary papers, or of the rights dependent on them, until after proper probate." And again, the court said: "The law of this state confers upon the courts of probate original and exclusive jurisdiction, not only of the probate of wills of personalty, but of realty; and the only evidence of the existence of such will, which can be received in any other forum, is the sentence of that court declaring its authenticity and validity." In Shepherd v. Nabors, 6 Ala. 637, the question presented was whether the legatee of personal property could recover it at law until the will had been admitted to probate in the proper forum. The court quoted approvingly the following declaration of Lord Kenyon, in Rex v. Inhabitants of Netherseal, 4 Term. R. 258: "We cannot receive any other evidence of there being a will in this case than such as would be sufficient, in all other cases, where titles are derived under a will, and nothing but the probate or letters of administration with the will annexed are legal evidence of the will in all cases of personality." To the same effect is Armstrong v. Lear, 12 Wheat. 169; Campbell v. Sheldon, 13 Pick. 22; Fotherree v. Lawrence, 30 Miss. 416; Olney v. Angell, 5 R. I. 198.

In the case of Castro v. Richardson, 18 Cal. 480, this court said: "We understand it to be the settled doctrine of the courts of this country that, where the proceedings in probate are conclusive of the validity or the invalidity of the will, it cannot be received in evidence to maintain a title founded upon it until it has been admitted to probate." And again: "It is unnecessary for us to accumulate authorities upon this subject; there is no doubt that this is the prevailing doctrine wherever similar statutes exist and the matter has undergone consideration by the court." That case was an action of ejectment, and one of the links relied upon by plaintiff in setting out his chain of title was an unprobated will, and this court said, "The facts stated in the complaint do not make out a title in the plaintiff," and the judgment was reversed. By the same line of reasoning, how can it be said that plaintiffs, as devisees under an unprobated, destroyed will, have such title to realty as to maintain an action to set aside and cancel deeds to such realty upon the grounds of fraud? Their title rests upon this alleged unprobated will,—a will that has been fraudulently destroyed,—a fact in itself that weakens their position, for the difficulties arising in establishing its probate are largely increased. It is plaintiffs' muniment of title, yet until stamped as genuine by the seal of the proper tribunal it cannot be received in evidence in other courts, and no rights can be asserted under it. Of itself it can have no more effect in transferring or vesting title than a deed without delivery. Conceding it would fortify plaintiffs' position if facts were stated in their complaint showing why this will has not been probated, and why it cannot be probated by the regular course of proceeding in the tribunal established for such purposes, yet they have entirely failed so to do. Respondents' counsel insist that, even if they have not shown a right of action as devisees, yet they have alleged themselves to be heirs at law, and are therefore entitled to maintain the action in that capacity. In this case the coincidence arises that the heirs at law and devisees under the will are identical, still it does not follow, if the will under which they claim to hold as devisees has not been probated, that they have any rights to the testator's property as heirs at law. Plaintiffs allege that they are devisees under an unprobated will. If it had been a probated will, their position as heirs at law would have had no value whatever, and the fact that it has not been probated does not add strength to their position. As against the pleader, we assume this document to be a valid, genuine will, which would be probated in the regular way if presented to the probate court; and until presented and probate rejected these plaintiffs, as heirs at law, have no rights in the property which can be maintained either in courts of law or equity. We conclude, therefore, that the complaint does not state a cause of action, and consequently the decree has no sufficient support.

Inasmuch as, if the case were reversed solely upon the foregoing ground, it would be remanded to the lower court for a new trial, with permission to the plaintiffs to amend their pleading, if they deemed such a course advisable, we feel constrained to take a broader view of this question, and determine whether a court of equity, under any state of facts, and especially under the state of facts as developed by the evidence in this case, viewed by the light of the laws of California, has jurisdiction to set up and prove a will, either directly or as incidental to other relief sought. The authorities already cited and principles announced oppose such doctrine, but let us look further. The right of jurisdiction in this case rests upon the following facts, which respondents insist are disclosed by the evidence: That A. M. Pattison died leaving a last will and testament; that defendant J. H. W. Pattison, a son, in pursuance of a scheme to defraud plaintiffs of their interest in the property, after his father's death destroyed the will; that in furtherance of this scheme he made false deeds to himself of the property, and procured, by undue influence, his mother, who was old and feeble, to make certain other deeds therefor; that the aforesaid will has not been probated, and cannot be probated in the regular channel, as there are only two persons acquainted with its provisions, and one of these is the defendant in fraud, who will not testify truthfully thereto, the statute requiring that its provisions be proven by the evidence of two credible witnesses. It appears from the foregoing that the plaintiffs are in a very unfortunate position, and that the defendant J. H. W. Pattison is a very bad man; yet is this the proper proceeding, in the proper court, to right these wrongs and punish the offender? It is difficult to comprehend why the power of the probate court has not been invoked to prove this will; its powers are full, ample, and complete; machinery is provided to force the truth from a false and scheming witness; and, finally, if probate were denied, as heirs at law, plaintiffs' rights would be amply protected, and thus their situation is much more pleasant than though they were not in the direct line of succession. We do not see how this action can be maintained even under the facts claimed.

In this state the provisions of the Code form a complete and perfect system, in relation to the probate of wills, whether those wills are in existence, or lost or destroyed. In the Broderick Will Case, found in 21 Wall. 517, the supreme court of the United States, in speaking of the law of California relating to probate of wills, said: "In view of these provisions, it is difficult to conceive of a more complete and effective probate jurisdiction, or one better calculated to attain the ends of justice and truth." In note 3 to section 1158 of Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, the author says: "On the contrary, the doctrine seems to be general, if not universal, throughout the states, that a court of equity will not recognize nor act upon a will of land or of personal property until it has been admitted to probate." The case of Gaines v. Chew, 2 How. 619, a leading case upon this question, declares that, before any title could be set up under the will, it must be probated in the probate court, holding that in Louisiana the probate court had exclusive jurisdiction of those matters. In the opinion Justice McLEAN suggested that, if all other remedies failed, "it might be a matter of grave consideration, whether the inherent powers of a court of chancery might not afford a remedy, when the right was clear, by establishing the will of 1813." In the Broderrick Will Case, 21 Wall. 503, referring to this language, the supreme court of the United States said: "Of course, the latter expressions were obiter dicta, and can scarcely be said to have the support of any well-considered case." And again, the court say in the same case, referring to the law of this state: "On the establishment or non-establishment of the will depended the entire right of the parties, and that was a question entirely and exclusively within the jurisdiction of the probate court. In such a case a court of equity will not interfere, for it has no jurisdiction to do so. The probate court was fully competent to afford adequate relief."

The cause at bar is in the nature of an action to quiet title, yet in Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 1158, the author says: "The rule is settled in England that a devisee in possession is entitled at any time to maintain a suit against the heir at law of the testator, for the purpose of establishing the will, * * * although the will creates no trusts, but gives the devisee a purely legal estate, and although it is not necessary to administer the estate under the direction of the court of chancery. * * * In both instances the suit is in the nature of a bill to quiet title. For obvious reasons, no such jurisdiction probably exists in any of the states, certainly not in the great majority of them." In the case of Morningstar v. Selby, 15 Ohio. 345, in which state the court of common pleas answers to our superior court, having both an equity and probate department, it was attempted to probate a fraudulently destroyed will upon the equity side of the court, there being no statutory provision, as in this state, providing for probate of lost and destroyed wills. After an exhaustive examination of the law upon the question, the court said: "Those authorities, carefully examined, will show that a court of chancery has no inherent power, either in England or America, to establish a lost will;" and, under the provisions of a constitution very similar in these respects to ours, held, that the probate court had exclusive jurisdiction of all matters pertaining to probate proceedings, and denied the application. This is the first instance arising in this state where it has been sought to prove a will otherwise than by a decree of the probate court, and to that extent we move on untrodden ground. The fact that this will has been suppressed or destroyed in fraud, rather than lost through accident or mistake, does not affect the question of jurisdiction. No such distinction is recognized by the provision of the Code of Civil Procedure, and fraud, accident, and mistake demand equal attention, when knocking at the doors of a court of equity. In Rosenberg v. Frank, 58 Cal. 403, it was decided that, as to the probate of a will, the jurisdiction of the probate court is exclusive. At the same time in that case a divided court held that a court of equity had jurisdiction to construe a will, thereby encroaching upon the jurisdiction of the probate court to an extent not equaled in any other decision found in the Reports of this state. We might add, the correctness of the law there found, as to the jurisdiction of a court of equity to construe a will under the laws of this state, is not only doubted, but the effect of the decision is very much limited in Siddall v. Harrison, 73 Cal. 562, 15 Pac. Rep. 130.

The principles laid down and reasoning had in Morningstar v. Selby, supra, and cases there cited, also militate strongly against the doctrine. In Re Bowen, 34 Cal. 689, in speaking of the provision of our former constitution, the court said: "This is a comprehensive grant of probate jurisdiction, and, as there is nothing in the article granting concurrent jurisdiction, the grant to the probate court must be held exclusive." In Castro v. Richardson, previously cited, the court said, in speaking of probate of wills: "It was intended that the mode of proof pointed out by the statute should be uniformly pursued, and, to give effect to that intention, it is necessary to maintain the exclusive authority of the probate court." In State v. McGlynn, 20 Cal. 271, the court, in speaking of decrees in the matter of probate of wills, said: "It is necessary for the repose of society that it should be definitely settled by one judgment, and not be left to be buffeted about by different and possibly conflicting judgments of different courts." Respondents' counsel insist that the decree in this case simply probates the will for the purposes of this case, and as incidental to the main relief sought, yet, if the probate court has exclusive jurisdiction of the matter and the will has no life until probated, the decree would pro tanto repeal those principles of law. The conflict is irreconcilable, and the decree must fall.

It is quite evident that, if a court of chancery cannot entertain direct jurisdiction to establish a will, it can possess no jurisdiction to do so as incident to jurisdiction over other matters. Such a course would lead to grave complications, would destroy the uniformity contemplated in the mode and manner of proof, and would be opposed to the system established by the constitution and statutory laws of California. Respondents insist that as the will has been destroyed, and as they are unable to prove its contents by two witnesses, as required by section 1339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and for that reason have no standing in the probate court, the court of chancery should take jurisdiction and admit it to probate. Conceding the jurisdiction of such court, we are not prepared to say the rule of evidence would not be the same, for, if it were otherwise, the safeguard thrown around the rights of heirs would be lost, and the statute rendered entirely nugatory. But the court has no such jurisdiction. A judgment of probate being a judgment in rem, a judgment binding every one who has any interest, it is of the soundest policy that one tribunal should have vested in it exclusive power to hear and determine, no matter what may be the nature or character of the will, and no matter what may be its situation or condition. Such, undoubtedly, was the end and object sought to be attained by the framers of our law in the enactment of a full, complete, and comprehensive probate procedure. Respondents have cited many cases holding that the fraud of the spoliator affords ground for the intervention of a court of equity, but we do not think they are the better authority, and the weight of authority is the other way. But whatever may be the conflict in the decisions of courts of other states, we think the doctrine contended for has no sufficient support in this state, and is opposed to the spirit of her jurisprudence upon probate matters. The law in this state does not look that way. Let the judgment and order denying a new trial be reversed, and the cause remanded.

I concur: HARRISON, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur. If the plaintiffs were heirs at law, I think they could maintain an action to set aside the deed under section 1452, Code Civil Proc. From their own showing, however, they are not heirs at law, but devisees; and until the will has been probated, and their status as devisees has been judicially fixed by the probate of the will, they cannot maintain an action. It is alleged in the complaint that the will was "fraudulently destroyed, or concealed, or suppressed, and was never admitted to probate or filed in the court, and is now in the control of said J. H. W. Pattison, unless the same has been destroyed by him." The finding of the court is in the same disjunctive, equivocal form. It may be that on petition for letters the defendant will produce the will. It does not appear that any attempt has been made to secure its production, and, taking the pleadings most strongly against the pleader, we must assume that it can be produced.

KIESSIG v. ALLSPAUGH et al. (No. 14,405.)
(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 16, 1891.)

CONTRACTORS' BONDS—RIGHTS OF SURETIES.

In an action on a bond, it appeared that the principals and surety had executed it to plaintiff to secure him against claims or liens for labor or material used in the construction of a building which the principals in such bond had contracted to erect. The contract and bond were unrecorded. Plaintiff, by the contract referred to in the bond, was authorized to retain one-fourth of the price of construction until final settlement of the parties thereto. Upon completion of the building, plaintiff paid the contractors the full amount. There was no evidence of the surety's assent to such payment. At the time of such payment there were existing valid liens for labor and material used in constructing the building, which plaintiff subsequently paid. Plaintiff sued the obligors in the bond for the amount of these liens. Held, that the surety was not liable, since the sum which the contract authorized plaintiff to retain was charged with a trust in favor of the surety, as security against the liens, and without his consent it could not be paid to his principals.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Action by Kiessig against Allspaugh and Hall as principals, and Lundeen as surety, on a building contractor's bond. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Lundeen appeals. Reversed as to Lundeen.

Parish, Mossholder & Lewis, for appellant. Carl Schutze, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant, Lundeen, was a surety for his co-defendants, Allspaugh and Hall, upon a bond executed to plaintiff to indemnify and save him harmless against any claims or liens for material or labor used or employed by his principals in the construction of a building, which they had theretofore contracted to erect for plaintiff. The contract price for the construction of the building was $8,000, and by the terms of the building contract the plaintiff was authorized to retain one-fourth of that sum in his hands until final settlement between the parties thereto. The complaint alleges "that after the time said house had been finished, and when final settlement was made as per contract aforesaid, there were good and valid claims and demands and liens for material and labor expended and used in the building, construction, and finishing said house, in excess of the contract price of said building, to the amount of one thousand eight hundred seventeen 25-100 dollars;" and that by reason of the failure of the contractors to discharge them the plaintiff was compelled to pay the same after having paid the full contract price for the house. This action is brought against the principals and sureties on the bond referred to, to recover the amount so paid by plaintiff. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the superior court, and from that judgment the defendant Lundeen prosecutes this appeal. The judgment cannot be sustained upon the facts. The appellant Lundeen was a surety, and as money sufficient to satisfy all of the liens mentioned in the complaint was, or ought to have been, in the hands of the plaintiff at the time of his settlement with the contractors, he should have so applied it, instead of paying it to the contractors. This balance was to be retained in his hands as an additional security against liens upon the building, and in equity he held the same also for the benefit of the sureties. It was a special fund to which they had a right to look for their indemnity, and in view of which it must be supposed that they assumed the obligation of sureties, as the original contract is referred to in the bond as the inducement or consideration for its execution, and the plaintiff was not authorized to surrender it without their knowledge or consent, and, having done so, the appellant was discharged. Bragg v. Shain, 49 Cal. 131; Taylor v. Jeter, 23 Mo. 244. In this latter case the court used this language: "The contract duty of this builder was to furnish the materials and do the labor, and he failed in both respects when he allowed the building to be incumbered with these liens. The owner, having notice of them, and paying what, by the substantial terms of the contract, he was entitled to retain until they were removed, voluntarily abandoned an ample fund, which, according to the conditions of the contract, was to accumulate in his own hands as the primary security for its due performance, and in which the surety had an equal interest with himself. He must, therefore, bear the loss occasioned by his own negligence or folly." This is an elementary rule of law governing the relation of principal and surety, and is thus stated by the master of the rolls in Law v. East India Co., 4 Ves. 829. "It cannot be contended, upon any principle that prevails with regard to principal and surety, that when the principal has left a sufficient fund in the hands of the obligee, and he thinks fit, instead of retaining it in his hands, to pay it back to the principal, the surety can be called upon." The failure of the plaintiff to retain this balance, or to apply it for the satisfaction of the obligation for which the appellant was surety, does not present the case of a mere neglect upon the part of a creditor to insist upon a set-off in his favor, arising out of some other transaction, before paying what might be due on a particular contract, but was the neglect to resort to a fund already in his hands for his own protection, in the very matter for which the defendant was a surety, and which fund was therefore charged with a trust in favor of appellant, and its surrender without his consent constitutes a defense to this action. Judgment reversed as to appellant Lundeen.

BLAISDELL v. McDOWELL. (No. 14,344.)

VALIDITY OF CHATTEL MORTGAGE—SECURING PURCHASE PRICE.

Civil Code Cal. § 2955, provides that "mortgages may be made upon * * * furniture in hotels, lodging or boarding houses, when mortgaged to secure the purchase money of the articles mortgaged." Held, that a mortgage given to secure money advanced to purchase the hotel furniture covered by the mortgage was valid.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Action by S. G. Blaisdell against S. A. McDowell. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Boone, for appellant. M. S. Babcock, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The main question in this case—and the only one requiring notice—is whether a certain mortgage of hotel furniture executed by George W. Butterfield and William P. Baker to Bryant Howard is valid, under section 2955 of the Civil Code. The facts in the case are these: Butterfield and Baker, being desirous of purchasing about $1,500 worth of furniture for the Arlington Hotel, in San Diego, made arrangements with Bryant to advance the money with which to buy the furniture, agreeing to give him a mortgage on the same as security. It was specially understood between them that the money to be advanced by Bryant was to be used by Butterfield and Baker in purchasing said furniture. For this purpose Bryant deposited $1,500 in bank to their credit, and they paid for the furniture by drawing checks against said deposit. When the furniture was in the hotel they gave the mortgage to Bryant, the mortgage being in form as provided by the Code, and duly recorded. Said section 2955 of the Civil Code provides that "mortgages may be made upon: * * *

Eighth, upholstery and furniture used in hotels, lodging or boarding houses, when mortgaged to secure the purchase money of the articles mortgaged;" and appellant (defendant in the court below) contends that the mortgage here in question was not given to secure the "purchase money" within the meaning of that section. His contention is that as, under the general rule, mortgages of personal property are void unless there is a change of possession, the statutory provision which alters that rule must be strictly construed, and applied only to cases where the mortgage runs directly from the purchaser to the seller to secure the amount agreed to be paid by the former to the latter. But, if the statute is to have a literally strict construction, it is difficult to see why the phrase "to secure the purchase money" does not as closely apply to money by which the purchase was made as to the case of a debt where no money was used. But the section of the Code in question should have a reasonable construction with a view of executing the evident design of the legislature in enacting it. While the language used should not be strained to include cases clearly not embraced by it, the meaning to be given to it should not be so narrowly circumscribed as to exclude cases clearly within it. The evident intent of the legislature was to encourage certain kinds of business by allowing persons to procure certain personal property necessary to the business, by giving a mortgage lien upon the property itself; and money advanced for the express and special purpose of procuring such property is as much within both the spirit and letter of the law as a debt incurred immediately to the seller. If Bryant had gone through the form of buying the furniture from the sellers, and selling it again to Butterfield and Baker, there could have been no question about the validity of the mortgage; but surely the law does not require such a vain thing to be done when it so clearly appears that the advance of the money and the purchase of the furniture were substantially one transaction. No other state has a statute similar to the one here under review; but one or two authorities have been cited where, with respect to property exempt from execution, "purchase money" has been given a meaning similar to that contended for by appellant. We think, however, that the case at bar should be governed by the principle applied in Lassen v. Vance, 8 Cal. 271, which was a contest between a homestead claimant and one holding a mortgage for the money which he had advanced for the purchase of the land. In that case the court say: "The money of the plaintiff paid for the lot, and it would be an exceedingly harsh rule of law that would defeat his mortgage upon the very property purchased with the money furnished by himself." It is true that the court said that the deed and the mortgage were "simultaneous acts," but the same was practically the case with the purchase of the furniture in the case at bar. Judgment affirmed.

STANTON v. FRENCH. (No. 14,319.)

EXEMPTIONS—PEDDLERS—ATTORNEY'S FEE.

1. Where the debtor's principal business is that of a peddler, the fact that he occasionally uses in other ways the team and wagon employed therein will not deprive him of the benefit of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 690, subd. 6, exempting from execution the two horses, wagon, and harness by the use of which a peddler habitually earns his living.

2. A bread-box, used by a debtor in his business as a peddler of bread, is not exempt, as it is not named in the list of articles exempted by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 690.

3. In an action for the conversion of personal property, plaintiff asked judgment for $350 as the value of the property alleged to have been converted, together with interest on such amount, and $150 for attorney's fees incurred in the pursuit of the property. The court charged that before plaintiff could recover any amount as attorney's fees he must show by a preponderance of evidence that such amount was reasonable for the services rendered. There was no evidence as to the reasonableness of the attorney's fee. There was a verdict for plaintiff for $375, which was less than the amount claimed as the value of the property and interest. Held, that it would be presumed on appeal that the jury followed the instructions of the court, and rejected the claim for attorney's fees.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; C. H. MARKS, Judge.

Action by John Stanton against H. W. French for conversion. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

J. K. Law and Tupper & Tupper, for appellant. Frank H. Farrar, and Breckinbrenbridge & Peck, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action in conversion, brought to recover the value of two horses, a wagon and harness, and a bread-box. The property was taken and sold by defendant as constable, under an execution against plaintiff and his wife. Plaintiff demanded a return of the property as exempt from execution, under subdivision 6, § 690, Code Civil Proc.,¹ claiming that as a peddler of bread he habitually earned his living by the use of said property. This is an appeal by defendant from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. It is the second appeal to this court, the former decision being found in 83 Cal. 194, 23 Pac. Rep. 355.

Plaintiff bases his claim for exemption upon his status as a peddler of bread. In the list of property allowed peddlers by statute as exempt from execution we find no article answering in name or use to a bread-box, and a debtor's claims are limited by the words of the statute.

Upon an inspection of the record in the previous appeal, we find no material difference in the evidence there and that which is now before us, upon the matter of the ratification by plaintiff of the sale by the officer, and the former decision upon that point establishes the law of the case. It appears that plaintiff and his wife conducted a bakery upon a limited scale in the town of Merced; that they sold bread at the shop, and also the plaintiff daily peddled bread throughout the town and at the railroad depot upon the arrival of trains, etc. In the interim the plaintiff did odd jobs with his team for hire, but his principal business was peddling bread, with the use of his horses and wagon. Can it be said that plaintiff habitually earned his living by peddling? Webster defines "habitually" as "customarily;" "by frequent practice or use." It does not appear to mean "exclusively" or "entirely," and the fact that plaintiff may have to a limited extent applied his team to other uses, or that some portion of his living, however slight that portion might be, came from some other avenue of industry, would not deprive him of his rights as a peddler under the statute. This question, as well as the question as to the ownership of the bay horse, were questions of fact, and were submitted to the jury under proper instructions. There is sufficient evidence upon both matters to support the verdict, and it will not be disturbed by this court.

It does not seem necessary to enter into a discussion as to the liability of defendant for plaintiff's attorney's fees in this action. Plaintiff claimed the value of the property converted to have been $350, and in addition thereto asked judgment for legal interest thereon from January 27, 1887, and damages in the sum of $150 for attorney's fees incurred in the pursuit of the property. In his testimony he placed a value of $35 upon the bread-box. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $375. The court instructed the jury that before the plaintiff could recover any amount as attorney's fee he must show by a preponderance of evidence that such amount was a reasonable fee for the services rendered. There was no evidence whatever as to the reasonableness of the attorney's fee claimed, and it must be presumed that the jury followed the instruction of the court, and by their verdict rejected all claims in that respect. Especially should such be deemed the fact when the evidence as to the value of the property converted, considered in connection with the interest due, would support a verdict for an amount considerably greater than the sum returned by the verdict of the jury. The matters already passed upon dispose of many of the exceptions to instructions refused by the court. The instructions given appear to be a full and complete presentation of the law upon all matters involved, and we see no ground upon which a successful exception thereto can be based. Let the cause be remanded, with directions to the lower court to modify the judgment by striking therefrom the sum of $35, and in all other respects let the judgment and order be affirmed.

WINTERBURN et al. v. CHAMBERS et al.
(No. 13,405.)

TENANTS IN COMMON—OUSTER AND ADVERSE POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE—APPEAL.

1. It appeared, in partition proceedings, that the husband of the deceased owner had theretofore sold the land as administrator under authority of an act of the legislature; that the sale had been approved by the court, and the price paid and deed given; that the purchaser had taken possession, and sold half of it at its full value; that he had inclosed the remaining half with a substantial fence, and occupied and cultivated it for eight years before his death; that he had paid the taxes, and caused it to be surveyed and assessed in his own name; and that he had made a testamentary disposition of it, as well as frequent and open declarations of his ownership of the entire tract. Held that, though he took only the one-third interest of the husband under the deed, his acts were nevertheless sufficient to charge the heirs with notice of his intention of ouster, and their titles were therefore extinguished.

2. A finding that the purchaser entered into and took possession of the land in his own right, and as owner of the entire tract, and not as a tenant in common with the heirs, and that he ousted and moved the said heirs, was not by its terms limited to an ouster resulting from the entry under the deed; but the finding of ouster must be regarded as distinct in itself, and, if there be evidence to support it, it must be upheld, and referred to such evidence, rather than to the finding.

3. The adverse possession of the grantees of such a purchaser was referable to the latter's ouster, and it did not need a finding that the grantees made an additional ouster.

4. The court found that the administrator was authorized to sell the "real estate of the deceased," and that he made a contract of sale "embracing all the land" in controversy, and gave a deed to the purchaser "purporting to convey to him the said land." It found also that, though the deed made him a tenant in common only with the heirs, this was without his knowledge or consent, and his entry was of such a character as to effect an ouster of said heirs. Held, that under these facts the deed was sufficient to give color of title to his entry, though the authority under which it purported to have been made was insufficient for that purpose.

5. Such findings must be assumed to have been sustained by the evidence, since no objection was made on that ground in the bill of exceptions.

6. The entry and claim of the purchaser were sufficient to constitute an ouster, though no notice thereof was brought home to the other tenants; and the fact that some of the tenants were minors at the time was immaterial, because of the running of the five-years statute of limitations after the last attained his majority.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. EDMONDS, Judge.

Action by Winterburn and others against Joseph L. Chambers and Charles R. Chambers for partition. There was judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Edward J. Pringle, for appellants. E. B. & J. W. Mastick, J. D. Redding, W. F. Goad, and W. C. Belcher, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiffs seek in this action partition of a tract of land which belonged to their mother, of which they allege that the defendants are tenants in common with them by reason of conveyances from other heirs of their mother. The land in controversy belonged to Josefa Soto de Stokes, who died intestate September 18, 1855, leaving a husband, James Stokes, and 14 children, surviving her. An act of the legislature was passed March 25, 1857, authorizing her administrator to sell her real estate subject to the approval of the probate court of Monterey county, in which the administration of her estate was pending, and upon such approval to convey the same to the purchaser. March 16, 1858, "said James Stokes, professing to act under the authority of the said act, and as the administrator of said Josefa, made and entered into a contract with one R. J. Walsh, by the terms whereof he, as administrator of the estate of said Josefa Soto de Stokes, contracted to sell to said Walsh, and said Walsh contracted to buy," the tract of land described in the complaint, subject to the approval of said probate court. Upon receiving the report of said sale, said probate court approved the same; "and after such approval, and on the 21st of April, 1858, the said Stokes, still representing himself to be, and professing to act and acting as, administrator of the estate of his said deceased wife, and in his own right, made, executed, and delivered to said R. J. Walsh a deed of conveyance purporting to convey to him the said land in consideration of the sum of $14,376.43." The said purchase price was the full value of the land at the time of the said sale, and the deed therefor was recorded in the office of the county recorder for Colusa county on the 12th day of August, 1858. At certain dates thereafter, viz., March 31, 1860, and June 11, 1863, Walsh took deeds purporting to convey the land from persons who had received conveyances from other heirs of Josefa, which were also recorded in said county recorder's office. Walsh, upon receiving the deed from the administrator, immediately entered into and took possession of the said land thereunder, and on the 13th day of August, 1858, sold the northerly half thereof to J. W. McIntosh, at the same price per acre at which he had purchased the same, and received from him a portion of the purchase money, and by a written contract agreed to convey the same to him upon the payment of the balance of the purchase money, and at the same time delivered to him the possession of the said northerly half. No conveyance of the land was made to McIntosh until October 23, 1867, after the death of Walsh, when his executors, under the order of the probate court, conveyed this northerly half to him; but the court finds that "immediately upon his purchase from R. J. Walsh the said J. W. McIntosh entered into and took possession of the northerly half of the said tract of land, and during the years 1858 and 1859 inclosed all of said half except about 150 acres in a triangular shape on the westerly or back side, with a good, substantial fence, and thereafter continuously, up to the 23d day of September, 1868, kept the same so inclosed, and used the same for cultivation and pasturage, and paid all taxes and assessments levied thereon;" and also finds that such possession of said northerly tract was thereafter maintained by the defendant Lewis H. McIntosh, to whom John had sold and conveyed the same, September 23, 1868. Walsh died testate April 30, 1866, and thereafter, viz., March 12, 1872, the probate court of Colusa county, in which administration of his estate was had, distributed the southerly half of said land to the defendants, Joseph L. Chambers and Charles R. Chambers, in accordance with the provisions of his will. The court also finds that "during the year 1858 said Walsh inclosed the southerly half of the said land with a good, substantial post and plank fence; and thereafter, up to the time of his death, maintained and kept the same so inclosed, and kept and held the open, notorious, actual, and exclusive possession of all the said southerly half of said land, adversely to all the world, and used the same for cultivation and pasturage, and paid all taxes and assessments levied thereon, and dealt with and used the same as his own property;" and also that after the death of Walsh his executors kept and maintained a similar possession until the entry of the decree of distribution in his estate, and that thereafter such possession was kept and maintained by the defendants Chambers. The court further finds: "(32) The said R. J. Walsh entered into and took possession of the land purporting to be conveyed to him by the said deed of April 21, 1858, in his own right, and as owner of the entire estate, and not as a tenant in common with the plaintiffs, or any or either of them, or with any other person, and ousted and moved the plaintiffs, Josephine Winterburn, Lucy Mills, Catherine Sherwood, Louisa Johnson, William Stokes, and Domingo Stokes, and all other persons having or claiming any right, title, or interest in or to such tract of land, or any part thereof, from the possession of said land, and every part thereof. (33) More than five years, to-wit, more than six years, elapsed between the time when the youngest of the plaintiffs arrived at majority, and the time of the commencement of this action, during all which time the defendants, Joseph L. Chambers and Charles R. Chambers, had and held, and claimed to hold, in their own right absolutely, as the devisees of the said R. J. Walsh, deceased, and under the said decree of distribution made by the probate court of the county of Colusa, all the southerly half of the said land, and were at the time of the commencement of this action the owners in fee thereof; and all which time the defendant Lewis H. McIntosh had and held, and claimed to hold, absolutely in his own right, as the grantee of said Walsh, and under mesne conveyances sufficient in form to convey the whole title, all the northerly half of the said land, and he was at the time of the commencement of this action the owner in fee of the said northerly half." The present action was commenced on the 20th day of May, 1878, and at the time of its commencement the plaintiffs were of the following ages: Louisa Johnson, 47 years; Catherine Sherwood, 34 years; Josephine Winterburn, 31 years; Lucy Mills, 28 years; William Stokes, 32 years; and Domingo Stokes, through whom the plaintiff Eugene Sherwood claims, 38 years. As conclusions of law, the court found that, by virtue of such ouster and adverse possession, the title of the plaintiffs was extinguished, and their right of action barred by the statute of limitations. It also found the following as one of its conclusions of law, viz.: "That the said R. J. Walsh, under his deed of April 21, 1858, acquired title to only the undivided one-third of the land in his deed described, and became by operation of law, but without his consent or knowledge, a tenant in common with the children of the said Josefa Soto de Stokes, deceased; but that by his entry under said deed into the absolute and exclusive and adverse possession of said land, and his ouster of all his said co-tenants from the possession thereof, and by the maintenance of such exclusive and adverse possession by said Walsh, his grantees, administrators, devisees, and assigns, openly, notoriously, and continuously, under claim of absolute title, for more than five years after each and all the plaintiffs, and each and every of the surviving children of the said Josefa Soto de Stokes, had attained majority, all the right, title, and interest of the said plaintiffs, and of each of them, was extinguished. * * * Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. A motion for a new trial made by the plaintiffs was denied, and from the judgment and order denying said motion the plaintiffs have appealed.

The basis of the judgment by the court below is that the plaintiffs were ousted from the land more than five years prior to the commencement of the action, and that an adverse possession having been maintained under such ouster for more than said period of five years, their right of action is barred. This decision is assailed by the appellants upon two grounds, viz.: that the finding of ouster is, by the terms of the finding itself, limited to an ouster resulting from the entry by Walsh, under the deed of the administrator; and, second, that the evidence fails to show facts sufficient to constitute an ouster. We cannot agree with counsel for appellants that it was the intention of the court by its finding of an ouster, in finding 32 above quoted, to limit such finding to an ouster by the mere entry by Walsh under the deed. The court does not in the finding itself limit the ouster to the mere entry and claim under the deed, nor does it, after finding such entry and claim, find that he thereby ousted and removed the plaintiffs, but the ouster is found as a fact distinct from such entry and claim. The court, moreover, in its conclusion of law above quoted, finds that Walsh, "by his entry under said deed into the absolute and exclusive and adverse possession of said land, and his ouster of all his co-tenants from the possession thereof, and by the maintenance of such exclusive and adverse possession," extinguished the title of the plaintiffs. It thus appears that the ouster found by the court does not depend upon the mere entry and claim; that, while the entry and claim are elements therein, they do not solely constitute the ouster. The findings must be read as a whole, and not merely according to their numerical division. Because it may be impracticable to embrace all the facts in a case under a single finding, it does not follow that each fact that is separately found is to be considered distinct and disconnected from all the others. Especially when a fact is the ultimate fact resulting from several others, is it improper to limit such conclusion. If the fact found may be sustained by evidence in the case, it must be referred to such evidence for its support, and not limited to the immediate connection in which it is placed in the findings, unless the language in which it is expressed compel such limitation. The finding of ouster must be regarded as a finding distinct in itself, and, if there is evidence in its support, it must be upheld and referred to such evidence, rather than to the facts in the finding in which it is declared. An ouster of one co-tenant by another is produced by acts of the same character as will produce any other ouster. In either case it is the "wrongful dispossession or exclusion of a party from real property who is entitled to the possession." In each case the same kind of possession is required, and it must be taken and held with the same hostile intent. In the case of a dispossession by a stranger, the fact that such stranger takes the actual and exclusive possession of the land is of itself a notice of the character of such possession, and of the intent with which it was done. In the case of the co-tenant, however, the intent with which the possession is taken is not manifested by the mere fact of possession, but must be established either by actual notice, or by acts or declarations so open and notorious, and of such a nature, that it may readily be presumed that the co-tenant out of possession is informed thereby of the hostile intent with which the possession is held. It is the intent which determines the character of the possession, but it is essential that this intent be in some mode, either by actual or presumptive notice, directly or indirectly, communicated to the other co-tenant. This intent is not the secret purpose of the occupants, but is the purpose which the acts themselves manifest, and the acts done must be manifested to the person against whom the ouster is directed. It is not necessary that actual notice be shown to have reached the co-tenant in order to charge him with the effect of the ouster. The ouster must be complete, and it must be found that notice thereof was given; and, inasmuch as ouster is the ultimate fact to be found by the court, it is sufficient if it is sustained by the evidence, or is the necessary result from the probative facts which are found. Being a fact to be found from evidence, it is entitled to the same presumptions of correctness as attend any other finding of fact depending upon the weight or sufficiency of evidence.

It appears from the record herein that in March, 1858, Walsh made a contract with the administrator of the estate of Josefa for a purchase of the whole of the land described in the complaint at its full value, subject to the approval of the probate court of Monterey county; that the sale was approved by said court, and that in pursuance thereof a conveyance was made to him in the succeeding month, and that he paid the whole of the purchase price to the said administrator; that he thereupon immediately took possession of the whole tract of land, and in August following sold to McIntosh the northerly half of the tract at its full value, executed to him a contract of sale therefor, gave him the possession, and thereafter received from him the price for the same; and that McIntosh, upon receiving said contract of sale, took possession of the tract, and thereafter occupied the same as in his own right; that Walsh inclosed the southerly half of the tract with a substantial fence, and occupied and cultivated it openly and exclusively until his death in 1866; caused it to be surveyed, and also to be assessed in his own name, paid all the taxes thereon, made a testamentary disposition thereof, as well as frequent and open declarations of his purchase and ownership of the entire tract. These acts were sufficient to clearly indicate the intent on his part to claim the entire estate as his own to the exclusion of all other persons, and were also acts of such character and performed with sufficient publicity and notoriety to justify a presumption that they were communicated to and known by the plaintiffs. The fact that the deed to Walsh was not placed upon record until after he had made his contract of sale with McIntosh, and the entry by McIntosh upon the northern portion of the tract, is immaterial, and it is equally immaterial, for the purpose of characterizing his entry, whether the deed was recorded or not. The entry into possession of the tract by Walsh was itself a notice to the plaintiffs that he had some claim to the land. The mere possession was not of itself evidence of his claim, but it was notice to them sufficient to put them upon inquiry, and to charge them with the knowledge that would have been received from such inquiry. They knew that he was not one of the heirs of their mother, and that the immediate source of his claim to the land was different from theirs, and, when they saw him in possession of the land, they were charged with notice of the character and purpose with which such possession was taken. They were not at liberty to presume that he was a claimant under one of their co-tenants, any more than that his entry was hostile to them all. Being informed of his entry, and presumptively of its character, they were charged with a knowledge of all the facts attending it which an inquiry would have called forth. "The possession of other persons than [their co-tenants] was enough to put [the plaintiffs] on inquiry, under the rule in Fair v. Stevenot, 29 Cal. 486. If they had inquired, they would have discovered the hostile character of the possession. This means of notice constituted notice." Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 596. His entry upon the land was open and notorious, and it was as much a notice to them that he was entering with bow and spear as it was that he entered under a deed of conveyance. Being thus put upon inquiry, and charged with the knowledge of the facts which such inquiry would have disclosed, they were informed that he had taken possession of the land under the purchase by him of the entire interest therein held by their mother at her death in accordance with the terms of the contract of sale made by him with the administrator of her estate, and that the same had been approved by the probate court, and that he had paid for the land its full value. Even if it be conceded that the deed to him purported to convey only the interest of Stokes, and although, in the absence of any other facts, his entry might have been presumed by them to have been in accordance with the deed, this fact would not have lulled them into the belief that he had succeeded to only that interest, and was their co-tenant, for the deed was not placed upon record until several months afterwards. His entry was an act distinct from the deed executed to him, and they were charged with notice that such entry was with hostile intent, and with a claim to the entire and exclusive ownership of the land. By such notice there was imputed to them information of not merely the language and terms of the deed, but of all the facts connected with his entry. The possession of Walsh did not appear to them to be that of one whom they knew to be a co-tenant, and they were not entitled to presume that his acts of possession were in recognition of their rights. A co-tenant out of possession, in order to avail himself of the presumption attending the acts of a stranger in possession, must show that such stranger is his co-tenant. There is no presumption of such co-tenancy, and, in the absence of such showing, he is chargeable with notice of the real character of his claim. Being chargeable with such notice, he is also chargeable with the knowledge that the acts done by him are done in consistency with his entry and his claim, whatever the same may be. The purchase by Walsh in 1860 and 1863 of other interests did not impair the character of his entry in 1858. He did not enter into possession of any portion of the land under the subsequent conveyances, and his original entry can neither be qualified, nor his title impaired, by such purchase. He was buying in an outstanding claim, not as a co-tenant with the plaintiffs, but with a claim hostile to them from the beginning. After the ouster by Walsh, the adverse possession taken by the defendants under conveyance from him was referable to such ouster, and it was not requisite to find that they had made any additional ouster to that which was to be inferred from the ouster by Walsh, under whom they entered. Their possession under such entry was the adverse holding of a stranger to the title, and not referable to the entry of a co-tenant. Their entry was the basis of a new title, and, with an adverse holding for five years after the plaintiffs had attained majority, tolled their rights. We do not understand that appellants controvert the proposition that, if the evidence is sufficient to establish the ouster by Walsh, as found by the court, there has been an adverse possession thereunder for more than five years prior to the commencement of this action. We are of the opinion that the character of the acts of Walsh, as well as their notoriety, were such as to justify the court in a presumption that the plaintiffs had notice thereof, and that they constituted a sufficient basis for its finding of the ouster by Walsh. Freem. Co-Ten. §§ 221, 223; Warfield v. Lindell, 30 Mo. 282; Lodge v. Patterson, 3 Watts, 77; Dikeman v. Parrish, 6 Pa. St. 227.

It is, however, contended on behalf of the appellants that, inasmuch as by the terms of the deed from the administrator to Walsh, it must have appeared to him that there was thereby conveyed only an undivided interest in the land, his entry must be deemed to have been in accordance with the terms of the deed, and that his acts thereunder, being consistent with such entry, did not manifest any intent to claim the entire ownership. We think, however, that the facts presented by the record do not uphold this claim of the appellants. It may be conceded that the conveyance by Stokes as administrator, under the authority of the legislative act, was utterly unavailing to transfer to Walsh any title to the lands in controversy, and that the court correctly found that the only interest therein which he obtained by the deed was that which passed by the conveyance of Stokes in his own right, which was in fact the one-third which he took as surviving husband of Josefa. The court, however, found that, although by operation of law this deed made him only a tenant in common with the children of Josefa, yet such effect of the deed was without his knowledge or consent, and that his entry was of such a character as to operate as an ouster of said children. The court also found that under the act of the legislature Stokes was authorized as administrator to sell "the real estate of the deceased," and that, professing to act under the authority of that act, he made a contract with Walsh to sell a tract of land "embracing all the land involved in this action;" and that, after the approval of the sale by the probate court, he gave to Walsh a deed of conveyance "purporting to convey to him the said land." Under these facts the deed to Walsh was sufficient to give color of title in support of his entry, notwithstanding the fact that the act under whose authority it purported to have been made was insufficient to confer authority therefor.

We must assume that these findings of fact are sustained by the evidence which was presented at the trial, as the plaintiffs have not in their bill of exceptions made any specifications of insufficiency in that respect. Upon an appeal it must be assumed by us that all findings of fact against which the bill of exceptions contains no specification of their being unsupported by the evidence have been correctly found. The fact that there is some evidence in the record bearing upon such finding, which is not in itself sufficient to support it, cannot be considered. It is only when the finding is directly challenged in this respect that we must assume that all the evidence bearing upon the subject before the court below which would sustain the finding is in the record. If the finding itself has not been objected to, there is no occasion for inserting such evidence in the bill of exceptions, and the respondent is not to be prejudiced by any failure to have it included therein. The appellants in their specifications of insufficiency of evidence do not question the correctness of the foregoing findings of fact, their specification being "the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding of fact that R. J. Walsh entered and took possession of the land purporting to be conveyed to him by said deed of April 21, 1853, in his own right, and as owner of the entire estate, and not as a tenant in common with the plaintiffs, or any or either of them, or with any other person." It is only the entry and taking possession in his own right which they allege is not sustained by the evidence, but, as the entry and taking possession are fully established by the evidence, their argument is limited to the character in which said entry was made, and the possession thereunder held and taken. Upon this point they urge that, although the entry may have been made with a purpose on the part of Walsh to oust the plaintiffs, yet such purpose is insufficient to constitute an ouster, unless notice thereof is brought home to the other tenants, so that they may be informed thereof and protect themselves; and they further urge that, inasmuch as some of the plaintiffs were infants both at the time of Walsh's entry and at his death, no notice to them could be available; and that consequently, as the only ouster found by the court is an ouster by Walsh, it is not sustained by the evidence.

The fact that some of the plaintiffs were infants at the time of the entry did not diminish the effect of the ouster. The entry by Walsh, and his subsequent acts under such entry, were not deprived of their hostile character, and did not fail to constitute an ouster, merely because the plaintiffs were at that time minors. An infant can be ousted from his possession by either a stranger or a co-tenant. The ouster does not depend upon the fact that the notice of the entry with hostile intent has been either understood or comprehended by the disseisee, whether such entry be by a stranger or by a co-tenant. If in either case the disseisor should declare to the infant his intent to exclude him from the possession, and should physically remove him from the land, and thereafter hold the same openly and adversely, the ouster would not be suspended until the infant had attained majority, but would be complete at the date of the act and declaration. The effect which the notice will produce is not the test of its sufficiency, and the same acts and declarations which constitute an ouster apply to an infant as well as to an adult, whether such notice be actual or presumptive. The sufficiency of their notoriety is to be judged from the character with which they are made or performed, and not from the manner in which they are perceived. "To constitute a disseisin, it was never held to be requisite that notice should be sent to the disseisee, or that it must be proved that he had knowledge of the entry and ouster committed on his land." Lodge v. Patterson, supra. Ouster sets the statute of limitations running in favor of the disseisor, but protection is given to the infant by the provision of the statute that the adverse holding must continue from that date until the expiration of five years from his attaining majority. The sufficiency of the notice on the part of the disseisor at the time it was given is not to be diminished by anything occurring subsequent thereto. The knowledge that the infant would have had from the notice, if he had been capable of comprehending the same, is imputed to him as of the date of the notice as fully as if he were an adult, but the effect of such knowledge is suspended until his majority. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

KIESSIG v. ALLSPAUGH et al. (No. 14,325.)
(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 16, 1891.)

CONTRACTORS' BONDS—ENFORCEMENT.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183, provides that a building contract which is not recorded before work is commenced thereunder, when the contract price exceeds $1,000, shall be void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto. Held, that a bond in the sum of $5,000, given by a contractor, with sureties to the obligee, who is the owner of a building, to secure him against any claims, demands, or liens for labor or materials furnished in the construction of such building, and which refers to a written contract, that has not been recorded, made between the principal obligor and obligee, is not within the meaning of the statute, and may be enforced without violating the provisions of the above section.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Action by Kiessig against Allspaugh, Hall, and others to recover on a building contractor's bond. Judgment for plaintiff. The defendant Hall, a principal on the bond, appeals. Affirmed.

Luce & McDonald, for appellant. Carl Schutze, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. On October 14, 1887, the plaintiff and the defendants Allspaugh and Hall entered into a contract, whereby said named defendants agreed to construct a house for the plaintiff, and furnish all materials therefor; and on the following day, and before the commencement of work under the building contract, they executed to plaintiff a bond with sureties, in these words: "Be it remembered that whereas, on the 14th day of October, 1887, Charles Kiessig, a resident of the said state and city, and A. M. Allspaugh and M. S. Hall, contractors and builders, also residents of said state and city, entered into a contract whereby, for a certain valuable consideration, the said A. M. Allspaugh and M. S. Hall, builders and contractors, have to build, construct, and finish a certain house, as is more fully set out and described in the contract, plans, and specifications signed and entered into on the day and year first aforesaid, all of which said contract, plans, and specifications are made a part hereof: Now, therefore, we, A. M. Allspaugh and M. S. Hall, as principal, and H. V. Poser and N. P. Lundeen, assureties, bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and successors, in the sum of five thousand dollars, to forever save and hold harmless the said Charles Kiessig against any claims, demands, or liens of all characters whatsoever for material or labor expended or used in the building, construction, and finishing said house." This bond was not recorded, nor was the building contract therein referred to. The contractors, however, completed the building according to the specified plans, and plaintiff paid them the full contract price therefor; but there were liens filed against it to the amount of $1,817.25, which the contractors, Allspaugh and Hall, failed to discharge, and the plaintiff was compelled to pay them. This action is brought on the foregoing bond to recover the amount so paid. The court below found the facts as above stated, and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff. This appeal is from that judgment, and is taken by the defendant Hall alone.

The appellant contends that there can be no recovery on the bond, because of the failure to record the building contract to which it refers; that, the original contract being void under the statute, this bond, which was given to secure in part the performance of such contract, is equally void, and incapable of enforcement. This contention is based upon section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that a building contract which is not recorded before work is commenced thereunder, when the contract price exceeds $1,000, "shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto." But the bond upon which this action is brought is not the contract made between this plaintiff and appellant for the construction of the building, and is not within the letter of the section referred to. It was not made at the same time, has additional parties, and does not bind the contractors to erect any building. It refers to the prior contract as an inducement or consideration for its execution, and the parties signing it agree to hold the plaintiff harmless against certain liens which might be created by the principals in the bond in carrying out the other contract, and for which said principals would be personally liable to mechanics and material-men, but they do not undertake that the prior contract shall be fully performed by the contractors. They could have abandoned the work of construction at any time, or have failed to complete it within the time fixed or in the manner specified in the contract, and they would not have been liable for any damage therefor, by the terms of the bond, which is the foundation of this action. Indeed, its purpose is not to secure to plaintiff reimbursement for any damage, the right to recover which rests alone upon the building contract. Although the original contract could not be enforced, because not recorded, the contractor might nevertheless perform, and the plaintiff could accept such performance, and neither be guilty of any wrong in so doing; and, if in performing the appellant incurred a personal liability for labor or materials, which was discharged by the plaintiff, in order to remove a lien from his own property, or at the request of the appellant, the obligation to repay plaintiff is created by law, and would exist independently of the building contract, and is not affected by any defect therein, and is a sufficient consideration to support the express undertaking of defendant to repay; and the bond may therefore be deemed so far an independent undertaking that the right to enforce it does not depend upon the subsequent or continued validity of the building contract. As already stated, this bond is not within the letter of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and it may be added that it is not within its reason or spirit, and its enforcement is not in conflict with the policy of that section. We do not think that the appellant, after delivering this bond as an independent security, and thereby inducing the plaintiff to make full payment of the contract price for the construction of the building, is in a position to deny his liability upon it, and if, in order to support this action, it is necessary that the bond should be based upon a valid building contract, we should hold that the appellant is estopped to dispute the truth of the particular recital contained in the bond as to such fact. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. JOHNSON. (No. 20,797.)

EMBEZZLEMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. The evidence showed that defendant, pretending to illustrate the manner of drawings at the Louisiana Lottery, placed upon a table a paper covered with squares and figures, and induced witness to place his money upon the table with the understanding that it would be returned as soon as defendant had completed the illustration; that as soon as the money was placed upon the table defendant took the same, and refused to return it. Held, that the evidence established larceny, and would not support a conviction for embezzlement. BEATTY, C. J., and McFARLAND, J., dissenting.

2. It was error to allow an officer to testify as to a description of defendant furnished by the prosecuting witness before arrest.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. McM. SHAFER, Judge.

Prosecution of George A. Johnson for embezzlement. Verdict of guilty, and judgment thereon. Defendant moved for a new trial, which being refused, he appeals from the judgment and order denying the motion. Reversed.

M. S. Horan, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant was charged with embezzlement, and convicted. He appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The court erred in admitting the testimony of the witness Briggs, as to the description of the defendant given him by the prosecuting witness before the arrest of defendant. This was hearsay, and, considered with reference to the other evidence in the case, relating to the identity of defendant as the person who took the money alleged to have been embezzled, was a material error.

fendant, and thereafter a conversion by him. Upon such facts, when the charge is larceny, the prosecution is required to show that the defendant, when he received the property originally, intended to steal it. But no such difficulty is presented here, for there never was any bailment of the property, the prosecuting witness never consenting to part with the possession; indeed, even its bare custody for a temporary purpose was not given to defendant. The money was simply placed upon a table on some squares and figures, that defendant and his confederate might illustrate the manner in which the drawings of the Louisiana Lottery are had, and all of this was to be done in the presence of the prosecuting witness. He never contemplated or consented that the money should be taken from his sight by the defendant, or that it should be transferred from the table to the pockets of the defendant. Upon this state of facts, a finding that the possession of the money was intrusted to defendant by the prosecuting witness is entirely without any support, and the crime which defendant committed is described with absolute precision in Loomis v. People, 67 N. Y. 327: "It was a clear case of larceny, as marked and significant in its general features as if the prisoners had wrongfully seized and appropriated it when first produced." In the case of Com. v. O'Malley, 97 Mass. 585, the defendant was convicted of embezzlement, upon the following state of facts: The prosecuting witness had $38 in bank-bills; the defendant asked her to loan him a dollar, and she agreed to do so, and showed him the roll of bills which she had just received in payment of her wages. He then asked her to let him take the money and count it, she not being able to read or write, and she let him take it for that purpose. He counted it over several times in her presence, and then refused to return it to her, and went off with the money. The trial court instructed the jury as follows: "If they were satisfied that the defendant, when he took the bills from the hands of the witness McDonald, had the guilty intent of entirely depriving her of them, and of converting them to his own use, and his taking the money to count was only a trick or device to obtain possession of the same, it would be larceny, and they must acquit him; but if they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he had no such intent at the time, but received the bills by her permission for the purpose of counting them for her, and receiving the dollar which she had consented to loan him, and, after the money came into his hands, he then first conceived the guilty purpose of defrauding her, they might find him guilty." The conviction for embezzlement was set aside by the supreme court, in an opinion which states with great clearness the distinction between larceny and embezzlement. The court there said: "We are of opinion that there was no evidence to sustain the indictment for embezzlement, and that the conviction was wrong. * * * To constitute the crime of embezzlement, the property which the defendant is accused of fraudulently and feloniously converting to his own use must be shown to have been intrusted to him, so that it was in his possession, and not in the possession of the owner. But the facts reported in the bill of exceptions do not show that the possession of the owner of the money was ever divested. She allowed the defendant to take it for the purpose of counting it in her presence, and taking from it a dollar, which she consented to lend him. The money is alleged to have consisted of two ten-dollar bills, three five-dollar bills, one two-dollar bill, and a one-dollar bill, amounting in all to thirty-eight dollars. The one dollar he had a right to retain, but the rest of the money he was only authorized to count in her presence, and hand back to her. He had it in his hands, but not in his possession, any more than he would have had possession of a chair on which she might have invited him to sit. The distinction pointed out in the instructions of the court between his getting it into his hands with a felonious intent, or forming his intent after he had taken it, was therefore unimportant. The true distinction, upon principle and authority, is that stated by the cases upon the defendant's brief, that if the owner puts his property into the hands of another, to use or do some act in relation to it, in his presence, he does not part with the possession, and the conversion of it, animo furandi, is larceny." The law as thus declared is sustained in the following cases: Smith v. People, 53 N. Y. 111; Loomis v. People, 67 N. Y. 322, People v. Call, 1 Denio, 120; and many more which might be cited to the same effect. Indeed, our attention has not been called to any case which holds to the contrary. Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal for admission of improper testimony, but I dissent from the view that the crime was necessarily larceny, and not embezzlement. It is contended by appellant that under the evidence he could not have been legally convicted of embezzlement, because the evidence, if it shows any crime, shows the crime of larceny, and not embezzlement. The distinction between larceny and the statutory crime of embezzlement is sometimes hard to draw. Our Code definition of the latter offense is very broad, being "the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted." Pen. Code, § 503. The weight of the definition rests upon the word "intrusted." Where the property is taken forcibly or furtively, or when the possession is gained by a trick or artifice, and the owner had no intent to yield possession, and "intrust" the property to another,—in such cases there is no embezzlement. Now, appellant argues this case upon the theory that the prosecuting witness laid his money on a table upon the representation of appellant that he merely wanted to point out and explain a certain lottery or game, and that when the money was put there appellant suddenly took it without the consent of said witness. But the testimony does not clearly show such a state of facts. It is true that the witness says generally that defendant told him that he would get his money back; but he testifies that he first put in a half-dollar, "and afterwards I put in a dollar, and after that was lost I put in five [$5] dollars, and lost that." He then "wanted to get out," but was induced to "go on and play," and he "put up" $20, and $20 more, and so on until he had put up altogether $86.50; and then, as he says, "after that was lost, he asked for his money, but did not get it, except $10, which was returned to him." What became of the coins, as one by one they were bet and lost. I think that the jury had the right to find that appellant, with the consent of the prosecuting witness, had full actual possession of the money; and whether it was "intrusted" to him was, I think, under all the circumstances, a question to be determined by the jury, under proper instructions of the court. And I see no error in the instructions on that point. The bill of exceptions in this case is so meager that we can hardly suppose it to contain all the evidence upon the points contested. In People v. Fisher, 51 Cal. 319, it was held that in a bill of exceptions in a criminal case it is not necessary "to specify the respects in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient to sustain the verdict." Under this rule, district attorneys are, no doubt, often misinformed as to what points the bill of exceptions should, by amendments, be made full; and an amendment to the Code requiring specifications of the grounds of the alleged insufficiency of the evidence would be in furtherance of justice.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment of reversal upon the ground that the superior court erred in admitting the testimony of the witness Briggs. The evidence of the prosecuting witness that the defendant was the person who defrauded him was extremely weak and unsatisfactory. He admitted that, on the examination of the prisoner in the police court, a short time after the occurrence, he had been unable to identify him, but claimed that he was then (at the trial) certain that he was the same person. Evidently the prosecution thought it necessary to strengthen their case on this point, for they called the witness Briggs, (an officer,) who was permitted to testify, against the objection of the defendant, to a description of the culprit, which he stated had been furnished by the prosecuting witness before the defendant was arrested. This was, of course, hearsay and incompetent, and, as it related to a vital issue in the case, upon which other sufficient testimony was lacking, it was necessarily prejudicial. But I dissent altogether from what appears to me the extremely technical views of the court as to the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. I admit that the evidence proves a clear case of larceny, but I cannot concur in the conclusion that because it proves larceny it does not prove embezzlement. Assuming the defendant to have been properly identified as the real culprit, the evidence shows that he fraudulently induced Wilkins to put his money on a table for the purpose of illustrating the mode of playing a game which he called the Louisiana Lottery, promising to give it back at the conclusion of the lecture. In pursuance of this plan, he first illustrated the loss of a half-dollar, next a dollar, then of five dollars, and finally of four twenty-dollar pieces in rapid succession. After this brilliant exposition of the beauties of the game, when Wilkins demanded his money back, according to the understanding upon which he had permitted the use of it, he was coolly informed by the defendant that the Louisiana Lottery did not do business in that way, and that if the money was returned they would surely put their business in other hands. Defendant did, however, magnanimously restore the sum of ten dollars when Wilkins threatened to call for the police. In short, the evidence leaves no room to doubt that the defendant intended from the beginning to make a felonious appropriation of the money, and the case cannot be distinguished in principle from that of People v. Rae, 66 Cal. 423, 6 Pac. Rep. 1, in which it was held that the facts constituted the crime of larceny. On the authority of that decision, it must be held, as appellant contends, that the evidence in this case made out a clear case of larceny. But does it follow that it will not sustain a conviction of embezzlement? "Embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted." Pen. Code, § 503. According to this definition, a fraudulent intention to appropriate the property at or before the time of its receipt is not necessary to constitute the offense, but it is in no wise inconsistent with it. It merely superadds an ingredient not essential to constitute the crime. But is it any the less embezzlement because it is that and something more? Or, rather, will not evidence which proves every element of the crime of embezzlement sustain a conviction of that crime merely because it proves the additional element contained in the crime of larceny? Under an indictment for murder, the defendant may be convicted of manslaughter, because the offense of manslaughter is embraced in murder, i. e., murder is manslaughter with the added ingredient of malice aforethought. Upon the same principle it cannot be doubted that under an indictment for larceny, specifically alleging the facts proved in this case, the defendant could properly be convicted of embezzlement, if, upon the evidence, it was reasonably doubtful whether the fraudulent intent existed at the time he received the money. Pen. Code, § 1159. The converse of these propositions must be equally true. Upon an indictment for manslaughter, a verdict of guilty is sustained by the evidence, notwithstanding it may appear that the killing was malicious; and, if so, an information for embezzlement is sustained by the evidence, notwithstanding it may appear that the crime committed was all of embezzlement, and something more. Of course, if larceny were an offense of lesser grade or subject to a lighter penalty than embezzlement, the conclusion would be different; but they are in fact of the same grade, and subject to precisely the same punishment. Pen. Code, § 514.

The particular kind of larceny proved in this case consists of three elements: (1) Money intrusted; (2) fraudulent conversion; (3) intent to defraud at the time the money is received. Embezzlement consists of two elements. (1) Money intrusted; (2) fraudulent conversion. That is to say, the two crimes are identical as to the first two ingredients. But it is held by the court that embezzlement is not proved, although both its elements are proved, because another element is proved which brings the offense within the definition of larceny; in other words, that, because the defendant might have been charged and convicted of a higher crime, he cannot be convicted of a lesser crime embraced in that which might have been charged. But the court holds that here there was never any "bailment" of the property. Possibly this is so, if the matter is regarded with reference to the civil rights and remedies of the parties. But the statute defining embezzlement does not speak of a "bailment." It only requires that property should be "intrusted" to another, and, in my opinion, it does not lie in the mouth of a thief, who has in fact been trusted in ignorance of his character and intentions, to say that, because he obtained possession of the property by a fraudulent trick, therefore he was not intrusted with it. I am aware that many cases may be found like those cited in the opinion of the court, in which the facts proved in this case have been held to constitute larceny, but, as I have endeavored to show, they also include embezzlement. The Massachusetts case is the only one that has ever been brought to my attention in which it has been decided that proof of the higher offense, or proof of the three ingredients of larceny, will not support a conviction of a crime composed of two of those ingredients. That decision may be accounted for by the fact that the defendant had been once acquitted on an indictment for larceny founded on the same facts afterwards proved on the trial for embezzlement; and it seems to have been assumed that the change made in designating the offense in the second indictment would prevent him from having the benefit of a plea of former acquittal. If this was so under the Massachusetts practice, it affords a ground of support to the decision which has no existence here. Under our law and practice, such fine-spun distinctions serve but one purpose. They do not tend in the slightest degree to shield the innocent, but only to furnish an additional loop-hole of escape for the guilty.

BARRETT v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 14,- 331.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1891.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES—INJURY TO CHILD—TURN-TABLE—NEGLIGENCE.

A railroad company is liable for injuries received by a child while playing upon a turntable upon its premises near a public street, which was not protected by any inclosure nor guarded by its employees, though it was provided with the customary fastenings to keep it from revolving, and the child was invited to play thereon by other children.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. TOWNER, Judge.

Action by Barrett against Southern Pacific Company for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John D. Bickell, for appellant. Holloway & Kendrick and Victor Montgomery, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff through the negligence of defendant. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for $8,500, and from this judgment, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

It was shown upon the trial that defendant maintained a railroad turn-table upon its own premises in the town of Santa Ana. This table was about 150 yards from defendant's depot, and near its engine-house, and distant 72 feet from a public street, and was not protected by any inclosure, nor did the defendant employ any person whose special duty it was to guard it. It was provided with a latch and slot, such as is in common use on such tables, to keep it from revolving. There were several families with small children residing within a quarter of a mile from the place of its location, and previous to the time when plaintiff was hurt children had frequently played around and upon it, but when observed by the servants of defendant were never permitted to do so. At the date of plaintiff's injury he was eight years of age, and on that day he, with his younger brother, saw other boys playing with the turn-table, and, giving them some oranges for the privilege of a ride, got upon it, and while it was being revolved plaintiff's leg was caught between the table and the rail upon the head blocks, and so severely injured that it had to be amputated. The defendant moved for a nonsuit, which motion was denied. This ruling of the court, and certain instructions given to the jury, present the questions which arise upon this appeal.

The appellant contends that it was not guilty of negligence in thus maintaining upon its own premises, for necessary use in conducting its business, the turn-table in question, and which was fastened in the usual and customary manner of fastening such tables; that the plaintiff was wrongfully upon its premises, and therefore a trespasser, to whom the defendant did not owe the duty of protection from the injury received, and that the court should have so declared, and nonsuited the plaintiff. This view seems to be fully sustained by the case of Frost v. Railroad Co., decided by the supreme court of New Hampshire, 9 Atl. Rep. 790. But, in our judgment, the rule as broadly announced and applied in that case cannot be maintained without a departure from well-settled principles. It is a maxim of the law that one must so use and enjoy his property as to interfere with the comfort and safety of others as little as possible consistently with its proper use. This rule, which only imposes a just restriction upon the owner of property, seems not to have been given due consideration in the case referred to. But this principle, as a standard of conduct, is of universal application, and the failure to observe it is, in respect to those who have a right to invoke its protection, a breach of duty, and, in a legal sense, constitutes negligence. Whether, in any given case, there has been such negligence upon the part of the owner of property, in the maintenance thereon of dangerous machinery, is a question of fact dependent upon the situation of the property and the attendant circumstances, because upon such facts will depend the degree of care which prudence would suggest as reasonably necessary to guard others against injury therefrom; "for negligence in a legal sense is no more than this: the failure to observe for the protection of the interests of another person that degree of care, precaution, and vigilance which the circumstances justly demand, whereby such other person suffers injury." Cooley, Torts, 630. And the question of defendant's negligence in this case was a matter to be decided by the jury in view of all the evidence, and with reference to this general principle as to the duty of the defendant. If defendant ought reasonably to have anticipated that, leaving this turn-table unguarded and exposed, an injury, such as plaintiff suffered, was likely to occur, then it must be held to have anticipated it, and was guilty of negligence in thus maintaining it in its exposed position. It is no answer to this to say that the child was a trespasser, and if it had not intermeddled with defendant's property it would not have been hurt, and that the law imposes no duty upon the defendant to make its premises a safe playing ground for children. In the forum of law, as well as of common sense, a child of immature years is expected to exercise only such care and self-restraint as belongs to childhood, and a reasonable man must be presumed to know this, and the law requires him to govern his actions accordingly. It is a matter of common experience that children of tender years are guided in their actions by childish instincts, and are lacking in that discretion which, in those of more mature years, is ordinarily sufficient to enable them to appreciate and avoid danger; and, in proportion to this lack of judgment on their part, the care which must be observed towards them by others is increased; and it has been held in numerous cases to be an act of negligence to leave unguarded and exposed to the observation of little children dangerous and attractive machinery, which they would naturally be tempted to go about or upon, and against the danger of which action their immature judgment interposes no warning or defense. The following are some of the cases in which this has been held: Railroad Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657; Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. St. 335; Powers v. Harlow, 53 Mich. 507, 19 N. W. Rep. 257; Nagle v. Railway Co., 75 Mo. 653; Koons v. Railway Co., 65 Mo. 592; Railway Co. v. Fitzsimmons, 22 Kan. 686; O'Malley v. Railway Co., (Minn.) 45 N. W. Rep. 441; Whirley v. Whiteman, 1 Head. 610. These cases, we think, lay down the true rule. The fact that the turn-table was latched in the way such tables are usually fastened, or according to the usual custom of other railroads, although a matter which the jury had a right to consider in passing upon the question whether defendant exercised ordinary care in the way it maintained the table, was not, of itself, conclusive proof of the fact. Stout v. Railroad Co., 2 Dill. 294; O'Malley v. Railway Co., supra. Nor is the liability of the defendant affected by the fact that the table was set in motion by the negligent act of other boys. This is so held in some of the cases above cited, and the same principle was announced by this court in Pastene v. Adams, 49 Cal. 87, in which case it was held that a person who had negligently piled lumber, which had remained in that condition for a long time, was not exempt from damages sustained by one on whom it fell because the lumber was made to fall by the negligence of a stranger. We see no error in the second instruction given at request of plaintiff. The portion to which exception was taken is not very well expressed, but we think, taken as a whole, the instruction states the law correctly. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; McFARLAND, J.

ETCHEPARE v. AGUIRRE, Sheriff. (No. 14-298.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1891.)

CLAIM AND DELIVERY — VERDICT — JUDGMENT — CHANGE OF POSSESSION — INSTRUCTIONS — CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. In an action to recover possession of personal property, or the value thereof, the verdict was as follows: "We * * * find for the defendant, and fix the value of the property at $1,500." Held, that the verdict sufficiently complied with Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 627, which provides that if, in such actions, defendant by his answer claims a return of the property, the jury, if their verdict is in favor of defendant, and they "also find that he is entitled to a return thereof, must find the value of the property;" and it authorized a judgment for defendant "for a return of the property, or the value thereof," as prescribed by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 667.

2. In an action to recover specific personal property, a judgment for defendant for the value of the property, or a return thereof, is defective, since judgment for the value can only be rendered where a return of the property cannot be had, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 667, providing that, if the property has been delivered to plaintiff and defendant claims a return thereof, judgment may be for a return of the property, or for the value thereof, in case a return cannot be had.

3. In an action for the possession of certain milch cows taken on attachment against plaintiff's vendor, it appeared that the vendor retained possession after the sale and continued to milk them and peddle the milk, and that he bought feed and managed and controlled the business as before. Held proper to refuse to charge that a delivery depends on the character of the property and the circumstances of each case; that it is not necessary for the purpose of delivery that the property sold should pass into the actual possession of the buyer; and that, when property is so situated that the buyer is entitled to and can rightfully take possession of it at his pleasure, he is considered as having actually received it as the statute requires.

4. Plaintiff requested an instruction that the fact that plaintiff employed the vendor after the sale was not conclusive, independent of other evidence, in determining the question whether there was an actual and continued change of possession of the property at the time of the alleged sale. Held, that it was properly modified by the court by adding that a party can employ the vendor, but if he leaves him in entire charge of the property, or in such apparently entire charge that it appears that there has been no open and apparent change of possession, no open and apparent means by which people about can take notice that there has been any change, then there is not such an actual change of possession as is required by law.

5. Cross examination of the vendor, as to what he did and said in regard to the cattle after the sale to plaintiff, was properly allowed, since such evidence was relevant to the issue of whether the sale was accompanied by immediate delivery, and followed by actual and continued change of possession.

Commissioners' decision. Department

1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKINLEY, Judge.

Action in replevin by M. Etchepare against Aguirre, sheriff. Verdict and judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial. Order affirmed, and judgment reversed.

M. V. Biscailus and W. I. Foley, for appellant. W. J. Williams, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover the possession of personal property, or the value thereof, commonly called "claim and delivery of personal property." The defendant, as sheriff of Los Angeles county, seized the property in question by virtue of a writ of attachment, as the property of the defendant in the attachment suit, from whom the plaintiff claims to have purchased it before the levy of the attachment. It is alleged in the answer of the defendant that the sale of the property to plaintiff was fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the defendant in attachment, and this was the principal issue tried. The property was delivered to the plaintiff pursuant to section 514 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as a return thereof to the defendant was not required. The trial was by jury, whose verdict was as follows: "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find for the defendant, and fix the value of the property at $1,500." Whereupon it was adjudged by the court "that said defendant have and recover from said M. Etchepare, the plaintiff herein, the sum of $1,500, or the return of the property described in the complaint herein, and his costs." The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. It is claimed by appellant that the verdict is defective, in that it does not find "for the return of the property," and is not "in the alternative," since the answer of the defendant demands a return of the property. The verdict for the defendant was special as to the value of the property, as required by the Code.¹ As to all other issues it was general. This was sufficient to justify a judgment for the return of the property, or for the value thereof in case a delivery could not be had. Such a judgment would have consisted entirely of pure conclusions of law from the verdict. The Code does not require the verdict to bespecial, except as to the value of the property, and the sole object of this exception is to enable the court to render an alternative judgment as required by section 667 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Waldman v. Broder, 10 Cal. 379; Hunt v. Robinson, 11 Cal. 262; Pico v. Pico, 56 Cal. 453.

2. But the judgment was not, in form or substance, in accordance with section 667 of the Code of Civil Procedure.² The defendant was not entitled to judgment for the value of the property, except upon the condition that a return of the possession thereof could not be had. The judgment should be "for a return of the property, or the value thereof, in case a return cannot be had." Washburn v. Huntington, 78 Cal. 577, 21 Pac. Rep. 305.

3. At the request of the plaintiff, the court gave to the jury the following three instructions: (1) "If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff purchased the property in question in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and without any design to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor of Jaureguy, and that the sale was complete and accompanied by an immediate delivery, followed by an actual and continued change of possession, then you must find a verdict for the plaintiff in this action." (2) "A bona fide sale of property by a judgment debtor to a person other than the judgment creditor in payment or satisfaction of a prior debt to such vendee is not fraudulent because such vendee may be aware, at the time of such bona fide sale, that it will have the effect of defeating the collection of other debts against his vendor." (3) "In determining whether there was an actual and continued change of possession of the property in question at the time of the alleged sale by Jaureguy to the plaintiff, while you are to consider the fact that the plaintiff employed Jaureguy after the alleged sale to plaintiff, still you are not bound, independent of other evidence, to regard this fact alone as conclusive of the question." But the court refused to give the fourth instruction asked by plaintiff, which is as follows: "What constitutes a delivery depends upon the character of the property sold and the circumstances of each particular case. For the purpose of a delivery, it is not necessary that the property sold should pass into the actual possession of the buyer. When property is so situated that the buyer is entitled to and can rightfully take possession of it at his pleasure, he is considered as having actually received it as the statute requires." After the court had concluded its instructions, a juror asked the following questions: "Can a party who purchases stock or any kind of goods keep in their employ the same parties that were there, and still be complying with the law, or is it necessary to move those goods or move?" In answer to these questions the court said: "I will read the instruction asked by plaintiff, but I will do it so that the jury can fully understand with regard to it." Then, after reading the third instruction given at request of the plaintiff, added to it the following: "A party can employ the person,—the person from whom they purchase,—but if they leave the person in the entire charge of the property, or leave them in such apparently entire charge of the property, that it appears to the world around about that there has been no change of possession, that there is no open and apparent change of possession, no open and apparent means by which people about can take notice that there has been any change, then there is not such an actual change of possession as is required by law."

It is contended for appellant that the court erred in refusing the fourth instruction asked by plaintiff, and in giving the addition to the third instruction given at request of plaintiff. It is true that the language of the fourth instruction requested by plaintiff was extracted from the opinion of Mr. Justice McKEE in Williams v. Lerch, 56 Cal. 334; but the language extracted is only a part of what was said by Mr. Justice McKEE in connection with the facts of that case, which were materially different from the facts in this case. In that case the property (horses) were in the care and custody of a third person (Drew) for the sole purpose of being pastured on a mountain range at a considerable distance from the residence of the owner, (Sotcher.) After executing a bill of sale of the horses to Williams, (plaintiff in that action,) Sotcher ordered Drew to collect them together, and deliver them to Williams. Accordingly Drew collected the horses, and informed Williams that they were ready for him. Thereupon Williams employed Drew to continue to pasture the horses for him, (Williams.) Some five months thereafter, while the horses were still being pastured by Drew, they were taken by a constable by virtue of an execution against Sotcher. Upon these facts, Mr. Justice McKEE, immediately preceding the language of the requested fourth instruction, said: "Everything was done which was necessary to a sale. It was complete and perfect if Drew subsequently delivered the horses to plaintiff, or took charge of them for the plaintiff." And, after the language of the requested instruction, further said: "By delivering the bill of sale to the plaintiff, and giving direction to his agent to get the horses together, and keep them for the plaintiff, to whom they had been sold, Sotcher transferred them to the plaintiff; and when the agent, in obedience to the direction which he had received, collected them together in his pasture for the plaintiff, and wrote to him that they were ready for him, and to come and take them, and the plaintiff employed the agent to take charge of them and winter them for him, this was an actual delivery of the property, so far as the nature and condition of the property admitted it; and when the agent under his employment turned the horses out to pasture on their accustomed range, and kept them exclusively for the plaintiff until they were taken by the defendant, the requisitions of section 3440 of the Civil Code were fully satisfied." In the case at bar the cattle alleged to have been sold consisted largely of milch cows, and were in the actual possession of the seller, (Jaureguy,) who was milking the cows and peddling the milk, with the assistance of two servants. After the alleged sale he continued to milk the cows and to peddle the milk precisely as before, and the evidence strongly tends to show that he bought the feed for the cattle, and managed and controlled the business and the servants up to the time of the attachment, just as he had done before the alleged sale. Under this state of facts, the fourth instruction requested by plaintiff was not properly applicable, even conceding that it is good abstract law, which seems, at least, doubtful. The language of the instruction asked could not have been intended by Mr. Justice McKEE to be read by itself as abstract law, but concretely with its context and the facts of the case of Williams v. Lerch. The instructions given at the request of the plaintiff, with the explanation added by the court, were quite as favorable to the plaintiff as he was entitled to ask. The oral explanation given by the court, in answer to the question of a juror, is not so precise and explicit as doubtless it would have been had it been deliberately written; but, as given, I think it is substantially supported by the following cases: Stevens v. Irwin, 15 Cal. 503; Malone v. Plato, 22 Cal. 103; Cahoon v. Marshall, 25 Cal. 201; Bell v. McClellan, 67 Cal. 283, 7 Pac. Rep. 699.

² Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 667: "In an action to recover the possession of personal property, * * * if the property has been delivered to the plaintiff, and the defendant claim a return thereof, judgment for the defendant may be for a return of the property, or the value thereof, in case a return cannot be had."

4. It is contended that the court erred in permitting Jaureguy to be cross-examined by defendant as to what he did and said in regard to the cattle after he executed the bill of sale of them to the plaintiff. But the testimony objected to was pertinent to the issue as to whether or not the sale had been accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change of possession, and therefore the court did not err in admitting it. I think the order denying a new trial should be affirmed, but that the judgment should be reversed, and that the court below should be directed to enter a judgment on the verdict in favor of defendant, in substantial accordance with this opinion.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order denying a new trial is affirmed; but the judgment is reversed, and the court below is directed to enter a judgment on the verdict in favor of the defendant, in substantial accordance with this opinion.

ROCHAT v. GEE. (No. 13,810.)

SOMERS v. SOMERS.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 24, 1891.)

DISMISSAL OF ACTION—APPEALABLE ORDERS.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 581, which provides that the dismissal of an action by plaintiff "is made by entry in the clerk's register," and that "judgment may thereupon be entered accordingly," the filing by plaintiff of a written statement of abandonment of the action, and an entry thereof by the clerk in the register, does not operate as a dismissal, where no judgment of dismissal is entered, nor any order of the court made in relation to the matter of abandonment.

2. An order made pending an action to dissolve a partnership directing a receiver appointed therein to file an account is not appealable, since it is not one of the appealable orders enumerated in Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 963.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge.

Action by Rochat against Gee for dissolution of partnership and appointment of a receiver. Receiver appointed, and court directed receiver to file an account. Defendant objected to the allowance of some of the items therein. Account approved. Defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Charles R. Gray, for appellant. C. J. Perkins and H. C. Rolfe, for respondent. E. E. Rowell and C. J. Perkins, for receiver.

PATERSON, J. This action was commenced by the plaintiff, June 27, 1888, for a dissolution of the copartnership existing between himself and defendant, for the appointment of a receiver, and for an accounting and settlement of the affairs of the partnership; and on that day the respondent, Somers, was appointed receiver "to take charge of, manage and control and dispose of, under the direction of this court, all that certain real property belonging to the copartnership of Rochat & Gee, and to have charge of, manage, control, and dispose of all personal property of the said firm of Rochat & Gee, upon his executing the bond as such receiver in the sum of twelve thousand dollars and qualifying according to law." He qualified, took possession of the property of the firm, and for about one month operated a lumber-mill belonging to the firm. The defendant filed an answer September 15, 1888, admitting the fact of copartnership, but denying the allegation on which plaintiff relied for the relief asked. On June 29, 1889, plaintiff filed a written abandonment of the cause in the following words: "Now comes the plaintiff, and, before the final submission of the above-entitled cause, the plaintiff hereby abandons said cause." The register of actions showed the following entry: "June 29, 1889. Filing abandonment of cause by plaintiff," but no judgment of dismissal was ever made or entered, nor was any order of the court made in relation to the matter of abandonment. On September 2, 1889, the court directed the receiver to file an account. The account was filed November 12, 1889, and on November 29, 1889, the defendant filed written objections to the allowance of several of the items thereof. After hearing the testimony of the parties, the court approved the account as filed, and from this order the defendant has appealed.

The filing of the written statement of abandonment and the clerk's entry in the register of actions did not operate as a dismissal of the action. Code Civil Proc. § 581;¹ Page v. Page, 77 Cal. 83, 19 Pac. Rep. 183. Respondent has moved the court to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the order is not appealable. We think the motion should be granted. The orders made before judgment which may be appealed from are named in subdivision 3, §§ 939, 963, Code Civil Proc. The order before us is not one of those specified in subdivision 3 of section 939, which is the same as subdivision 3 of section 336 of the practice act. Adams v. Woods, 8 Cal. 315. It is not a "special order made after final judgment," because there has been no final judgment in the action. It cannot be one of the orders named in subdivision 3 of section 963, because that class embraces only probate orders. Estate of Calahan, 60 Cal. 232. Appellant claims that the order is a final adjudication upon all matters involved in the report of the receiver, and being conclusive upon the parties, and for an amount exceeding $300, the constitution secures to him the right of appeal, whether the legislature has provided the method of taking the appeal or not. It is not a question whether one aggrieved by such an order has the right of appeal,—that right must be conceded,—but when it may be exercised. We have not found any case in which such an order has been reviewed before final judgment. No good purpose could be subserved by a rule authorizing an appeal from every order of this kind made during the pendency of the suit. It is the policy of the law to discourage litigation piecemeal. The order of the court concludes with the following direction: "It is further ordered that said receiver be and continue in charge of the property of said parties herein, and that he continue to act as receiver herein until the further orders of this court in the premises. Said receiver is hereby disallowed any compensation or attorney's fees until the coming in of his final report herein on final determination of this cause, such compensation and attorney's fees to be then fixed by the court, as it may be then advised." There are authorities holding that a receiver may appeal directly from an order made before judgment disallowing his final account; and it may be conceded that a party aggrieved by an order of the court made before judgment allowing a final account of a receiver may appeal without waiting for a final judgment in the case. That is not this case. The provision of the order quoted above shows that the receiver is still in possession of the assets of the firm, and acting on its behalf under orders of the court. There will be other reports to make. The final account will refer to previous reports filed, and when that is settled any one aggrieved will be fully protected by an appeal either from the final order or from the judgment. It may happen that those who object to the acts of the receiver during the first part of his administration will be entirely satisfied with the general result, and have no objection to the approval of his final account of the whole matter. Vinson v. Freeze, (Ky.) 1 S. W. Rep. 478; McCord v. Weil, (Neb.) 46 N. W. Rep. 152; Perkins v. Four-niquet, 6 How. 206; 2 Hayne, New Trial & App. § 188. The appeal is dismissed.

SPANISH AND MEXICAN GRANTS—SETTLEMENT OF BOUNDARIES—PLEADING.

1. In an action to obtain a decree declaring plaintiffs the equitable owners of a portion of a tract of land called "P," alleged to have been included in a patent for a certain tract called "C," by the fraudulent extension of the latter tract, the complaint alleged that in 1833 the governor of California decreed one N., plaintiffs' predecessor in interest, to be the owner of three contiguous tracts of land, called the "C," "A," and "P," tracts, containing more than 17 leagues; that the governor, in 1834, made a grant of the C. tract, to N., as containing 10 leagues, and that others, under whom defendants claim, acquired title to the A. tract as containing 6 leagues; that defendants' predecessors afterwards fraudulently obtained confirmation of the grant and a patent of the C. tract as containing 11 leagues, instead of 10, and of the A. tract as containing 6 leagues. Held, that the complaint did not state a cause of action because it did not allege directly or by implication that the fraudulent extension of the C. tract made it include any of the P. tract, since the additional league may have been taken from some other contiguous land.

Frederick Hall, for appellants. E. W. McGraw, W. A. Ryan, and Chapman & Hendrick, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. This action is brought to obtain a decree that the plaintiffs are the owners in equity of a certain named undivided interest in 50,444 acres of land within the tract called "Los Coyotes," and that the defendants hold the legal title to such undivided interest in trust for them. The defendants answered, and thereafter moved for a judgment upon the pleadings, which motion was granted, and judgment thereupon entered in favor of the defendants. The plaintiffs appeal.

A motion for judgment on the pleadings, such as was made in this case, is proper when the complaint does not state a cause of action. King v. Montgomery, 50 Cal. 115; Kelley v. Kriess, 68 Cal. 210, 9 Pac. Rep. 129. This motion, like a demurrer for the same cause, admits for its purposes all the facts alleged in the complaint, and the question, therefore, to be considered on this appeal is whether the complaint states a cause of action in favor of plaintiffs. The allegations of the complaint, so far as necessary to be stated, are, in substance, that the plaintiffs are the successors in interest of one Juan Jose Nieto; that upon July 27, 1833, Jose Figueroa, then governor of California, made a decree declaring said Nieto to be the owner of the places called "Los Coyotes," "Los Alamitos," and "Palo Alto," in the county of Los Angeles, and directing juridical possession and title thereto to be given him; that these places were contiguous, and contained within their exterior boundaries more than 17 leagues. It is also alleged that the governor thereafter, on May 22, 1834, made a grant of Los Coyotes to said Nieto, containing 10 leagues. The complaint further alleges that one Abel Stearns acquired the right and title of said Nieto to the Los Alamitos, and obtained from the land commission a confirmation of an alleged grant of the same to said Nieto for 6 leagues. It is also alleged that said Nieto conveyed Los Coyotes to one Leandry, as containing 10 leagues, August 31, 1839; and in 1852 Andreas Pico and Mrs. Ocampo, successors of said Leandry, presented their petition before the land commission for the confirmation of Los Coyotes, containing 10 leagues, and the same was confirmed. It is also alleged that the patent was issued to them for this rancho as containing 11 leagues, and one to Abel Stearns for Los Alamitos as containing 6 leagues, but in fact containing an excess of 1,398 acres. It is nowhere averred in the complaint that any formal grant of or title to Palo Alto was ever made to Nieto, unless the decree of July 27, 1833, can be construed as such; and it is alleged that no grant of the same to said Nieto, or to any other person, by "said Jose Figueroa," * * * or any other person authorized to make the same, or by the Spanish or Mexican government, has ever been produced before any commission or tribunal or public officer authorized by the government of the United States or of the state of California to ascertain or settle land claims in said state under grant from the Spanish or Mexican government." The complaint further alleges that in proceedings for the location and survey of Los Coyotes the said Abel Stearns, for the purpose of obtaining a patent therefor from the United States, and of defrauding the heirs and devisees under the will of Juan Jose Nieto of one square league of land, made false representations in a map produced by him as to the boundaries of Los Coyotes, and thereby induced the district court to approve a survey thereof as containing 11 leagues.

1. The motion for judgment on the pleadings was properly granted. It is clear from the allegations of the complaint that Juan Jose Nieto, the ancestor of plaintiffs, conveyed in his life-time his entire interest in the places Los Coyotes and Los Alamitos, and if said Nieto died possessed of Palo Alto there is no direct averment in the complaint that the boundaries of Los Coyotes and Los Alamitos, as the same are given in the patents of the United States therefor, include the place called Palo Alto. We understand this to be conceded by the attorney for appellants; but he contends that, though such fact is not directly averred, still it conclusively follows that such is the case, from other facts which are averred. If it should be assumed that a pleading which does not directly allege a material fact, but from which only the existence of such a fact may be argued, is sufficient as against a general demurrer, still this complaint would not be good, as everything therein alleged may be true, and yet no part of Palo Alto have been included within the patented boundaries of Los Coyotes and Los Alamitos. The facts upon which appellants rely to support the complaint on this point are that the 3 places only embraced 17 leagues, and that 2 of them had been sold as containing 16 leagues, and so confirmed; and that, as the survey of those 2 was fraudulently made to embrace 17 leagues and over, it must have been extended over the contiguous place called "Palo Alto," but this excess could just as well have been taken from other contiguous territory, and there is certainly no presumption arising from anything stated in the complaint that it was not.

2. But if the complaint could be construed as contended for by appellants, still it fails to state a cause of action, as it does not show that they are the equitable owners of any portion of the lands in controversy. Whatever equities or rights the plaintiffs have arise out of the decree of Gov. Figueroa, dated July 27, 1833, declaring Juan Jose Nieto the owner of the places called "Los Coyotes," "Los Alamitos," and "Palo Alto," and ordering juridical possession and title to be given him for the same; and as the complaint alleges that Nieto in his life-time parted with his ownership of all the lands except Palo Alto, it follows that plaintiffs could only succeed to his ownership of that place. But it is expressly averred, as we construe the above-quoted allegation of the complaint, that the grant to Nieto of Palo Alto, if the above-referred to decree of Figueroa be so considered, was never presented for confirmation to the land commission appointed under the act of March 3, 1851, to ascertain and settle private land claims in this state; and it is declared by section 13 of that act that "all lands the claims to which shall not have been presented to the said commissioners within two years after the date of this act shall be deemed, held, and considered as part of the public domain of the United States." It has been held that this act requiring claims to be presented to the commission therein provided for applies to every claim "by virtue of any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican government," whether founded upon a perfect grant, or on an "imperfect and inchoate claim, where the initiation of the proceedings necessary to secure a legal right and title to the property had been commenced but not completed." Botiller v. Dominguez, 130 U. S. 238, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525. And the court in that case say: "There can be no doubt of the proposition that no title to land in California dependent upon Spanish or Mexican grants can be of any validity which has not been submitted to and confirmed by the board provided for that purpose in the act of 1851, or, if rejected by that board, confirmed by the district or supreme court of the United States." As no grant for or other claim to the place called "Palo Alto" was ever presented to the land commission appointed under the act of 1851, above referred to, it follows that at the end of two years from the date of said act the land embraced therein became a part of the public domain of the United States, and thereupon all rights of the appellants therein, as successors of Juan Jose Nieto, ceased. This being so, they cannot be heard to complain of the fraud alleged to have been perpetrated years afterwards, in the location and survey of the place called Los Coyotes, because such acts deprived them of no rights. The fraud, if perpetrated as charged, was against the United States alone, and consisted in fraudulently extending the boundaries of Los Coyotes over a portion of the public domain. This is a matter, however, with which appellants have no concern, and which cannot aid them in this action, as it cannot be said that their right to acquire the title now held by defendants was interfered with, or that but for such alleged fraud they would or could have obtained the legal title to any portion of the land so fraudulently included within said Los Coyotes as patented, and for this reason it must be held that they have not in their complaint stated a cause of action. This is a familiar principle, and the following are a few of many cases which might be cited to support it: Burrell v. Haw, 40 Cal. 373; Durfee v. Plaisted, 38 Cal. 80; Houck v. Kelsey, 17 Kan. 333; Bohall v. Dilla, 114 U. S. 47, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 782; Dunn v. Schneider, 20 Wis. 509. We find no error in the record. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LOS ANGELES ELECTRIC RY. CO.

91 Cal. 338

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1891.)

CORPORATIONS—REMITTING FORFEITURE OF CHARTER — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — ACTION TO FORFEIT.

1. Const. Cal. art. 12, § 7, provides that no act shall be passed extending the charter of any corporation or remitting the forfeiture of a franchise. During the pendency of an action to forfeit the charter of a street-car company operating under a city ordinance, Acts Cal. 1891, cc. 18, 19, were passed, one amending Civil Code § 497, so as to invest municipal corporations with power to authorize street railways to use electricity as a motive power; the other ratifying existing ordinances granting such power. Held, that the acts did not extend the company's franchise or charter, and, as there had been no decree of forfeiture, there was none to remit, and therefore the acts were not repugnant to the constitution.

2. Civil Code Cal. § 502, provides that work on the construction of a street railway must be commenced within a year from the date of the ordinance granting the right of way and the filing of the articles of incorporation, and be completed within three years thereafter. Held that, where the complaint in an action to forfeit a charter did not state when the company commenced the construction, and thereby show that the three years had elapsed within which the work must be done, it failed to state a cause of action.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by the people against Los Angeles Electric Railway Company to forfeit its franchise. Defendant demurred to the complaint. Demurrer was overruled, and defendant neglecting to answer, judgment was entered as by default. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Brunson, Wilson & Lamme, for appellant.
W. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This action is brought to have it determined that the defendant has forfeited, and that it be excluded from, all rights, privileges, right of way, and franchises acquired by it under a municipal ordinance passed by the city of Los Angeles on the 28th day of January, 1886. A copy of said ordinance is annexed to and made a part of the complaint. In the complaint two causes of action are separately stated. "The first," in the language of respondent's brief, "is based upon the theory that the law does not permit any incorporated city or town in this state to grant authority to any individual or corporation to lay railroad tracks through the streets or public highways of such city or town, whereupon cars can be propelled by the force of electric power. The second rests upon the ground that if defendant had the right to construct railroad tracks through the streets of Los Angeles, whereon it could propel cars by such electric power, it had forfeited that right by its failure to complete the road within three years from the date of the ordinance granting the right of way to construct said road as prescribed by the Civil Code." The complaint was demurred to by the defendant on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and each alleged cause of action was separately demurred to on the same ground. The de-murrer was overruled, defendant failed to answer, and judgment by default was entered against it, by which it is adjudged guilty of usurping and unlawfully holding said franchise described in said complaint, and adjudging that the defendant be excluded from all rights, privileges, right of way, and franchise acquired under and by virtue of said municipal ordinance numbered 210, described in said complaint, and that the same has become wholly forfeited. From that judgment this appeal is taken.

Since this appeal was taken the legislature of this state has passed two acts which, in our opinion, have an important bearing upon this case. By one of said acts section 497 of the Civil Code is so amended as to invest municipal corporations with the power to grant a right to propel cars by electricity upon railroad tracks, through streets and public highways. By the other of said acts ordinances passed prior to the passage of said act, by any municipality, giving authority and permission to propel cars upon railroad tracks laid through the streets and public highways of said city, city and county or town, by electricity, are confirmed, ratified, and made valid. If constitutional, the efficacy of this act of the legislature cannot, in our opinion, be doubted. Respondent claims that it is repugnant to section 7, art. 12, of the constitution, which section reads as follows: "The legislature shall not extend any franchise or charter, nor remit the forfeiture of any franchise of any corporation now existing, or which shall hereafter exist, under the laws of this state." We are unable to so construe the act of the legislature as to make it repugnant to that provision of the constitution. There is no attempt to extend any franchise or charter; and there was no forfeiture of any franchise to remit. Acts sufficient to cause a forfeiture do not per se produce a forfeiture. The corporation continues to exist until the sovereignty which created it shall by proper proceedings in a proper court procure an adjudication of forfeiture, and enforce it. Ormsby v. Manufacturing Co., 65 Barb. 360; People v. Manhattan Co., 9 Wend. 351; River Co. v. Woodman, 2 Me. 404; Mickles v. Bank, 11 Paige, 118; Com. v. Bank, 28 Pa. St. 383; Murphy v. Bank, 20 Pa. St. 415; Field, Corp. § 154. In this case there has not been any final adjudication of forfeiture. Therefore the act ratifying and confirming the ordinance granting the franchise to defendant is not an act remitting a forfeiture. But it is, in our opinion, an act waiving a forfeiture. It certainly is an act showing an intention on the part of the state that the franchise shall continue in existence, and such an act will be considered an absolute waiver of any existing right to enforce a forfeiture of the defendant's franchise. In re New York El. R. Co., 70 N. Y. 327; Mor. Priv. Corp. 655, and cases cited. We think the constitution does not prohibit such a waiver, and that the state has waived its right to enforce a forfeiture of the defendant's franchise on the ground stated in the plaintiff's first alleged cause of action.

The second alleged cause of action presents another and different question. It is alleged that some portions of the road have not been constructed, although the time allowed the defendant to construct the entire road has elapsed. Conceding that the board of supervisors could not grant a franchise and right of way to the defendant on any other or different conditions than those prescribed by section 502 of the Civil Code, viz., "Work to construct the railroad must be commenced within one year from the date of the ordinance granting the right of way and the filing of articles of incorporation, and the same must be completed within three years thereafter;" and that "a failure to comply with these provisions, works a forfeiture of the right of way, as well as of the franchise, unless the uncompleted portion is abandoned by the corporation, with the consent of the authorities granting the right of way,—such abandonment and consent being in writing,"—it does not appear that at the date of the commencement of this action the time fixed for the completion of the railroad had expired. The complaint does not state when the work to construct said railroad was commenced, and, as we construe the language of the Code, the grantee of the franchise and right of way had three years after the commencement of the work within which to complete it. And at any time before the expiration of that time such grantee might, with the consent of the authorities granting the right of way, abandon the uncompleted portion. It follows that the judgment must be reversed. Judgment reversed, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

BAINES v. BABCOCK et al. (No. 14,224.)¹

CORPORATIONS—ACTION AGAINST STOCKHOLDERS—RETURN OF EXECUTION—RES JUDICATA.

1. A judgment creditor who has had an execution returned unsatisfied against a street-railway corporation may maintain an action against its stockholders to recover, for the benefit of all creditors who may desire to be made parties, the amount due upon unpaid subscriptions for stock.

2. The liability of the stockholders is several, and it is not necessary to make them all defendants. Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 205, followed.

3. Proof that a creditor has exhausted his legal remedy against the corporation is shown by the judgment and an execution thereon returned unsatisfied.

4. Evidence that the company owns a large amount of personal property besides its road and franchise is inadmissible.

5. The judgment is conclusive against the company and its stockholders, and they cannot show that the indebtedness for which the judgment was recovered arose upon a contract which was ultra vires.

6. One to whom stock is issued, and in whose name it appears on the books of the corporation, is liable to the creditors of the corporation for the unpaid subscriptions, although he is not the owner of such stock.

¹Rehearing granted.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

Action by Baines against Babcock and others for unpaid subscriptions for stock in a street-car company. Judgment for plaintiff, and from this and an order denying a motion for a new trial the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, Brunson, Wilson & Laimme, Works, Gibson & Titus, and Sprigg & Barber, for appellants. F. W. Burnett and M. S. Babcock, (McNealty, Trippet & Neale, of counsel,) for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action to subject the amount due from defendants for unpaid subscriptions for stock in the San Diego Street-Car Company to the payment of a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and against said corporation. The findings of the court, following the allegations of the complaint, show that execution was issued upon this judgment, and by the sheriff returned unsatisfied, because he could find no property of the corporation to apply to the satisfaction thereof. It is also alleged and found that the officers of the corporation have neglected and refused to make any assessment upon its stock, or to collect the balance remaining unpaid upon subscriptions for its stock. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and from this and an order denying their motion for a new trial the defendants appeal.

1. It is well settled that a judgment creditor who has exhausted his legal remedies against a corporation may maintain an action against its stockholders to recover, for the benefit of all creditors who may desire to come in and be made parties, the amount due upon unpaid subscriptions for stock, when the corporation neglects or refuses to collect the same. The action is sustained upon the principle that such unpaid subscriptions are a part of the capital stock of the corporation, and, like other debts due to it, constitute a fund to which creditors may look for the payment of their claims, and when the corporation neglects to call them in a court of equity will enforce their payment. Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 56. The contention of appellants that this equitable remedy is superseded in this state by section 322 of the Civil Code, and that the only personal liability of the stockholder is that fixed by that section, is not tenable, and was so held by this court in Harmon v. Page, 62 Cal. 448. The remedy given by that section of the Code is purely statutory, and furnishes to creditors of corporations additional security by making the stockholder directly liable for his proportion of the corporate debts, and was not intended to diminish the assets of the corporation by releasing the stockholder from his indebtedness to the corporation on account of his unpaid subscription for stock, or to take away from the creditor the right to resort to a court of equity to compel its payment.

2. All the stockholders were not made parties defendant, and the objection to their non-joinder was taken both by demurrer and answer. The objection is not well taken, although the rule contended for by appellants finds support in some of the decided cases. The precise question arose in the case of Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 205, and it was there held, in an opinion, the reasoning of which seems to us to be conclusive, that it is not necessary that all the stockholders should be made defendants in this kind of an action. The court there say: "The liability of a stockholder for the capital stock of a company is several, and not joint. By his subscription each becomes a several debtor to the company, as much so as if he had given his promissory note for the amount of his subscription. At law, certainly, his subscription may be enforced against him without joinder of other subscribers; and in equity his liability does not cease to be several. * * * It may be that, if the object of the bill is to wind up the affairs of this corporation, all the shareholders, at least so far as they can be ascertained, should be made parties, that complete justice may be done by equalizing the burdens, and in order to prevent multiplicity of suits. But this is no such case. The most that can be said is that the presence of all the stockholders might be convenient, not that it is necessary. When the only object of a bill is to obtain payment of a judgment against a corporation out of its credits or intangible property, that is, out of its unpaid stock, there is not the same reason for requiring all the stockholders to be made defendants. In such a case no stockholder can be compelled to pay more than he owes." And this rule is followed by other courts. Thompson v. Bank, 19 Nev. 103, 7 Pac. Rep. 68; Bartlett v. Drew, 57 N. Y. 587; Brundage v. Mining Co., 12 Or. 322, 7 Pac. Rep. 314.

3. It was not necessary for plaintiff to show that he had pursued his statutory remedy against the stockholders. The rule is that a creditor has a right to resort to the equitable remedy invoked by the plaintiff in this action after he had exhausted his legal remedies against the corporation, and this was shown in this case by plaintiff's judgment, and the return of the execution issued thereon unsatisfied.

4. The court did not err in refusing to allow defendants to show that the corporation was the owner and in possession of a large number of street-cars and other personal property, and a line of street railway and of valuable franchises within the city of San Diego. The purpose of this offered evidence was to show that plaintiff had not exhausted his legal remedy upon his judgment, but was not competent for that purpose. The rule upon this point is thus stated by Mr. Justice FIELD in Jones v. Green, 1 Wall. 332: "The court, when its aid is invoked, looks only to the execution, and the return of the officer to whom the execution was directed. The execution shows the remedy afforded at law has been pursued, and, of course, is the highest evidence of the fact. The return shows whether the remedy has proved effectual or not, and from the embarrassments which would attend any other rule the return is held conclusive. The court will not entertain inquiries as to the diligence of the officer in endeavoring to find property upon which to levy."

5. The appellants offered to show that the indebtedness for which plaintiff's judgment against the corporation was recovered arose upon a contract which was ultra vires. The evidence was excluded, and this ruling is assigned as error. The question is thus presented whether such judgment is conclusive upon the stockholders of the corporation in this action, and that it is we entertain no doubt. The object of this suit is to compel the corporation against whom the judgment was recovered to satisfy the same out of its assets, and it is not competent for the defendants, who are simply called upon to pay what they owe to the corporation in order that its obligations may be discharged, to reopen the question whether, upon the facts, the plaintiff ought to have had judgment against the corporation. The judgment was a conclusive determination of that fact as against the corporation and all persons in privity with it, and carries with it, without relitigating the facts upon which it is based, the undoubted right of enforcement against the property of the corporation, and that is all that is sought in this case. A corporation represents and binds its stockholders in all matters within the limits of its corporate power, so long as it acts in good faith and without fraud upon their rights; and, in the bringing and defending of suits affecting the rights and obligations of the corporation, it binds the stockholders as fully as in the making of contracts. The right to sue and be sued, to maintain and defend actions concerning corporate rights and corporate liabilities, is a power incident to every corporation. In this state it is not only conferred by statute, but is preserved by constitutional provision. Const. Cal. art. 12, § 4. And with this right of the corporation to maintain and defend actions concerning its corporate rights or liabilities the stockholder cannot interfere, except when the directors refuse to act, or are guilty of fraud in the maintenance or defense of the action. Newby v. Railroad Co., 1 Sawy. 63; Memphis City v. Dean, 8 Wall. 73; Ware v. Bazemore, 58 Ga. 316; Greaves v. Gouge, 69 N. Y. 154; Brewer v. Boston Theatre, 104 Mass. 378. It must necessarily follow, from the nature of this corporate power, that a judgment against a corporation for an alleged corporate indebtedness is conclusive upon it, and of the right of the creditor to subject its property to the satisfaction thereof; and, in the absence of fraud, equally conclusive upon the stockholder when it is sought to satisfy the judgment out of the assets of the corporation in his hands. This was so held in Marsh v. Burroughs, 1 Woods, 471. Mr. Justice BRADLEY, in delivering the opinion of the court, saying: "The stockholders of the bank cannot ask to go behind the judgments rendered against the bank, and question the original cause of action, unless they can show collusion between the plaintiff and the bank, entered into for the purpose of defrauding the stockholders." And this view is also sustained by the following cases: Glenn v.

Williams, 60 Md. 93; Henry v. Elder, 63 Ga. 347; Lehman v. Glenn, (Ala.) 6 South. Rep. 44; Stephens v. Fox, 83 N. Y. 317; Bank v. Chandler, 19 Wis. 435. See, also, Mor. Priv. Corp. § 865.

6. The appellant Babcock offered to show upon the trial that he was the real owner of only 425 of the shares issued to him by the corporation, and that the others standing in his name on its books were owned by other parties, and that they were issued to him as a matter of convenience to enable him to negotiate a loan for such owners. The evidence was excluded, and, in our opinion, the ruling was correct. It seems to be well settled that one to whom stock is issued by the corporation, and who has the same placed in his name on the corporation books as the owner, is liable to the creditors of the corporation, as though he were the absolute owner; and this whether he was in fact a pledgee, agent, or trustee for the real owner. Bank v. Case, 99 U.S. 631; Cook, Stocks, §§ 249-253; Thomp. Stocks, § 223; Thompson v. Bank, 19 Nev. 103, 7 Pac. Rep. 68. The foregoing views dispose of all the questions presented by this appeal requiring special discussion. Judgment and order affirmed.

JUDSON et al. v. GAGE. (No. 14,037.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1891.)

FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY TO SUPPORT JUDGMENT.

In an action on notes given by defendant in payment of his subscription to a fund to purchase a right of way for a railroad the court found on conflicting evidence that there was a substantial compliance with the terms of defendant's subscription that the railroad should be built on a certain line through defendant's land. Held, that such finding sustained a judgment for plaintiffs.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. C. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by T. G. Judson against Matthew Gage on two promissory notes. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Curtis & Otis and Geo. E. Ottis, for appellant. E. E. Rowell and Waters & Gird, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action upon two promissory notes, alleged to have been made by defendant in payment of his subscription to a fund raised by citizens for the purpose of procuring a right of way and depot grounds for a certain railroad. Plaintiffs had judgment as prayed for, and defendant appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll, which contains a bill of exceptions. We think that the complaint is good as against a general demurrer, and that the demurrer was properly overruled, although neither the complaint nor the answer is as certain and full as it should have been. Appellant further contends that the evidence was not sufficient to support the finding that the notes were given in payment of the subscription; and also contends that the subscription and the notes, which were given several months afterwards, should be considered as one transaction, and that the evidence is not sufficient to support the finding that the conditions of the subscription were complied with. But the evidence is overwhelming to the point that the notes were given in payment of the subscription. As to the other contention, the point made is that the railroad, by the terms of the appellant's subscription, was to be constructed through his land "on a line running parallel to Dr. Pier-son's north line, and distant about 800 feet therefrom," and that the evidence fails to show that it was constructed on that line. There was some conflict of evidence on this point, but it warranted the court in finding that there was a substantial compliance with this condition. There was testimony to the point that the road was built substantially as described in the subscription, and that, if there was any slight variance from the rigid parallel line therein mentioned, such variance was with the knowledge and consent of the appellant, and that the road "did conform to Mr. Gage's ideas." We think that the findings support the judgment, and there are no other points necessary to be mentioned. The judgment is affirmed.

Action by Charles Bohnert against Josephine Bohnert for divorce. After judgment for plaintiff the court ordered him to pay into court certain amounts, to enable defendant to prosecute an appeal, and certain other money. From these orders plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John V. Brown and James F. Farraher, for appellants. H. B. Warren and Gillis & Tapscott, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from two certain orders made after judgment for plaintiff in an action of divorce based upon the adultery of the defendant. Upon a showing by the affidavit of defendant that she desired in good faith to appeal to the supreme court from the judgment rendered against her in the aforesaid action; that she was advised by the attorneys who appeared for her at the trial in the lower court that she has good grounds for appeal; that she has no attorneys to prosecute such appeal, and no means to retain such attorneys; that she has no funds from which to pay the costs and expenses of such appeal, and has no means for her personal support during the pendency of such appeal, etc.,—the court made an order that the plaintiff pay into court the following sums, to-wit: "The sum of eighty-seven and 80-100 dollars, to be paid out forthwith as expenses for transcribing the testimony on the part of the defendant already incurred; the sum of seventy-five dollars as incidental expenses in perfecting said appeal, including clerk's fees and expense of printing transcript herein and filing the same with the clerk of the supreme court; and the sum of three hundred dollars, attorneys' fees for preparing said cause for appeal, and arguing the same in the supreme court, to be paid said attorneys when the transcript in the said cause is ready for filing with the clerk of the supreme court; and that plaintiff pay as alimony to the said defendant the sum of twenty dollars per month from the date of the judgment herein during the pendency of the appeal." The court also made an order that "the plaintiff pay to the clerk of said court the amount of $269.90, to be by said clerk retained, and to await further action herein." The foregoing was the amount of defendant's costs incurred in the trial of the cause, as settled by the court. Plaintiff appeals from the foregoing orders.

Section 137 of the Civil Code provides that "when an action for divorce is pending the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay, as alimony, any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself or her children, or to prosecute or defend the action." Section 1049 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "An action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination upon appeal, or until the time for appeal is passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied." As to the granting of alimony pendente lite, that is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court, and this record discloses nothing to justify us in disturbing that discretion as exercised by the trial court in this cause. Under section 137 of the Civil Code, the power to make an allowance to the wife for her support as alimony, or an allowance to her for the purpose of defending or prosecuting the action, is not exhausted upon the rendition of the judgment in the trial court. Reilly v. Reilly, 60 Cal. 624; Ex parte Winter, 70 Cal. 291, 11 Pac. Rep. 630; Larkin v. Larkin, 71 Cal. 330, 12 Pac. Rep. 227. The case of Everett v. Everett, 52 Cal. 384, is not in conflict with the foregoing authorities. In that case the order was made under another section of the Civil Code, and was made after final judgment, and was in no sense an order for alimony made pendente lite. The order to pay the amount of the attorneys' fees into court is not void, under the authority of Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 37, 16 Pac. Rep. 345; for it is not "a direct judgment for money in favor of persons not parties to the suit." See Robinson v. Robinson, 79 Cal. 511, 21 Pac. Rep. 1095. The fact that the court ordered the clerk to retain in his possession until further order the amount ordered to be paid by plaintiff for witness fees affords no grounds of complaint by plaintiff, for he is not injured by that portion of the order. Let the orders be affirmed.

Ex parte WIDBER. (No. 20,829.)

SUPERIOR COURTS—FURNISHING ROOMS FOR HOLDING COURT—PAYMENT OF EXPENSE.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 144, provides that if suitable rooms, etc., for holding the superior courts be not provided by the county supervisors, the courts, or the judge or judges thereof, may direct the sheriff to provide the same, "and the expenses incurred, certified by the judge or judges to be correct, shall be a charge against the city and county treasury, and paid out of the general fund thereof." Held, that the courts or judges, after certifying the expenses incurred, have not, either inherently or under the statute, the power to order the treasurer to pay the same, and the latter is not guilty of contempt in refusing to obey such an order.

2. Since the statute provides that the expenses incurred shall be audited by the judge, it is not necessary that they be audited by the county supervisors.

In bank. Petition for writ of habeas corpus. Writ granted, and petitioner discharged.

John D. Durst, for petitioner. A. P. Black, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner alleges that he is unlawfully restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco. Section 144 of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows: "If suitable rooms for holding the superior courts and the chambers of the judges of said courts be not provided in any city and county, or county, by the supervisors thereof, together with the attendants, furniture, fuel, lights, and stationery sufficient for the transaction of business, the courts, or the judge or judges thereof, may direct the sheriff of the city and county, or county, to provide such rooms, attendants, furniture, fuel, lights, and stationery; and the expenses incurred, certified by the judge or judges to be correct, shall be a charge against the city and county treasury, and paid out of the general fund thereof." The board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco having failed to provide suitable apartments, furniture, stationery, etc., sufficient for the transaction of the business of department 11 of the superior court of said city and county, said department 11, Hon. JAMES M. TROUTT presiding, made an order that the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco provide such apartments, furniture, stationery, etc., sufficient for the transaction of the business of said department of the court. The sheriff complied with the aforesaid order, and incurred certain expenses in the sum of $1,867.42 therefor, and said expenses were certified to be correct by said JAMES M. TROUTT, judge of department 11 of the superior court of said city and county. Thereafter an order of court was made declaring that said expenses were a charge against the treasury of the city and county of San Francisco, and it was further ordered and adjudged that the treasurer of said city and county forthwith pay out of the "general fund" the aforesaid bills and expenses. A copy of this order was served upon the petitioner, treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, and he refused to comply with its terms; whereupon such proceedings were had that he was adjudged guilty of contempt, and ordered committed to the custody of the sheriff.

In the solution of the question as to the legality or illegality of petitioner's imprisonment, it is only necessary to determine whether or not the court had any authority in law to make the order requiring the treasurer to pay these expenses. If the order was made without authority in law, the treasurer was not bound to obey it, and his refusal constituted no contempt. That portion of the order of the court declaring the expenses to be a charge against the treasury of the city and county of San Francisco is purely surplusage, for the statute expressly provides that the act of the judge in certifying to the correctness of these expenses constitutes them a charge against the city and county treasury, to be paid out of the general fund. It will be conceded upon all sides that it is the duty of the board of supervisors to prepare suitable rooms, furniture, stationery, etc., for the use of the judges of the superior courts of this state, and public officers are presumed to know their official duties. It is also conceded that the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco in the line of their official duties failed to provide suitable rooms, furniture, lights, etc., for department 11 of the superior court of said city and county. It is immaterial whether such failure was willful and intentional, or arose through negligence and neglect, the evil results to ensue from the failure would be the same. The articles enumerated are necessities required in order that courts may exist, and the law be administered; and the legislature undoubtedly recognized these facts when it provided that, if these articles were not furnished, the court should have the power to provide them forthwith, and thus the progress of its business would not be retarded, and the administration of justice would flow on without interruption. This power vested in the judge or court is not an unlimited power, and therefore not a dangerous power. This section of the Code does not open wide the doors of the city treasury, and place the keys of the treasure vaults in the hands of the judiciary, with an invitation to enter and partake ad libitum, as petitioner would insist, but the power is measured by the section, and expenditures made in excess of the limitation of the statute would be made without authority of the law. It is not necessary that these demands should be audited by the board of supervisors, for the legislature in the section of the Code itself provided that the judge should be the auditing officer. The act of the board of supervisors in auditing such demands would be an idle thing, purely pro forma, for it would have no authority to reduce or increase the amount of the demand, as certified by the judge. Indeed, the legislature never intended that the board of supervisors should audit these demands, which are created in direct opposition in most cases to their wishes and desires, and to which the board may be hostilely inclined. Ex parte Reis, 64 Cal. 233, and especially the concurring opinion of Justice THORNTON, 242 et seq., would seem to conclusively establish the correctness of the foregoing views.

This demand being a charge against the city and county treasury, to be paid out of the general fund, can the payment thereof be enforced against the county treasurer by proceedings in contempt? In other words, had the court the power to order the petitioner to pay this money from the general fund of the treasury? If it had the power to make the order, it had the power to enforce that order by contempt proceedings, but we find nothing in the provisions of the section giving the court any such power, and it certainly had not the inherent power to make the order, for such power was not a necessary incident to the court in order that its previous acts might fully and truly accomplish the results intended and desired. The demand had ripened into a legal liability against the city and county, and remedies were not lacking to enforce its payment. Again, the treasurer was not an officer of the court, and in no way was he a party to the proceedings. Under the above circumstances, the court certainly had no inherent power to make an order placing the petitioner in the unpleasant and perilous position of either paying out the people's money or be punished for contempt of court. Under the provision of the Code, the court does not even audit the demand; that act is performed by the judge, and when performed the power given under the section is exhausted, and whatever duty devolves upon the treasurer thereafter, in relation to such demand, is a duty imposed by law, and a neglect or refusal to perform that duty renders him liable to proceedings by writ of mandamus or other appropriate remedy. The cases of Ex parte Reis, 64 Cal. 233, and Aid Soc. v. Reis, 71 Cal. 627, 12 Pac. Rep. 796, add no weight to respondent's position. The latter case is a proceeding in mandamus, and in the matter of Ex parte Reis the language of the statute was, "and paid out of the treasury of the county on the order of the court." These words are italicized in the opinion of Justice McKINSTRY, and it is patent from a casual reading of the decision that, if the statute had not contained the words "on the order of the court," the petitioner would never have been remanded. We conclude, therefore, that the court neither had inherent power, nor power granted by statute, to make the order requiring petitioner to pay out the city and county's money upon these certified demands, and that a refusal to obey such order did not render the petitioner amenable to proceedings in contempt. Let the petitioner be discharged.

KREMER v. EARL et al. (No. 14,054.)

CONTRACTS AGAINST PUBLIC POLICY—AGREEMENT TO CONVEY—PUBLIC LANDS—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

1. Under Pol. Code Cal. § 3500, relative to acquiring title to school lands from the state, and requiring the applicant to swear that he is a citizen of the county and a resident of the state, and that he has not entered any of said land, which, together with that then sought to be purchased, exceeded 320 acres, a contract by which one of two persons, each of whom claims adversely to the other the right to acquire title to nearly 500 acres of public land, agrees to convey to the other all the title which he had or might have in about 400 acres of it, he having already taken steps to have other persons enter it in their names, under the school-land laws, but for his benefit, is void as in violation of the spirit of the law, and will not be enforced.

2. Though the defendant in an action to enforce such contract has never questioned its legality, a decree for its specific performance will on appeal be reversed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action to compel the conveyance of land and the cancellation of a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Del Valle & Munday, for appellants. S. Haley and Lee & Scott, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to compel the defendant Earl to convey to plaintiff, who is special administrator of the estate of Henry Charles, deceased, the legal title to the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 22, township 8 S., range 8 W., S. B. M., and to cancel a mortgage thereon given by Earl to his co-defendant Egan. The facts found by the court show that in September, 1875, Henry Charles and F. P. Forster, brother of defendant M. A. Forster, claimed the right adversely to each other to acquire the title to several tracts of public land, including the land in controversy, and on that day entered into a written agreement, by the terms of which Forster agreed to convey to Charles all the right, title, and interest which he then held or might thereafter acquire in the lands described in the agreement, upon the payment to him by Charles within 60 days of the amount paid by Forster to Mullen & Hyde, of San Francisco, for said lands, together with interest thereon at 1 per cent. per month. On November 8, 1875, Charles paid to Forster the sum of \$1,056, which was more than enough to pay for the lands described in the agreement, and thereupon Forster executed and delivered to Charles a deed of conveyance, including the lands in controversy. Forster had previously, for the purpose of acquiring the title to the lands described in the agreement, together with other public lands, employed Mullen & Hyde to discover portions of school sections which had been lost to the state, and to procure lands in lieu thereof, under the provisions of title 8, pt. 3, of the Political Code. In pursuance of their employment they procured one Sheldon to make an application in due form under the provisions of the Code referred to for certain lands, including the lands in controversy, on March 5, 1875. On April 16, 1875, the surveyor general applied to the register of the United States land-office, asking that all of the lands described in Sheldon's application be accepted in part satisfaction of the grant to the state in lieu of certain portions of school sections which had been lost to the state, and at the same time located and selected the lands described in the application for the use and benefit of the applicant. On November 15, 1875, the surveyor general's selection was duly approved by the commissioner of the general land-office and by the secretary of the interior, and thereupon the state became the owner of the lands. About the same time Mullen & Hyde procured other persons to make applications for other portions of the land which Forster had agreed to secure and convey to Charles. Believing the applications to be void because they had been made before the approval of the township plat, Mullen & Hyde procured other persons to file applications for the same lands in March, 1876. Sheldon's application was abandoned, and one Weber filed on the lands described therein. His application was approved by the surveyor general in December, 1880, and on February 19, 1881, the register of the land-office issued to him a certificate of purchase for the lands described in his application, including the lands in controversy. F. P. Forster died intestate March 15, 1881, and the defendant M. A. Forster was appointed administrator in the following month. In February, 1881, Mullen & Hyde procured Weber to execute a deed to the defendant Egan for all the lands in the Weber application. This conveyance, the court finds, was for the sole use and benefit of F. P. Forster, who paid the consideration and cost thereof. Egan, who was an employee of F. P. Forster, did not know of the execution of the deed until several days thereafter. On November 24, 1882, Egan conveyed the lands in controversy, with others, to M. A. Forster, it being understood that Forster would reconvey to him the 40 acres in controversy. November 25, 1882, Forster reconveyed the lands in controversy to Egan. A patent was issued to M. A. Forster December 27, 1882. March 10, 1888, Egan conveyed the 40-acre tract to Earl in consideration of the sum of \$4,000, one-third of which was paid in cash, and the balance was secured by the note and mortgage which plaintiff seeks to have canceled. Egan was the trustee, friend, and confidential adviser of both F. P. and M. A. Forster. He acted as the agent of F. P. in procuring the payment of the \$1,056 by Charles, and never disclosed the fact that he claimed any interest in the land in controversy until within two years before the commencement of this action. All of the defendants knew of the agreement between Charles and Forster from the time it was executed, and had notice of all the facts concerning the dealings between Mullen & Hyde, the different applicants who filed on the lands, and Charles and Forster. Charles always erroneously believed, until within two years prior to the commencement of this action, that he had acquired title to the lands in controversy through the application of Clarke and Cavanaugh, the certificate of purchase issued to them and assigned to him, and the patent issued by the state to him for the lands described in their application. Hyde procured the deed from Weber to Egan to be made to Egan as the agent of Forster, and Egan received it in trust for and for the sole use and benefit of Forster, who paid the consideration, fees, and expenses on account thereof through Mullen & Hyde. The purchase price of the land was paid to the state by Egan from his own funds. Charles occupied the lands in controversy exclusively, and used the same for pasture, from the time of the agreement with Forster to April 1, 1883. From April 1, 1883, to March 30, 1888,—the date of the commencement of this action,—he used the land in the same manner in connection with other lands, except that in 1885 and 1886 Egan's tenants, who it appears were also tenants of the plaintiff, used the land for pasturage. Egan purposely concealed from Charles the fact that he had procured a deed from Weber for the 40-acre tract.

It is apparent from the facts stated above, and taken from the findings of the court, that the purpose of the agreement between Charles and Forster was to secure from the state large tracts of land in a manner unauthorized by law. The lands described in the agreement itself amounted to 398.46 acres, and the quantity claimed by each adversely to the other was 463.27 acres. The statute under which they propose to acquire title to the lands requires the applicant to make an affidavit that he is a citizen of the United States, or has filed his intention to become such, and a resident of the state of lawful age; that he desires to purchase the lands, and there is no valid claim to the same other than that of the applicant; that he has not entered any land in part satisfaction of the grant in lieu of sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, which, together with that now sought to be purchased, exceeds 320 acres. There is no doubt that the contract contravenes the spirit and policy of the land laws of this state. The application and purchase authorized by section 3500, Pol. Code, are intended for the benefit of the applicant himself. "This was distinctly the policy of the act,—a policy adopted to prevent the acquisition of large tracts of land by one person through the use of other persons. * * * If such evasion of the statute as is attempted in this case should be allowed, it would be a very easy matter for one who had acquired under the laws above mentioned 640 [here 320] acres, and therefore could not take the oath prescribed, by the employment of others, who could take the oath, to acquire for himself, in manifest disregard of the intent and policy of the act, many times 640 [here 320] acres." McGregor v. Donnelly, 67 Cal. 150, 7 Pac. Rep. 422. It is not necessary that the act itself or any other act should declare in express words such a contract to be void. If, upon a review of all the state legislation upon the subject, such a contract appears to contravene the design and policy of the laws, a court of equity will not enforce it. Civil Code, § 1667; Dial v. Hair, 18 Ala. 800; Smith v. Johnson, 37 Ala. 636. "No court will lend its aid to give effect to a contract which is illegal, whether it violate the common or statute law, either expressly or by implication." Damrell v. Meyer, 40 Cal. 170. The parties being in pari delicto, the court will leave them where it finds them. Wat. Spec. Perf. § 207. Our land laws are intended to benefit actual settlers; to encourage the immigration of industrious people, and enable them to build homes; to place the lands of the state beyond the reach of speculators. If we hold this contract not to be in violation of the spirit of the law, we shall sanction a contrivance by which one, though not an actual settler, or even a resident of the state, can acquire any quantity of land under the act. There is nothing in the record to show that Charles was a citizen of the United States, or possessed of any of the qualifications necessary to entitle him to purchase land from the state. If he is entitled to the relief he seeks in this action, it must be by virtue of the terms of the written contract, and not by virtue of any oral agreement, or of any trust relation existing between him and Egan, or between Egan and Forster. There is enough in the record to indicate that the land in controversy is agricultural land, and fit for cultivation. If it is, no one was entitled to purchase it who was not an actual settler thereon. There seems to be no pretense that the plaintiff was ever an actual settler on the land. Our constitution provides that "lands belonging to this state, which are suitable for cultivation, shall be granted only to actual settlers, and in quantities not exceeding 320 acres to each settler;" and this provision governs applications made prior to the time when the constitution took effect. Manley v. Cunningham, 72 Cal. 240, 13 Pac. Rep. 622; Wat. Spec. Perf. § 207, supra; Brake v. Ballou, 19 Kan. 402. But, whether the lands were fit for cultivation or not, the agreement upon which plaintiff relies for a specific performance contravenes the provisions of the statutes which were in force at the time it was executed, and no recovery can be had upon it.

It may be suggested that the appellant has never questioned the legality of the contract, and that we ought not to make the point for him. As a general rule, cases should not be reversed upon points which the respondent has not had an opportunity to discuss; but in cases of this kind the court is bound to satisfy its own conscience, and cannot shut its eyes to the fact, although it is not put in issue. A court of equity will not allow itself to become a handmaid of iniquity of any kind. It intervenes, not for the sake of the party who is benefited by the intervention, but for the sake of the law itself. It matters not that no objection is made by either party; when the court discovers a fact which indicates that the contract is illegal, and ought not to be enforced, it will of its own motion instigate an inquiry in relation thereto. Valentine v. Stewart, 15 Cal. 405; Pom. Cont. § 286. Judgment and order reversed, with directions to the court below to dismiss the action.

WARNER v. DARROW. (No. 14,179.)

APPEAL—JUDGMENT OF NONSUIT—RIGHTS OF VENDEE—TRIAL ON CROSS-COMPLAINT.

1. The time within which an appeal can be taken from a judgment of nonsuit is not prescribed by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 939, subd. 1, providing that an exception to the decision or verdict, on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence, cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, unless the appeal is taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment. Miller v. Wade, 25 Pac. Rep. 487, explained.

2. Under an agreement of the vendor of land to make the conveyance "on or before" a date named, provided the vendee shall, "on or before that day," have paid to the vendor the price stated therein, payment or tender of the price by the vendee within the time stated, entitles him to a conveyance.

3. Where plaintiff is nonsuited after filing an answer to a cross-complaint, he can have no relief on account of matters alleged in his complaint, but defendant is entitled to have the issues made by his cross-complaint, and the answer thereto, tried and disposed of.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by Warner against Darrow, in which the plaintiff is nonsuited, and the defendant files a cross complaint for affirmative relief that the plaintiff be required to convey certain land. Trial under the cross-complaint, and judgment of nonsuit against defendant. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. T. Kendrick, for appellant. M. Whaling, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant filed a cross-complaint in the action, in which he asked as affirmative relief that the plaintiff be required to convey to him certain described land. The plaintiff answered. Upon trial of the action the plaintiff was, upon motion of defendant, nonsuited. The court thereupon proceeded to a trial of the issues made by the cross-complaint and answer thereto, and, when the defendant had concluded his evidence in support of his cross-complaint, the court, on motion of plaintiff, granted a nonsuit as to the matters alleged in said cross-complaint. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

1. The appeal in this case was taken more than 60 days after the rendition of the judgment of nonsuit, and the respondent insists that, as the determination of the question whether the nonsuit was proper actually depends upon the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the allegations of the cross-complaint, the appeal was not taken in time.¹ This view finds support in the opinion of Mr. Justice Works, in Miller v. Wade, 87 Cal. 410, 25 Pac. Rep. 487, but was not concurred in by a majority of the court in that case, and it cannot be sustained without overruling previous decisions in which it was uniformly held that the ruling of a court upon a motion for a nonsuit presents a pure question of law, and is properly assigned as such on appeal from the judgment. Cravens v. Dewey, 13 Cal. 42; Donahue v. Gallavan, 43 Cal. 576; Schroeder v. Schmidt, 74 Cal. 460, 16 Pac. Rep. 243. In the latter case this court said: "An error in granting a nonsuit is an error in law, and should be excepted to and specified as such. Donahue v. Gallavan, 43 Cal. 576; Cravens v. Dewey, 13 Cal. 42. It cannot be reviewed on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the decision. This is a ground for the review of questions of fact, not of law." We have no doubt of the correctness of these views. A motion for a non uit admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence, and every inference of fact which can be properly drawn therefrom, and the question thus presented is as purely one of law as that which would arise if, to a complaint alleging the same facts, a demurrer should be interposed upon the ground that such facts were insufficient to constitute a cause of action.

2. The evidence was sufficient to show that appellant tendered to respondent the balance of the price, which, by the terms of the agreement alleged in the cross-complaint, he was to pay for the land. This, in the absence of any proof of the matters set up as a defense, entitled him to a conveyance. The agreement binds the respondent to make the conveyance "on or before" July 1, 1892, provided that the appellant shall, "on or before that day, have paid to the obligor" the price named therein. This provision does not render the present action by appellant for a specific performance premature, or justify the respondent in withholding the conveyance after she had been paid or tendered the agreed price for the land. The true meaning of the agreement is that appellant was to have until the dates fixed therein within which to make the different payments provided for, the last falling due on July 1, 1892, but might at his option make payment sooner, and if he did that respondent would at once convey. Upon payment or tender of the purchase price, the appellant became in equity the owner of the whole estate in the land purchased, and entitled to a conveyance of the legal title.

3. The nonsuit of plaintiff, upon motion of defendant, did not operate as a dismissal of the action, so as to prevent the trial of the issues arising upon the cross-complaint and the answer thereto. The effect of this order was that plaintiff was entitled to no relief against the defendant on account of matters alleged in the complaint, but the issues made by the cross-complaint and the answer thereto still remained, and the appellant was entitled to have them tried and disposed of. This was, in effect, so held in Mott v. Mott, 82 Cal. 419, 22 Pac. Rep. 1140. The case of Wood v. Ramond, 42 Cal. 644, upon which respondent relies, is not in conflict with this view. In that case there was no cross-complaint, and what was there said about an order of nonsuit being, in effect, a dismissal of the action does not apply here. The other grounds relied upon to sustain the judgment do not require special mention. The reversal of the judgment and order denying appellant's motion for a new trial necessarily compels a reversal of the order denying the motion for taxation of costs. Judgment and orders reversed.

INSURANCE—CONDITIONS OF POLICY—CHANGE OF POSSESSION AND TITLE.

Putting a lessee in possession of insured property under a contract that he shall buy the property on the expiration of his lease, or, at his option, at any time during its continuance, does not violate a condition of the policy that it shall become void if any change takes place in the title or possession, when, on application for the insurance, the building was in process of erection, untenanted, and the company had notice of the contemplated lease and change of possession, though not of the agreement to convey contained in the lease. 23 Pac. Rep. 383, reversed.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 23 Pac. Rep. 383.

Action by Smith and others against the Phenix Insurance Company for loss under a fire policy. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed on rehearing.

BEATTY, C. J. In March, 1890, we made a decision in this case reversing the judgment of the superior court, with directions to enter judgment on the findings in favor of the appellant. 23 Pac. Rep. 383. After a rehearing of the case, and upon fuller consideration of the questions involved, we are satisfied that our former decision was erroneous, and that the judgment of the superior court should be affirmed. The action is upon a fire insurance policy. Plaintiffs had judgment in the lower court, and defendant appealed from the judgment alone, claiming that upon the facts found the judgment should have been in its favor. The policy in suit was issued in August, 1887, and the property insured consisted of a frame building designed for an hotel or boarding-house. The defendant was advised by the papers accompanying the application for insurance—which, by the terms of the policy, are made a part of the contract—that the building was occupied or to be occupied by a tenant (no particular tenant being named) for hotel purposes; and it is found by the court, as alleged in the complaint, “that before said insurance was effected defendant had full knowledge that said building was built by plaintiffs for the purpose of renting the same for a boarding and lodging house, and was to be occupied by the tenant of the plaintiffs, the said building not being at that time fully completed and furnished.” After the insurance was effected and the building completed, the plaintiffs, on December 24, 1887, by a written lease, demised the insured premises to one J. D. Stewart for a term of five years, at a fixed rent, payable monthly. The lease also contained stipulations binding the plaintiffs to put in certain furniture, consisting of carpets, cooking range, gas-fixtures, etc., and binding Stewart to put in other necessary furniture. It was agreed that the building and furniture should be properly insured for the benefit of the parties as their interest might appear, and that Stewart, the lessee, should pay one-half of the expense of insuring the building and the entire expense of insuring the furniture. It was further agreed as follows: “Said party of the second part [Stewart] may at any time during said term of five years purchase said hotel, lots, and premises for the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars cash, and likewise purchase said carpets, gas-fixtures, and range at cost price. It is further agreed that said party of the second part will purchase said hotel, lots, and premises on or before five years from this date for the sum of $25,000, together with said carpets, gas-fixtures, and range at their cost price.” The defendant had no notice of these stipulations for purchase and sale of the property. Under this lease and agreement Stewart entered into possession of the insured premises, and so continued until the destruction of the hotel by fire in April, 1888. The plaintiffs thereafter, upon due notice and proofs of loss, demanded payment of the policy, which was refused by the defendant. Hence this action, which is defended on the ground of an alleged violation by plaintiffs of the following conditions of the policy: “If the property be sold or transferred, (in whole or in part,) or upon the commencement of foreclosure proceedings against, or a sale under a deed of trust, or the existence of a judgment lien, or the issue or levy of an execution against any kind of property herein described; or if the property be assigned under any bankrupt or insolvent law, or any change takes place in the title or possession, (except in case of succession by reason of the death of the assured,) whether by legal process or judicial decree, or voluntary transfer, assignment, or conveyance; or if the title or possession shall be changed from any cause whatsoever; or if this policy shall be assigned before a loss, without the consent of the company indorsed hereon,—this policy shall, in each and every instance, be void." The passages which we have italicized are those to which attention is particularly directed; the claim of appellant being that the lease and agreement of sale, and Stewart's possession thereunder, wrought a change both in the title and possession of the property insured, involving a forfeiture by plaintiffs of all rights under the policy.

In their argument at the rehearing counsel for appellant took the position, for the first time, that possession by Stewart, under the lease and as a tenant merely, without regard to the contract of sale, was a violation of the provision of the policy against a change of possession. But clearly this position cannot be maintained, in view of the statement made in the application upon which the policy was issued, to the effect that the building was to be occupied by a tenant for hotel purposes; and the fact found by the court that defendant had full knowledge, before issuing the policy, of the purpose for which the building was being constructed, and that it was to be occupied by a tenant. Occupancy of the identical character contemplated by the policy was not a change of possession. The issuance of the policy was an express consent to possession by a tenant, and, since no particular tenant was named, it was a consent to occupancy by any tenant selected by the assured, subject, of course, to revocation by canceling the policy and returning the premium if an objectionable tenant was selected.

The real and only question in the case is whether the contract of sale embraced in the lease, or superadded to it, wrought a change in the title to the insured premises within the meaning of the policy, or imparted to the possession of Stewart a character materially different from the possession of a tenant. Upon this question we held in our former decision, in accordance with the contention of appellant, that Stewart, by taking possession of the insured premises under the lease and agreement of December 24, 1887, not only acquired the right but became absolutely bound to complete the purchase; that henceforth the buildings were at his risk; that if they were destroyed the loss would be his alone, because he was obliged at the expiration of his term as tenant, upon tender of a deed for the land without the buildings, to pay the full contract price of $25,000. From this it necessarily followed that Stewart, from the time of taking possession, acquired an insurable interest equivalent to the value of the buildings, and that, if plaintiffs could collect the insurance and keep it, they would be paid twice over for the buildings, so that they would have a direct interest in their destruction. Of course, upon these premises, it was impossible to avoid the conclusion that the effect of the transaction with Stewart was to work a change in the title not merely nominal and technical, but substantial and material to the risk, and necessarily violative of the conditions of the policy. But on a fuller consideration of the case we are satisfied that the authorities cited in our opinion and in the briefs of counsel did not warrant us in holding that under the circumstances of this case Stewart, by taking possession under the lease and contract of December 24, 1887, became absolutely bound to complete the purchase of the premises at the expiration of his term, notwithstanding the previous destruction of the buildings. There can be no question that under such a contract the equitable title to the land, as between the vendor and vendee, is in the latter. This is a familiar doctrine of equity, based upon the principle that, for the prevention of fraud and the enforcement of the just rights of the parties, equity will deem that to be done which ought to be done. The maxim is applied most frequently in actions by the vendee for specific performance of the contract, or in aid of his defense when the vendor is seeking to recover possession of the land upon his legal title. Laffan v. Naglee, 9 Cal. 663; De Rutte v. Muldrow, 16 Cal. 505; Hall v. Center, 40 Cal. 63; Dowd v. Clarke, 54 Cal. 48; King v. Ruckman, 21 N. J. Eq. 599.

Decisions almost innumerable to the same effect might be cited from the reports of this and other states, but they do not decide the question involved in this case. There is a wide distinction between the proposition that the vendee in possession under an executory contract of sale may maintain the possession against the vendor as long as he performs his part of the agreement, and upon full compliance may enforce specific performance of the vendor's contract to convey the legal title, and the proposition here contended for, viz., that the vendor in such a contract, notwithstanding the destruction of the subject of the contract, in whole or in part, before the date stipulated for payment and conveyance, and his consequent inability to make a conveyance of that for which the vendee has bargained, may nevertheless compel the vendee to pay the whole contract price in exchange for a fraction of the property sold. When we come to make a critical examination of the cases cited to this point, and especially the cases in which the precise questions we are considering are directly involved, we find that they lend a very slight support to the appellant's contention. In the case of McKechnie v. Sterling, 48 Barb. 330, the doctrine is, it is true, carried to an extreme degree; but the authorities cited in support of that decision are not in point, and the reasoning by which they are made to support the decision is very unsatisfactory. In Richter v. Selin, 8 Serg. & R. 439, the supreme court of Pennsylvania use this language: "Where a contract is made for the sale of land, equity considers the vendee as the owner of the estate sold, and the purchaser as a trustee for the vendor for the purchase money. So much is the vendee considered in contemplation of equity as actually seized of the estate that he must bear any loss that may happen to the estate between the agreement and the conveyance, and he will be entitled to any benefit which may accrue to it in the interval, because by the contract he is the owner of the premises to every intent and purpose in equity." But this was said arguendo in deciding a case where the point was not directly involved, and the proposition, true enough in general, and in its application to the circumstances of that case, was stated in its most unqualified form, and without regard to the special circumstances which in many cases render it inapplicable. Similar statements of the same doctrine are to be found in some of the insurance cases hereinafter referred to, with reference to most of which it was correctly applied, as we shall see. But we shall also see that the doctrine has its reasonable limitations, and that this is one of the cases to which it cannot be applied without doing the wrong and injustice which it was designed to prevent. In the case of Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514, the facts were that the plaintiff agreed to sell the defendant a farm, and the defendant agreed to buy. On the day previous to that fixed for the payment and conveyance, the buildings on the farm were destroyed by fire. The plaintiff tendered a conveyance in pursuance of the contract, and demanded payment of the purchase price, which being refused, he sued for damages. It was held that he could not recover, because by reason of the destruction of the buildings he was unable to comply with the contract on his part. It is true the vendee had not taken possession, and the court found it necessary to distinguish the cases in which lessees in possession had been held liable on their covenant to pay rent or make repairs notwithstanding the destruction of tenements by fire during the term. In those cases it was said the liability of the defendant resulted from the fact that the lessors had fully complied with their contracts, while in the case under consideration the plaintiff was unable to do so. There can be no doubt of the soundness of this distinction, and no difficulty, we think, in showing that it applies to the present case. In the earlier Massachusetts case, (Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. 134,) it was applied where the defendant was in possession and had paid the purchase price for the purpose of sustaining his right to recover back the money paid. In that case the agreement of purchase and sale was by parol, but the plaintiff paid at different dates the whole purchase price, and got receipts in writing specifying the purpose of the payments, and he had entered into possession of the house. Clearly, under the circumstances, he had put himself in a position to enforce specific performance of the contract to convey, and was the owner of the equitable title. But, before any conveyance was tendered, the house was destroyed by fire, and the plaintiff sued in assumpsit for the money paid. In a well-considered opinion the court held that he was entitled to recover back the money on account of failure of consideration. It was conceded that the contract of the vendor, though by parol, could, under the circumstances, have been specifically enforced, but it was denied that it could have been enforced against the vendee after destruction of the house. It may be said that in this decision the mere legal rights of the parties were regarded, and that the court could not act upon the equitable doctrine for want of jurisdiction; but it will be seen that the equitable doctrine was discussed in the opinion, and its reasonable limitations pointed out. What those limitations are it is not necessary that we should consider exhaustively. For the purpose of this decision, it is sufficient to say that no case has been cited, and we have discovered none, in which the vendee has been held bound to pay the purchase price where a valuable part of the property has been destroyed before the day fixed for payment and conveyance, unless he has taken possession under the contract of sale, or has the right to such possession under the contract before the occurrence of the loss. Now, in this case, it is to be remembered that the agreement between plaintiffs and Stewart consisted of a lease, for a term of five years, reserving a rent payable monthly in money, a stipulation giving Stewart the privilege of purchasing at $25,000 at any time during the term, and the contract binding him to purchase at $25,000 at the end of the term.

In considering the question before us we may lay out of view the stipulation giving Stewart the privilege of purchasing, for clearly he was not thereby bound to take the property and pay for it, even if it remained whole and intact. To determine the character of his possession with reference to the extent of his liability upon his agreement to purchase, the contract is to be viewed as if it consisted merely of the lease and the agreement to purchase. Would Stewart, entering under such a contract, at the beginning of the term demised, be deemed, for the purpose of enforcing a most inequitable liability, to have entered and to be holding under his contract of purchase? Clearly he would not, if his possession could be referred to either the lease or the contract as distinct from the other; for there can be no doubt that during the term of the lease he would hold under that. His right to remain in possession would depend on his payment of rent and performance of other covenants of the lease, and would be determined by failure so to pay and perform. And we think that, for the purpose of determining his liability under his agreement to purchase, in case of destruction of a material part of the property sold prior to the time for payment and conveyance, this distinction between the lease and agreement ought to be made. It is reasonable and equitable, and not opposed to any authority cited, unless the case in 48 Barb., above referred to, should be deemed an authority against it. If so, we can only say that we think that case goes to an unreasonable length, and that it ought not to be followed. On the contrary, we think the best-considered cases warrant us in holding that the liability of Stewart upon his agreement to purchase ended with the destruction of the hotel; that it was never at his risk, but was always at the sole risk of the plaintiffs. But appellant contends that even on this view there was a change of title and possession within the meaning of the policy, and he cites a number of cases to sustain the proposition that the equitable ownership of a vendee under a contract of purchase constitutes a sole, absolute, and unconditional ownership, and consequently that the vendor cannot also be the sole, absolute, and unconditional owner. A review of these cases, however, will show that they differ essentially from the case in hand. In the case of Hough v. Insurance Co., 29 Conn. 10, the legal title to the property insured was in a trustee, who held it as security for about $1,600, subject to which incumbrance the plaintiff and two others owned the equitable title in equal shares. The plaintiff bought out his co-owners, agreeing to pay each the sum of $1,000 for his interest, and he had paid on his purchase $500 to one, and $700 to the other. He had also taken possession of the land, and erected a dwelling thereon, at a cost of $2,700, and was to receive a conveyance from the trustee upon the payment of the sum secured to him on the property. Under these circumstances, the court held that it was not a misrepresentation on the part of plaintiff in applying for insurance to state that the property was his. And it was also held that his interest in the property was, within the meaning of the policy, an absolute interest, because he could by no contingency be deprived of it except by his own consent. No doubt this case was correctly decided. The plaintiff, by reason of his original interest in the property, his payment to his co-owners upon the purchase of their interests, and the money he had expended in improvements on the property, independent of his agreement to purchase, had bound himself to do so, and he was the only person who could suffer loss by destruction of the property. It was his, therefore, absolutely, in every sense of the word material to the risk. And the decision was in line with hundreds of others in which the courts everywhere have refused to defeat recovery upon insurance policies by giving effect to the literal terms of clauses of forfeiture. Such clauses are always, and justly, construed with the utmost strictness against the insurer, and always with reference to their only legitimate object, i. e., the protection of the insurer against risks that are materially different from those which he has undertaken. The cases of Insurance Co. v. Wilgus, 88 Pa. St. 107; Chandler v. Insurance Co., Id. 223; Insurance Co. v. Dyches, 56 Tex. 565; Swift v. Insurance Co., 18 Vt. 313; and Gaylord v. Insurance Co., 40 Mo. 16,—are all substantially like the Connecticut case, and the decisions rest upon the same ground. In every instance the vendee had made large or complete payments upon his purchase, or valuable improvements, or both. In other words, he had given bonds to complete it, so that the loss must necessarily fall upon him in case of destruction of buildings.

The case of Unavidson v. Insurance Co., 71 Iowa, 532, 32 N. W. Rep. 514, upon the authority of which, principally, our former decision herein was based, was another of the same sort. There the vendee had entered into possession of a small farm under a contract to purchase it for $400, upon which $50 was to be paid in cash. Prior to the sale the vendor had, as in this case, procured insurance on a building on the farm. After the sale the building was destroyed by fire, and the vendor sued on the policy. The defense was breach of a condition of the policy against any sale or conveyance of the property by the insured. The defense was sustained on the ground that there was a sale of the property. This ruling was clearly opposed to the decision of the supreme court of Maryland in Insurance Co. v. Kelly, 32 Md. 421, and to other decisions cited in the dissenting opinion. It was rested also upon the false assumption that if the plaintiff could collect the insurance he could also collect the full purchase price of the building from his vendee, which would be holding, in effect, that the defendant remained bound by the policy after it became the interest of the assured to destroy the property. But upon the doctrine of equity that the vendee in possession is the equitable owner of the property, and the vendor merely his trustee of the legal title, the money collected by the plaintiff on the policy would have been held in trust for the vendee, and applied on the purchase price, (Reed v. Lukens, 44 Pa. St. 202;) so that in fact the plaintiff, even if he had been held entitled to recover on the policy, could have no interest in the destruction of the property. And so in this case, even if Stewart could be held bound by his contract of purchase after the fire, the plaintiff could gain nothing by collecting the amount of the policy. This, however, would be no answer to the objection of defendant that the title was changed in a sense material to the risk; for to hold that the plaintiff could collect the insurance for the benefit of his vendee would convert the transaction into a virtual assignment of the policy, which can never be done without the consent of the insurer. We do not, therefore, rest our decision in any degree upon the ground that the plaintiffs could not possibly have derived an advantage from the destruction of the hotel, and have only alluded to the matter for the purpose of calling attention to the false quantity in the reasoning of the Iowa supreme court in the case cited in support of our former decision. The cases of Insurance Co. v. Dunham, 117 Pa. St. 460, 12 Atl. Rep. 668, and Elliott v. Insurance Co., 117 Pa. St. 548, 12 Atl. Rep. 676, cited on the rehearing, are essentially like the other cases cited to the same point, which we have already considered. We conclude that there was in this case no change of title or possession material to the risk, and that the judgment of the superior court on the facts found was correct. In reaching this conclusion we have not overlooked the argument based upon the fact that Stewart agreed to pay one-half of the premium on the insurance of the hotel. That agreement is evidently one of the terms of the lease, as contradistinguished from the agreement to purchase. The judgment is affirmed.

FREDERICK et al. v. DICKEY. (No. 14,015.)
(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1891.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—PAYMENT OF TAXES—LOCATION OF WATER-RIGHT—EVIDENCE.

1. Where a mill owner claimed adverse possession of a water-ditch appurtenant to his mill, and of a right of way therefor over adjoining property, for a period exceeding five years, and his land was, during one year of that period, mortgaged for more than its value, his failure to show, in an action to enjoin his neighbor from interfering with the ditch, that he paid the taxes on the mill property or on the ditch for that year, is immaterial under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 325, which provides that one claiming adverse possession of "land" must show that he has paid all the taxes thereon; since, strictly speaking, no tax was levied on the "land" for that year, even if "land" be held to include such easement, which is doubtful.

2. A notice of the location of the water-right, made by the mill-owner's grantor 15 years before the commencement of the action, was admissible as evidence of an adverse claim, though the location was not made in accordance with the provisions of the Code.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge.

Action for an injunction by A. Frederick and another against one Dickey. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Waters & Gird, for appellant. Goodcell & Leonard and Ezra Crossman, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought to enjoin defendant from destroying or interfering with a certain water-ditch, a portion of which runs through defendant's land. Judgment went for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

The court found that plaintiffs and their grantors, for 10 years next before the commencement of the action, were the owners of a certain mill; that said water-ditch and right of way for the same were appurtenant to said mill, and used solely for the purpose of operating the same; and that plaintiffs and their grantors for 10 years had been in the open and adverse possession of said ditch and right of way, except that such use and possession of the same where it crosses defendant's land was adverse only after October 19, 1881, which was about seven years before the commencement of the action.

We see nothing in the objections to the introduction of the deeds marked Exhibits "A" and "B." Neither was the objection to the introduction of a notice of location of the water-right made by plaintiffs' grantor, Matthews, made in 1873, a good one. Whether or not the location was made in accordance with the provisions of the Code, it was admissible as evidence tending to show an adverse claim, for which purpose alone it was offered. See Coonrad v. Hill, 79 Cal. 593, 21 Pac. Rep. 1099.

The real question in the case is whether or not plaintiffs and their grantors held the ditch, water-right, and right of way over defendant's land adversely to defendant and his grantors; and a discussion of this question here would simply be a review of the evidence. The evidence clearly shows that plaintiffs and their grantors were in the possession and use of the ditch for a much longer period than the one found by the court, some of the witnesses putting it at 16 years. Appellant contends that during this long period it was held and used merely under a parol license, revocable at any time by appellant or his grantors; while respondents contend that it was held under a grant, which, although at first invalid, because not in writing, ripened into title by adverse user, having always been held under claim of title. And while on this issue the evidence was, no doubt, somewhat conflicting, it was amply sufficient to justify the finding of the court.

Upon the question of adverse possession appellant invokes section 325, Code Civil Proc., which provides that one claiming adverse possession of land must show that he has paid all taxes assessed upon said land. It is doubtful if the word "land," as used in that section, was intended to have any other than its common meaning. In some legal connections it is, no doubt, used as co-extensive with "real property," but primarily it means "the soil or a portion of the earth's crust." The sections of the Code upon the subject of adverse possession which precede section 325—except sections 324 and 327, which are immediately connected with it—all use the more general words, "real property," "real estate," or "property;" but section 325 and the two preceding sections use the word "land," and speak of methods of adverse holding which apply only to land in its common meaning, as "cultivated," and "protected by a substantial inclosure," and used "for purposes of husbandry, or for pasturage." In the very section 325 it is first provided that, in order to constitute adverse possession, land is deemed to have been possessed—"First, when it has been protected by a substantial inclosure; second, when it has been usually cultivated or improved;" and then it provides that the possession shall not be considered adverse unless "the land" has been occupied," etc., "and the claimant shall have paid the taxes levied upon such land." It is, therefore, not at all clear that the section was intended to apply to mere easements or appurtenant rights. But, waiving that question, the water ditch and right here involved were appurtenant to the mill property, and, in our opinion, as intimated in Coonrad v. Hill, supra, should be considered as included in the assessment of the latter. It was, however, during some years assessed separately; but, whether assessed separately or not, all the taxes assessed were paid by plaintiffs and their grantors each year from 1878 to 1888. (when this action was commenced,) inclusive, unless the year 1884 is to be deemed an exception. The facts as to 1884 are that in that year the property was mortgaged to an amount exceeding its value, and there was no tax to be paid by the owner. We do not think, as contended by appellant, that respondent has lost his right as an adverse claimant because he does not show affirmatively that the mortgagee had paid the tax that year on the mortgage. Strictly speaking, there was no tax levied on "the land" within the letter of said section 325, (whatever meaning we attach to "land" as there used;) and, if that section be broadly construed as requiring the payment of taxes by an asserted adverse claimant as evidence of the bona fides of his claim, then certainly respondent and his grantors were within the spirit and intent of the provision. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SCHALLERT-GANAHL LUMBER CO. et al. v. NEAL et al. (No. 13,999.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—FORFEITURE OF LIEN.

1. In an action to enforce a lien for materials furnished to a contractor who was building a house for defendants, the court found that the contractor delivered a check to plaintiffs' agent, taking a receipt therefor, and requested the agent to apply the proceeds to materials furnished by plaintiffs on a building then being erected for a third person; that the agent refused to so apply the proceeds of the check, but stated that part would be so applied, and that the residue would be applied to certain other contracts, not including that with defendants; that afterwards the contractor went to plaintiffs' office, showed plaintiffs' book-keeper the receipt for the check given by the agent, and the book-keeper, in ignorance of the facts, and relying on the contractor's statements, gave him a receipt for the amount of the check on the materials furnished for defendants' house; that plaintiffs, on discovery of the facts, promptly repudiated the application of the check so made by the contractor, and the contractor afterwards approved plaintiffs' bill for the whole amount of materials furnished on defendants' house, without claiming any credit on account of the check; that the contractor, by producing the receipt, afterwards induced defendants to advance "further money" on his contract; and that plaintiffs did not know of the use to which the contractor put the receipt. Held, that such findings did not support a conclusion of law that defendants were entitled to have the amount of the check deducted from plaintiffs' claim for materials furnished.

2. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1202, provides that "any person who shall willfully give a false notice of his claim to the owner, under the provision of section 1184," or "shall willfully include in his claim, filed under section 1187, work or materials not performed upon or furnished for the property described in the claim, shall forfeit his lien." Held, that a lien for materials furnished to a contractor is not subject to forfeiture on the ground that the claimant "knowingly and willfully filed a notice of lien for more than he was entitled to, and sought in the action to recover an amount in excess of the amount actually due;" the notice to the owner, referred to in section 1202, not being the notice of lien required to be filed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by the Schallert-Ganahl Lumber Company and the Los Angeles Planing-Mill Company against Juana A. Neal and others to foreclose mechanics' liens. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter, for appellants. J. W. Mitchell & Graff and Gibbon & Creighton, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to enforce two certain mechanics' liens; the Schallert-Ganahl Lumber Company claiming $672.21 for materials furnished the contractor, defendant Goetzman, the building being owned by the defendant Neal. The said plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant Neal for the amount claimed, less $525, and also recovered a judgment for an attorney's fee of $50. The plaintiff the Los Angeles Planing-Mill Company brought its action for $982, and at the trial, upon the conclusion of its evidence, defendants moved for judgment of nonsuit against it upon the ground that it appeared from the evidence that it had willfully and knowingly filed a notice of lien for more than it was entitled to, and sought in this action to recover, by foreclosure proceedings against said defendants, an amount in excess of the amount actually due. The motion was granted, and both plaintiffs appeal from the respective judgments and order denying them a new trial. The ninth finding of the court is "that on or about the 30th day of November, 1887, the said H. J. Goetzman delivered to John L. Hickman a check drawn by R. T. Royal in favor of H. J. Goetzman, who was then constructing a house for said Royal, and received from said Hickman a receipt for said check; that, at the time of receiving said check, said Goetzman requested from said Hickman, as the agent of plaintiff, that the same be applied on the Royal contract; that said Hickman at said time declined to apply the same to the Royal contract, except for the sum of $385 and some odd cents, the amount then due plaintiff for the materials furnished on said Royal contract, and stated to said Goetzman that the balance would be applied to the account of plaintiff with said Goetzman on other accounts then due, not including the Neal contract; that afterwards, on the same day, and before said Hickman had returned to plaintiff's office, said Goetzman went to the book-keeper of plaintiff, and stated to him that he paid said Hickman $525, and requested a receipt therefor, on account of the Neal job, at the same time producing the receipt given by Hickman for said check; that said book-keeper, in ignorance of the facts, and relying upon the statements of said Goetzman, gave said Goetzman a receipt for $525 on the Neal job; that upon discovery of the facts plaintiff promptly repudiated said application by Goetzman, and said Goetzman thereafter approved said bill for the amount then due, to-wit, $627.51, without claiming a credit of said $525 thereon. Said sum of $525 was applied by plaintiff as follows, to-wit, $385 on the Royal account, being the amounts then due, and the balance to the other accounts of plaintiff against Goetzman, not including the Neal job. That said Goetzman thereafter produced said receipt to Telfair Creighton, the agent of said defendant Juana A. Neal, representing to him that he had paid that amount on the Neal contract for the purpose of inducing said Creighton, as the agent of said Neal, to advance further money on said Neal contract; that plaintiff had no knowledge of the use to which Goetzman had applied said receipt." A portion of the tenth finding reads: "That, by reason of the production by said Goetzman of said receipt for five hundred and twenty-five ($525) dollars, said Creighton, as the agent of Juana A. Neal, advanced further money to said Goetzman." As a conclusion of law the court found: "That the defendant Juana A. Neal is entitled to have the sum of $525, being the amount of the receipt aforesaid, deducted from plaintiff's said claim of $672.51." This conclusion of law is clearly erroneous. How the defendant can be entitled to a credit of $525 upon this demand by reason of the facts found we entirely fail to comprehend, and respondents' counsel have given us no additional light upon this legal proposition in their printed argument. If, by reason of the presentation of this unauthorized and repudiated receipt to defendant, she had been misled, and thereby paid the contractor, or other creditors, more money than the amount of her indebtedness to the contractor, such fact might create a sufficient prop to support an argument favorable to her claims in this action; but the court found that, by reason of the production of said receipt by Goetzman, said defendant advanced "further money" to said Goetzman. The words "further money," as to amount, are vague and indefinite; non constat but she still had large amounts in her hands, applicable to the payment of plaintiff's claim, when this action was commenced.

This section of the Code of Civil Procedure under which the plaintiff the Los Angeles Plaving-Mill Company, was nonsuited, provides: "Sec. 1202. Any person who shall willfully give a false notice of his claim to the owner under the provisions of section 1184 shall forfeit his lien;" and again: "Any person who shall willfully include in his claim, filed under section 1187, work or materials not performed upon or furnished for the property described in the claim, shall forfeit his lien." The foregoing section contains other matters not involved in this question. This section of the statute provides that the claimant shall forfeit his lien in toto for a violation of its provisions; it is penal in its character, and not only must be strictly construed, but the evidence under which it is invoked should be clear and convincing that the violation was willful and intentional. Upon a comparison of the provisions quoted above with the grounds upon which the motion for a nonsuit was made, we find no similarity. The grounds upon which the motion was made for a nonsuit, which was practically to ask that the lien be declared forfeited, are not grounds specified in section 1202 of the Code, and we have been referred to no provision authorizing the forfeiture of a claimant's lien upon the grounds relied upon, to-wit, that "he knowingly and willfully filed a notice of lien for more than he was entitled to, and sought in the action to recover an amount in excess of the amount actually due." The notice referred to in this section is not the notice of lien required to be filed, and the allegation and proof that the plaintiff is seeking in this action to recover an amount in excess of the amount actually due is not satisfied by the provision of the Code "that any person who shall willfully include in his claim materials not furnished for the property described in the claim shall forfeit his lien." For the foregoing reasons we find it unnecessary to enter into an examination of the evidence as to the good or bad faith of the plaintiff in making these charges upon which a lien is sought. The judgment and order denying a new trial as to both plaintiffs is reversed, and as to the plaintiff the Schallert-Ganahl Lumber Company it is ordered that the trial court enter judgment for the amount prayed for in its complaint, an attorney's fee of $50 as heretofore allowed, and costs of suit; as to the plaintiff the Los Angeles Plaving-Mill Company the cause is remanded for a new trial.

MEUX v. HOGUE. (No. 14,383.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1891.)

SALE OF REAL ESTATE—SUFFICIENCY OF CONTRACT —SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 1741, providing that no agreement for the sale of real estate is valid "unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged, or his agent, thereunto authorized in writing," a contract signed by an agent, who had only verbal authority to sell, reciting that the sale was "subject to the approval of the owner," and giving the terms as $3,925, of which $1,585 should be cash, is invalid, and cannot be enforced by the owner of the land, the only ratification on his part being an approval of the terms of the sale as set out in a letter from the agent to him, stating that the sale was for $4,000, of which $1,600 was to be cash.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by J. P. Meux against S. L. Hogue for specific performance of a sale of real estate. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Meux & Edwards and Thompson & King, for appellant. Edward Lynch, for respondent.

In bank. BEATTY, C. J. Justice GAROUTTE is, for the purpose of a decision herein, assigned to department 2.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff brought this action to enforce the specific performance of a contract to purchase from him certain lots of land in the city of Fresno. The court below gave judgment for the defendant, from which the plaintiff has appealed, and has brought the case here on a bill of exceptions. The principal question in the case is whether an enforceable contract was made between the parties for the sale and purchase of the lots. The material facts of the case, as shown by the record, are as follows: The plaintiff was residing in San Francisco, and was the owner of the lots; and prior to April 10, 1888, he had verbally authorized Rader & Bear, who were real-estate agents at Fresno, to sell them. On the day of its date the defendant executed and delivered to Rader & Bear a paper, reading as follows:

"Fresno, Cal., April 10, 1888. Received from S. L. Hogue and J. D. Power the sum of one hundred dollars in gold coin, being a deposit and part payment on account of bargain and sale made to them this day of a certain lot, tract, or parcel of land, lying and being situate in the city of Fresno, county of Fresno, state of California, and bounded and described as follows, namely, lots 13, 14, 15, and 16 in Blk. 77, said lots having been sold to them this day for the sum of three thousand and nine hundred and twenty-five dollars in gold coin, subject to the approval of the owner; the balance to be paid, fourteen hundred and twenty-five dollars on delivery of deed and abstract; one thousand dollars, six months; and sixteen hundred dollars on one year from Feby. 1, '88, at 10 per cent. interest from date, or this deposit to be forfeited without recourse; title to prove good, or no sale; and this deposit to be returned, subject to approval of owner.

"We hereby agree to buy the property above described, upon the terms and conditions hereinbefore expressed.

"J. D. POWER.

"By S. L. H.

"RADER & BEAR, Agents."

On the same day the agents wrote to plaintiff, but did not send him a copy of the contract, nor does it appear that he ever saw the contract, or a copy of it. The letter is as follows: "Fresno, Cal., April 10, 1888. J. P. Meux, Esq., 240 Montgomery St., San Francisco, Cal.—Dear Sir: We have sold lots 13 to 16, inclusive, in block 77, of Parkhurst's addition, for $4,000. Terms, sixteen hundred dollars cash, one thousand dollars in six months, and sixteen hundred dollars in one year, interest 10 per cent. This sale is made up on the terms left us by your brother, Dr. Meux. He preferred $1,600 cash. Please send deed and abstract at once, as the purchaser is ready to take up the deed at once. Yours, truly, RADER & BEAR." To this letter plaintiff replied, but the reply was not produced and put in evidence. Rader could only testify, as to its contents, that it "amounted to just a confirmation of the sale as it was made on the terms," etc. And the plaintiff only said: "I wrote to Mr. Rader that I confirmed the sale that had been made; that I was satisfied with the sale of the property, and would give a deed to the parties." Several other letters in reference to the matter subsequently passed between the plaintiff and his agents, but none of them were produced, nor were their contents shown. Shortly after the receipt of the letter above set out, plaintiff sent to the agents a deed of the property. When this deed was shown to Hogue he requested that it be sent back to plaintiff, and that he should make another deed to one Murray. The deed was sent back and plaintiff made and forwarded another deed, in which Murray was named as grantee. This second deed, Rader testified, was tendered to Mr. Hogue, and he also said: "I don't know what has become of that deed. I don't think Mr. Hogue ever took the deed up. I suppose it afterwards fell back into the hands of Mr. Meux." Neither of the deeds above mentioned was produced or offered in evidence. Subsequently a third deed was made, and on this the plaintiff testified: "I executed another deed, and again tendered him (Hogue) a deed. That was on the 9th of February, 1889. He declined to receive it, and he said that he would not take the property, and I waited some little while, and filed this complaint against him." The deed was produced, and in it S. L. Hogue and J. D. Power were named as grantees, and the consideration expressed was $4,000. When the first deed was offered to Hogue the agent stated that they would deliver it upon the payment of a certain amount of money, and the execution of notes and a mortgage for the balance. The action was commenced against Hogue and Power; but upon Hogue's statements that he signed Power's name to the contract without any authority, the action was dismissed as to the latter. The Civil Code (section 1741) provides: "No agreement for the sale of real property, or of an interest therein, is valid, unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged, or his agent, thereunto authorized, in writing." The agreement produced here was not subscribed by the seller, or by any agent authorized in writing to subscribe it, nor can it be ascertained therefrom who the seller was. It was probably not necessary that the seller sign the paper, (Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 459; Pom. Spec. Perf. § 75;) but it was made "subject to the approval of the owner," and it was necessary that he should know its contents, and approve and ratify it, before it could become binding upon either party. It is claimed for appellant that he fully approved and ratified the sale, upon the terms named in the paper, by his letters to his agents and by the deeds which he executed and offered to the purchaser. But, as before stated, it is not shown by the record that he ever saw the written agreement, or ever learned its terms, except from the letter above quoted. Now, what were the terms of sale which the appellant approved and ratified? The agreement states that the property was sold for $3,925, and that the balance to be paid was $1,425 on delivery of deed, $1,000 in six months, and $1,600 on February 1, 1889, thus making the deferred payments aggregate $4,025. The letter states that the property was sold for $4,000, to be paid as follows: $1,600 cash, $1,000 in six months, and $1,600 in one year, thus making the payments aggregate $4,200; and the complaint states that the property was sold for $4,000, payable $1,600 cash, $1,000 in six months, and $1,400 on the 1st day of February, 1889. (At the conclusion of the trial, by consent of the counsel, and by leave of the court, the complaint was "considered amended on its face so as to conform to the contract of purchase and to the evidence.") These terms are not the same, but materially different, and the ratification, if any, must have been of the terms stated in the letter, and not of those stated in the contract. But, in order to constitute a valid contract, the minds of the contracting parties must meet and agree to the same thing. "A court of equity will not specifically enforce any contract, unless it be complete and certain. This rule applies as well to parties as to price, subject-matter," etc. "It is essential to the validity of a contract that the parties should have consented to the same subject-matter in the same sense. They must have contracted ad idem." "Where there is a misunderstanding as to the terms of a contract, neither party is liable in law or equity. Where a contract is a unit, and left uncertain in one particular, the whole will be regarded as only inchoate, because the parties have not been ad idem, and therefore neither is bound. A proposal to accept, or acceptance, upon terms varying from those offered, is a rejection of the offer." See Breckinridge v. Crocker, 78 Cal. 529, 21 Pac. Rep. 179, and cases cited. We see nothing in the evidence to take the case out of the rule above stated, and we conclude, therefore, that the court below properly found that the plaintiff never authorized or ratified the contract of sale on which he relies. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

McGOVERN et ux. v. MOWRY. (No. 13,112.) (Supreme Court of California. Sept. 26, 1891.)

QUIETING TITLE—POSSESSION.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 1006, providing that "occupancy for any period confers a title sufficient against all except the state and those who have title by prescription, accession, transfer, will, or succession," evidence that plaintiff was in the actual possession and occupation of premises, at and for a long time before the commencement of an action to quiet title, is sufficient to enable him to maintain it as against one who claimed, but never had, title.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action to quiet title. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. Percy Wright, for appellant. Page & Eells, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. Justice HARRISON is, for the purpose of a decision herein, assigned to department 2.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This is an action to quiet title to certain lands in the Laguna survey, in San Francisco. Several defendants were sued, but only one defendant, George B. Mowry, appears. His answer denied the plaintiffs' title, and set up title in himself. The findings of the court are in favor of plaintiffs on all the issues, and the appellant attacks them upon two very material grounds: First, that there was no evidence that plaintiffs were the owners of the land; and, second, that the evidence established the defendant Mowry to be the owner. The evidence for plaintiffs establishes that they are husband and wife; that they inclosed the land in question with a substantial fence about March 1, 1882, and used it as a pasture until 1886, when they built a dwelling-house upon it, and have ever since resided there; that they filed a declaration of homestead upon the property in 1886; that a deed from the city under the Van Ness ordinance was made to them in 1883, and that their possession has been exclusive and undisturbed under claim of title since March, 1882. The suit at bar was begun on August 17, 1887. The Alcalde grant covering the lot in question was executed on September 25, 1848, to one Stephen A. Harris, and no deraignment of title from Harris was shown by either party, except so far as it is to be presumed from plaintiffs' occupation of the land. Counsel for appellant claims that the proof of plaintiffs' title is insufficient, because the Van Ness ordinance deed is inoperative, owing to the previous Alcalde grant, and because plaintiffs have not established a title by prescription, owing to the fact that they had not paid taxes upon the property for the full term of five years before the commencement of the action. His contention is that it is incumbent upon the plaintiff, in a suit of this character, to establish a perfect title of record, or by prescription, whether the defendant has any title or not, and that, on the failure of such proof by the plaintiff, the action should be dismissed. Counsel for respondents claim, on the contrary, that actual possession under claim of ownership is sufficient evidence of title in the plaintiff as against a trespasser, or one who establishes no title in himself. Section 1006 of the Civil Code provides that "occupancy for any period confers a title sufficient against all except the state and those who have title by prescription, accession, transfer, will, or succession." "The possession of real estate is prima facie evidence of the highest estate in the property, to-wit, a seisin in fee." Hill v. Draper, 10 Barb. 458. The plaintiff was in the actual possession and occupation of the premises at and for a long time before the commencement of this action. This was sufficient to enable him to maintain an action to quiet title against any one who, like defendant, never had any title, but who claimed to have title to the premises. Judgment and order affirmed.

HOWELL v. BUDD, Judge. (No. 14,539.)

RES JUDICATA — DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATES — DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. 1886, § 1908, which provides that, "in case of a judgment or order against a specific thing, or in respect to the probate of a will or the administration of the estate of a decedent, * * * the judgment or order is conclusive upon the title to the thing, the will, or administration," does not modify Garwood v. Garwood, 29 Cal. 514, which holds that, where the grant of administration turns on the question as to which of the parties is next of kin, the judgment is conclusive on that question in a suit between the same parties for distribution.

2. Section 170 provides that no justice or judge shall act as such in any action or proceeding "when he is related to either party by consanguinity or affinity within the third degree, computed according to law." Held, in an action by an alleged daughter of a decedent to revoke letters of administration granted to decedent's grand-nephew, that the sons of a judge, who have contracted to try the case for the nephew on condition of receiving one-fourth of the estate if they succeed, are "parties," within the spirit of the Code, and their father cannot act as judge.

3. Where the answer to a petition to enjoin the judge from trying the application to revoke the letters of administration alleges that he has no information sufficient to enable him to answer the allegation as to the agreement between his sons and the nephew of decedent, but his brief states that since the oral argument he has received information which will enable him to deny the allegation, he will be allowed time to amend his answer in that regard.

In bank. Application for writ of prohibition by Mary Eliza Johnson Howell against Joseph H. Budd, judge of the superior court of San Joaquin county. Demurrer overruled, and leave to amend granted.

Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, for petitioner. Jos. H. Budd, in pro. per.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent, who is one of the judges of the superior court of San Joaquin county, from acting as judge in the matter of the application of the petitioner herein for the revocation of letters of administration issued to one Eugene Kay upon the estate of William B. Johnson, deceased, and for her own appointment as administratrix in the place and stead of said Kay. For the relief desired, petitioner relies upon the following allegations of her petition: "(1) That the sons of the respondent (in conjunction with two other attorneys) have a contract with and from said Kay and other alleged heirs for the conveyance of one-fourth of the said estate to them, when petitioner is declared to have no title therein, and said title shall be adjudged to be vested in said heirs. (2)

That the administrator, Kay, is a grand-nephew of the deceased, and claims that as such he and the other collateral kindred are entitled to the estate. (3) That petitioner is the only child of the deceased, and as such is entitled to the whole estate, and also entitled to letters of administration (though a married woman) by virtue of an act of the legislature of 1891. (4) That, upon the hearing of petitioner's application for letters of administration, the question at issue will be whether she is the child of the deceased or not. The administrator and other alleged heirs say she is not, and, if it be decided that she is the child of the deceased, she is entitled to letters of administration, and to the whole of the estate; but if she is not such child she is entitled to nothing, and said Kay and other heirs are entitled to the estate."

As shown by the verified answer of respondent, which must be taken as true, as far as the consideration of questions of law are involved, the objection to respondent hearing the matter and the application for transfer of the cause was made as follows: "That thereafter, and on the 7th day of June, 1891, F. T. Baldwin, Esq., and E. S. Pillsbury, Esq., who had long been on terms of intimate friendship with respondent, made a friendly call on respondent, and during said call, and a conversation with respondent thereat, Mr. Pillsbury stated to respondent, in substance, that he deemed he ought to inform respondent that their client, Mrs. Howell, the petitioner herein, objected to said matter being heard before respondent as judge of the court, because of the relationship between respondent and James H. Budd and John E. Budd, two of the attorneys for Mr. Kay; and suggested that respondent request one of the judges of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco to hear and determine the matter. In reply to this, respondent stated, in substance, that his associate on the bench, Judge Smith, and respondent, would not request any other judge to hear and determine any matter which they could hear and determine, and that the rules of the court respecting the apportioning of the business of the court among the judges thereof would not be departed from to suit the wishes of any litigant, and that, the matter being in department 1 of the court, it would be heard and determined by respondent as judge; and respondent denies that said petitioner and affiant ever, in any way or manner, called the attention of this respondent to the alleged fact that said sons of affiant had a contingent interest in said estate of Wm. B. Johnson, deceased, or in the result of said litigation, or to any disqualification of this respondent from acting as judge in said matter; and he denies that she ever in any manner, other than by said statement and suggestion of Mr. Pillsbury, at said friendly call on respondent, requested respondent not to act as judge in said matter, or to call in some qualified judge to act therein; and respondent denies that she ever, in any way or manner, either directly or indirectly, requested respondent to transfer said matter to said department 2 of said court; on the contrary, he alleges that neither the petitioner, nor either or any of her attorneys, ever suggested to or requested of respondent that Judge Smith, one of the judges of said court, hear and determine said matter. Further answering, respondent admits that he refused, as above stated, said request of Mr. Pillsbury to have a judge of the superior court of San Francisco hear and determine said matter, and he admits that he stated to her attorneys, as above stated, in reply to the statement and suggestion of her attorney, Mr. Pillsbury, that, said matter being in department 1 of the court, it would be heard and determined by the respondent as judge; but he denies that he otherwise informed her or her attorneys, or either or any of them, that he intended to act or would act as judge in said matter." Under the authority of Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 402, 24 Pac. Rep. 121, the application to respondent for a transfer of the cause was clearly insufficient; yet we understand respondent, being desirous of an adjudication of the cause upon its merits, to have waived his objection to the course adopted by the petitioner in making her application for an order of transfer, and therefore we proceed to examine the cause upon the main questions involved.

It is insisted by petitioner that the respondent is disqualified from hearing her application to have the letters of administration heretofore issued to one Kay revoked, and herself appointed as administratrix in the estate of said Johnson, deceased; and this matter is to be decided in the light of subdivision 2 of the following sections of the Code of Civil Procedure: "Sec. 170. No justice or judge or justice of the peace shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding (1) to which he is a party, or in which he is interested; (2) when he is related to either party by consanguinity or affinity within the third degree, computed according to the rules of law."

At the very threshold of this examination, in order that we may intelligently consider the question as to who are parties to this proceeding in the lower court, we must ascertain what will be the force and effect of the judgment of that court denying or granting petitioner's application, as considered with reference to subsequent proceedings in the estate, and especially as considered with reference to the decree of distribution. In this estate, as alleged in the petition, the right of petitioner to administer depends solely upon the fact as to whether or not she is the child of deceased; that is the issue in the case. No exercise of discretion is allowed. The inquiry becomes a matter of legal right, and is, by the express provision of the statute, to be determined by the right of succession; and, if the determination of that issue upon this hearing is to be conclusive upon her at final distribution, then this application for letters assumes a far more serious aspect; for it practically determines, at the very inception of the probate proceedings, who is to receive the residue of the estate upon final distribution, and places the respondent in the exact position as though he were proceeding to hear the petition for distribution rather than an application for letters of administration. In section 550 of Greenleaf on Evidence, we find the following: "And if the grant of administration turned upon the question as to which of the parties were next of kin, the sentence or decree upon that question is conclusive everywhere in a suit between the same parties for distribution." In the case of Caujolle v. Ferrie, 13 Wall. 474, a case in all respects involving the principles under discussion here, the supreme court of the United States, after an exhaustive review of the English authorities upon the question, said: "It may, therefore, as the result of these authorities, be safely assumed to be the established law in England that if the sentence of an ecclesiastical court in a suit for administration turns upon the question of which of the parties is next of kin to the intestate, it is conclusive upon that question in a subsequent suit in the court of chancery between the same parties for distribution." And again: "On principle and authority, therefore, the judgment in the suit for administration in New York was pleadable in bar to this suit, and on that ground alone the bill should have been dismissed." If the judgment upon the issuance of letters of administration upon the question of heirship can be pleaded as a bar to matters arising upon petition for distribution in a court of concurrent jurisdiction, can there be a doubt as to that judgment being a complete and perfect bar in a proceeding in the very court that created such judgment?

Passing to the law of this state, we find practically this identical question carefully considered by this court in the case of Garwood v. Garwood, 29 Cal. 514, where the doctrine heretofore announced is fully approved and declared to be the law of the land. Respondent insists that the effect of the law found in Garwood v. Garwood has been nullified by the following provision of section 1908 of the Code of Civil Procedure: "In case of a judgment or order against a specific thing, or in respect to the probate of a will or the administration of the estate of a decedent, * * * the judgment or order is conclusive upon the title to the thing, the will, or administration." The fair and legitimate interpretation of this provision is that a judgment or order respecting the administration of the estate is conclusive upon the administration as to all matters directly involved in such judgment or order. There seems to be nothing in the provision detracting in any degree from the force and effect of the principles laid down in the case of Garwood v. Garwood, supra, but rather the provision seems to be in complete consonance and full accord with it. We conclude, therefore, that the judgment to be rendered by the court upon the hearing of petitioner's application for letters of administration (subject to appeal) will determine for all time and in all courts, as far as the parties to the proceeding are concerned, whether the petitioner is the child of said

Johnson, deceased, and therefore entitled to all of his estate to the exclusion of kindred of the collateral line, or whether Kay, the administrator, and other collateral kindred, are next in the direct line of succession, and entitled to the whole of the estate of said deceased.

What is the interest of the sons of respondent in this estate? The allegation of the petitioner is that "said Kay and the other said next of kin after this petitioner have made a valid agreement with James H. Budd, Esq., John E. Budd, Esq., and Messrs. Nutter and De Vries, all of whom are attorneys at law, that they shall have one-fourth of said estate in case and upon condition that the said question of the heirship of this petitioner and affiant be determined adversely to her and in favor of said Kay and said other next of kin." It seems these parties have a contract for a share of the estate, which consists of real and personal property, and which share is contingent upon the nature of the judgment to be rendered upon the hearing of the application for letters of administration; which matter respondent threatens to hear and determine, and whose threatened acts in that regard this very proceeding is inaugurated to restrain and forbid. These parties will be the owners of a perfect equitable title to one-fourth of the estate upon the happening of a condition, and that condition is dependent upon the act of respondent. To the extent of the investigation of the questions pending before us, the conditional equitable interest of the sons of respondent in this estate is clothed with all the dignity, importance, and value of a vested and absolute interest; for it is in the power of the respondent to create the condition, and thus create a perfect equitable estate. It is assumed in the argument of respondent, although not found in the petition, that the consideration for this agreement was legal services to be performed by these attorneys in futuro, and he insists that until these services are performed the sons of respondent have no interest in the estate. No principle of equity can be found to support such argument. In equity, from the time of the execution of the contract for the sale of land, the vendor as to the land becomes a trustee for the vendee, and the vendee as to the purchase money becomes a trustee for the vendor. Such contracts for most purposes are deemed executed, upon the principle that courts of equity will regard substance rather than form, and thus assist the parties by extending to the agreement the effect desired and intended. Pomeroy, in his Equity Jurisprudence, (volume 1, § 105,) speaking of such agreements, says: "The view which equity takes of the juridical relations resulting from the transaction is widely different. Applying one of its fruitful principles, that what ought to be done is regarded as done, equity says that from the contract, even while yet executory, the vendee acquires a real right, a right of property in the land, which, though lacking a legal title, and therefor equitable only, is none the less the real beneficial ownership, subject, however, to a lien of the vendor as security for the purchase price as long as that remains unpaid." This principle is fully recognized by the decisions of this court. See Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 616; Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 565; Hoffman v. Vallejo, 45 Cal. 565; Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 527, 24 Pac. Rep. 174, and 25 Pac. Rep. 64. In the case of Hoffman v. Vallejo, supra, the court said, referring to a contract similar to the one respondent alleges this to be: "The agreement of September, 1865, constituted Hoffman and the Wilsons together the equitable owners, as against the defendant, J. J. Vallejo, of the undivided half of whatever should thereafter result from the prosecution or compromise of the suit instituted against Clark."

Counsel for petitioner has argued with great learning that proceedings upon the application for letters of administration are in the nature of proceedings in rem, and therefore all persons interested are parties; but, owing to the views we entertain upon the other branch of the case, it will not be necessary to consider that question. To hold that the word "party," as used in section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is confined to parties of record by name, would be a construction so narrow as to find support neither in principle nor authority. To say that a judge would be qualified under this provision to try and determine an action in ejectment, brought by the administrator of an estate, of which the children of the judge are the heirs, or that he could render judgment in a foreclosure suit, where an administrator is defendant, and the heir is a son of the judge, would be to sacrifice substance to form, and contrary to all principles of modern legal jurisprudence. In the case of Fredericks v. Judah, 73 Cal. 608, 15 Pac. Rep. 305, the court said: "Although in that action Mrs. Judah, as executrix, was plaintiff, it was an action between the same parties, within the meaning of this provision, for the executrix represented the heirs therein." In the case of Briggs v. Briggs, 80 Cal. 255, 22 Pac. Rep. 334, it was held that a successor in interest was a "party," within the meaning of the provision that a deposition properly taken could be read in evidence in a subsequent action "between the same parties." In the case of Schultze v. McLeary, 73 Tex. 92, 11 S. W. Rep. 924, the court said that, notwithstanding that the judge was not related to the party by name, yet that "if he was but the representative of his wife, who was so related, or if he was the representative of a right claimed by himself and wife in community, or if any judgment rendered in his favor or against him would affect the right of the wife through her community rights even to the extent of costs, then the wife of Orynski, within the spirit and purpose of the constitutional provision to which we have referred, was a party to the suit, and the district judge disqualified." See Hodde v. Susan, 58 Tex. 389; Gains v. Barr, 60 Tex. 676; North Bloomfield, etc., Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 322. In Stockwell v. Township Board, etc., 22 Mich. 350, Justice GRAVES said: "The court might not be astute to discover refined and subtle distinctions to save a case from the operation of the maxim, when the principle it embodies bespeaks the propriety of its application." The Code provides that its provisions "are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." Section 4, Code Civil Proc. And again: "When a statute or instrument is equally susceptible of two interpretations, one in favor of natural right and the other against it, the former is to be adopted." Section 1866, Code Civil Proc. These provisions of the Code, taken in connection with the authorities cited, indicate that section 170 is to have no technical or narrow construction, but is to be broadly applied to all litigation, where a judge is called upon to adjudicate property rights. We conclude, therefore, that the word "party," as used in section 170, is not confined to the parties to the record by name, but includes all persons represented by parties to the record. Are the sons of the respondent represented by a party to the record? It seems unnecessary to examine into the question as to the relations existing between the administrator and the heirs, for the administrator himself is one of the heirs, and is a grantor under the agreement to convey to the sons of respondent. While he is not the sole grantor, that fact is immaterial, for the disqualification results from the kind of interest held by the sons, and not from the amount of interest. Their ownership of a portion of the estate is as disqualifying as if they owned it in entirety. As petitioner's right to the estate will be conclusively determined upon the hearing of her application for letters, as far as the parties to that proceeding are concerned, and as Kay, the administrator, is a party to that proceeding, and has contracted to convey to the sons of respondent an interest in the estate, and as therefore he is the trustee of said sons for such interest, and as they are the equitable owners thereof, they are as fully and completely represented by the administrator, Kay, in that proceeding, as any beneficiary can be represented by his trustee.

Respondent alleges in his answer that he has no information or belief upon the subject sufficient to enable him to answer the allegation in said petition and affidavit "that said Kay and the other of said next of kin after this petitioner and affiant have made a valid agreement with Jas. H. Budd, Esq., and John E. Budd, Esq., and Messrs. Nutter and De Vries, that they shall have one-fourth of said estate, in case and upon condition," etc., "and therefore he denies said allegation." Petitioner objects to the sufficiency of the foregoing denial to create an issue, but inasmuch as respondent in his brief sets out that since the oral argument he has received information that will enable him to make a specific denial of the allegation, and asks to amend his answer in that regard, which application we are disposed to grant, it becomes unnecessary to pass upon the merits of petitioner's contention in this respect. The demurrer to the petition will be overruled, and the respondent will be allowed five days after service of a copy of the order thereof to file an amended answer in accordance with his request.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1891.)

SALE OF LAND—REMOVAL OF BUILDINGS—IN-JUNCTION.

Plaintiff sold certain land, receiving $9,000 of the purchase price, and placing his vendee in possession, but retaining the legal title as security for the fulfillment of the contract of purchase. The vendee, without any agreement with plaintiff relative thereto, constructed houses on the land, and then sold them to defendant to be removed. Held, that, in the absence of any showing on plaintiff's part that security would be impaired by such removal, it would not be enjoined.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action to enjoin the removal of certain houses. Injunction denied, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Walters & Gird, for appellant. Harris & Gregg, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. In March, 1887, the plaintiff entered into an agreement in writing with one Clubine, for the sale and conveyance to him of two blocks of land in Ontario, in this state, receiving from him the sum of $9,000 on account of the purchase price of the property, and placed his vendee in possession of the land. Clubine subdivided the land into lots suitable for residence and business purposes, and employed the defendant Newman to construct certain dwelling-houses upon the land, and to furnish the materials therefor, for the sum of $4,100, payable in weekly installments as the work progressed. Shortly after Newman began the construction of the houses, Clubine, failing to make such payments, agreed with him that the houses should belong to said Newman until paid for, and thereupon Newman proceeded with his work, and finished the houses, having received from Clubine only the sum of $725 upon account thereof. Prior to the commencement of this action, Newman sold the houses to the defendants Waddingham and Gargan, and they very soon thereafter commenced to remove them from the land, and had partly completed such removal when the plaintiff commenced this action. The houses were built on redwood mud-sills of two-inch by six-inch timber, resting upon the soil, and the soil was not disturbed in building or removing the houses. The plaintiff brought this action for the purpose of perpetually restraining the defendants from removing the houses from the land, and also to recover from them the sum of $3,000 damages alleged to have been done to his property by the attempted removal. At the commencement of the action a restraining order was issued by the court, and upon the trial of the cause the court rendered judgment in favor of the defendants, and dissolved the restraining order. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed upon the judgment roll alone.

Although the principal ground urged by the appellant for the reversal of the judgment is that upon the construction of the houses they became fixtures attached to the land, and that by their removal the defendants were committing waste, we think that the respective rights of the parties are to be determined upon principles other than those applicable to the subjects of waste and fixtures. The court below did not find that the buildings in question were fixtures, and, in the absence of a finding by it upon that subject, we cannot say upon the facts that were found that they did become fixtures. Whether, in any case, buildings that are placed upon land become fixtures, is a question of fact to be determined upon the evidence of that particular case. The mere erection of a building upon land does not necessarily make it a fixture, (Pennybecker v. McDougal, 48 Cal. 160;) and in order to determine whether it be a fixture depends upon various circumstances and relations connected with its being placed upon the land, (Lavenson v. Soap Co., 80 Cal. 250, 22 Pac. Rep. 184.) The rules applicable to fixtures have been created by a series of judicial decisions, and these decisions are not always capable of being reconciled. The attempt in the Civil Code to give a definition of a "fixture" only in part removes the difficulty. Section 660 declares that "a thing is deemed to be affixed to land when it is * * * permanently resting upon it, as in the case of buildings;" but it still requires evidence to determine what is "permanently resting" upon the land. The finding in the present case that "said houses were built on redwood mud-sills of two-inch by six-inch timber, said mud-sills resting upon the soil," and that "the soil was not disturbed in building or removing said houses," is consistent with a determination of the court below that the buildings in question were not fixtures, and, for the purpose of upholding its decision, it may be assumed that such determination was made by it. But, without determining whether or not the buildings were fixtures, we are of the opinion that upon other principles applicable to the case the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief sought by him.

The plaintiff has invoked the aid of a court of equity to protect him against threatened injury, and, in order that he may have such protection, it is incumbent upon him to show that he has rights which need and can receive it, and also that the acts charged upon the defendants are an invasion of such rights, and demand such assistance. In his complaint he alleged that he was the owner of certain land upon which certain buildings exist, and that the defendants had committed certain acts of trespass upon the same, causing a damage thereto of $3,000. Upon the trial the court, instead of finding that he was the "owner" of the land upon which the alleged trespass was committed, found that he had made a contract of sale thereof with the grantor of the defendants, and placed his vendee in possession of the land, and that the buildings had been thereafter placed upon the land at the instance of the vendee, and were being removed under authority derived from him. Upon the execution of this contract of sale, the vendee of the plaintiff became vested with the equitable title to said land, and the plaintiff retained in himself the legal title as a security for the performance of the contract by the vendee. By placing his vendee in possession of the land, he thereby conferred upon him the right to its use and enjoyment, so long as he should continue to comply with the obligations of his contract. It may be conceded that, if the buildings had been upon the land at the date of the purchase, and had formed a part of the subject-matter of the sale, the plaintiff might have had the right to have them remain upon the land as a part of his security until the whole purchase price was paid. In this case, however, the buildings formed no part of the consideration for the purchase of the land, nor were they placed upon the land in pursuance of any terms of the contract of sale. The fact that the plaintiff was under no obligation to give to his vendee possession before a conveyance of the land is immaterial. He did give him possession, and, while such possession did not authorize the vendee to do any act which would diminish the value of the property of which he had received the possession, he had the right under his equitable ownership to any use and enjoyment thereof consistent with such obligation. For such use and enjoyment he could not be chargeable with waste. After the execution of a contract of sale the relation of the vendor and vendee to the land is likened to that of mortgagor and mortgagee. The vendor retains the legal title as security for the performance by the vendee of the contract on his part, and by placing the vendee in possession of the land gives to him the right to use and enjoy it as his own, so long as he does not impair its condition, or diminish its value as it existed when received by him. So long as the vendee complies with the terms of his contract, he is entitled to retain possession of the land, (Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 607;) and the vendor can at no time enforce payment of more than the agreed price therefor, however much the land may have appreciated in value, or been improved by the vendee. The fact that the vendor holds the legal title as security for such payment does not give him any greater rights than he would possess if he had conveyed the land and taken back a mortgage for the unpaid portion of the purchase money, or than are held in land by a mortgagee, who takes for his security a conveyance absolute in form, instead of a formal mortgage. It is a well-recognized principle in equity that a mortgagee cannot maintain an action to restrain waste without showing that thereby his security will be impaired, (Robinson v. Russell, 24 Cal. 467; Buckout v. Swift, 27 Cal. 433. See, also, Perrine v. Marsden, 34 Cal. 14;) and, by parity of reasoning, the vendor who holds the legal title as security for the fulfillment of the contract of purchase by the vendee in possession should show that he will sustain some injury before he can maintain an action like the present. So long as the sufficiency of the security is unimpaired, he has no right to disturb the vendee in any use or enjoyment which he may make of the land. Such use and enjoyment by the vendee is a use of his own property, and unless he thereby impairs the security, or diminishes the estate which he received from the vendor, or the value of the land as he received it, he should not be restrained. In view of these principles, the plaintiff has failed to show any right to the equitable interposition of the court, and the action of the court in dismissing his complaint was correct. It is not alleged in his complaint, nor is it found by the court, that the vendee has in any respect failed to comply with the terms of his contract, or that he is unwilling or unable to do so. The record does not disclose the terms of the contract of sale,—either the amount of the purchase price remaining unpaid, or the time when it will become payable. Nor is it alleged or found that the land is less valuable than it was at the date of the contract of sale, or how great is the obligation for which the plaintiff holds it as security. In the absence of any allegation or finding to the contrary, it must be assumed that the land is fully as valuable as at the date of the contract, and that the vendee is not only able to comply with his obligations, but that he will fully and promptly meet them as they mature. Inasmuch, then, as the plaintiff has received $9,000 towards the payment of the purchase price of the land, he does not show any impairment of his security or injury to himself by the fact that the defendants are threatening to remove from the land buildings placed thereon by themselves, and which are shown to be of the value of only $4,100. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

THOMPSON v. LAUGHLIN. (No. 13,972.)

JUDGMENT—EQUITABLE RELIEF—INJUNCTION.

1. A court of equity will enjoin the enforcement of the alternative part of a judgment for the return of property or its value where the property was voluntarily returned before the judgment was rendered.

2. After judgment, and within the time allowed by law to move for a new trial, the attorney for defendant agreed with plaintiff to satisfy the judgment on payment of a certain sum of money. Plaintiff, relying on this agreement, did not move for a new trial, and tendered the amount agreed on to defendant's attorney, who, after the time to move for a new trial had expired, refused to accept it, and to satisfy the judgment. Held, that the enforcement of the judgment would be enjoined.

3. Injunction will lie to restrain the enforcement of a judgment already satisfied.

SHARPSTEIN, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

A suit in equity by Thompson against Laughlin to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dooner & Burdett, for appellant. Wells, Guthrie & Lee, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. On November 8, 1889, in the superior court of Los Angeles county, the defendant herein obtained a judgment against the plaintiff in this action for the recovery of the possession of a certain lot of lumber, or, in case a delivery thereof could not be had, then for its value, found to be $1,000; and also for $250 damages, and costs of the action. This action is brought to enjoin the enforcement of said judgment for damages, and also the alternative part for the value of the lumber. The court below rendered judgment enjoining the defendant from collecting the said sum of $1,000, and requiring him to satisfy the judgment to that extent. The defendant appeals.

The court below found, and, indeed, the fact is not denied in the answer, that during the pendency of the action brought by the defendant against the plaintiff, but after issue joined therein, the plaintiff returned to the defendant all of the lumber sued for. It also appears that during the trial, which resulted in the judgment referred to, the plaintiff herein offered to show this fact, but the court held the evidence inadmissible under the pleadings. The findings further show that, after the rendition of said judgment, and within the time allowed by law to move for a new trial, the attorney for the defendant in that action agreed with the plaintiff's attorney therein that upon payment of $150 and costs the said judgment should be satisfied; and that, relying upon this agreement, the plaintiff herein did not move for a new trial; and that, after the time to move for a new trial had elapsed, the attorney for the defendant refused to accept the said sum agreed upon, and to satisfy said judgment. Upon the facts above stated there can be no doubt that it would be an act of gross injustice upon the part of appellant to enforce the collection of the alternative judgment for $1,000; and there can be as little doubt that it is within the power of a court of equity to prevent it. As already stated, the court below finds, and the defendant does not deny, that before the rendition of the judgment the plaintiff had in fact returned to him the lumber sued for, and that he has used and sold the same. This being so, the judgment, in so far as it awarded to the defendant here the right to recover said lumber, or its value if no delivery could be had, has already been satisfied. That judgment, in the form in which it was entered, was in accordance with former decisions of this court. Berson v. Numan, 63 Cal. 550; Arzaga v. Villalba, 85 Cal. 195, 24 Pac. Rep. 656; Brichman v. Ross, 67 Cal. 606, 8 Pac. Rep. 316. But, although the judgment was in that form, it did not entitle appellant to both property and value. It affirmed his right to the possession of the property, and was in legal effect an adjudication that the plaintiff here wrongfully detained it from him at the date of the commencement of that action, and that since then he had acquired no right to retain its possession from the appellant. In Arzaga v. Villalba, supra, this court said: "But the judgment must always be in the alternative. Even when the possession not only can be, but has been, delivered, (under provisional process,) the judgment must nevertheless be for the recovery of the property, or its value in a specified sum in case possession cannot be had. Berson v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 552; Briehman v. Ross, 67 Cal. 306, 8 Pac. Rep. 316. And it by no means follows that the plaintiff is to have both the property and its value. So far as this part of the judgment is concerned, it is for one thing or the other, not both; and, if possession has already been delivered to the plaintiff, the court would not allow him to proceed with his execution for that part of the judgment." It makes no difference in the application of this rule that in the former action between plaintiff and defendant the property sued for was voluntarily delivered to the defendant here, and not under provisional process in that action. The only effect of this difference in the way the lumber was returned is in the nature of the evidence by which the fact is shown to the court. But the fact, when once made to appear, has the same force in both cases. All that the defendant was entitled to by his judgment was either the property or the value, and not both; and, having the lumber in his possession, equity, treating that as done which ought according to justice to be done, will consider that the defendant received the same in satisfaction of his judgment, and will enjoin its further execution.

2. But, on the other hand, if it should be assumed that the judgment has the effect claimed for it by appellant, and that the previous return of the lumber does not operate as a satisfaction of any part of it, then, upon the facts alleged, the plaintiff here was entitled to the injunction obtained, on account of the agreement of appellant's attorney to accept $150, and cause the judgment to be satisfied. The court finds that this agreement was made, and that in consequence the plaintiff neglected to move for a new trial of the action, and that appellant's attorney repudiated the agreement after the time to move for a new trial had expired. It must be presumed that by reason of this conduct of appellant's attorney the plaintiff was deprived of the substantial right to have the judgment set aside, and a new trial of the action; for it cannot be supposed that this motion would have been denied if the granting thereof was necessary in order to work that justice which is sought in this action. It may be true that this agreement was not put in such form that it could be enforced, and that the attorney had no authority as such to release the judgment for the sum agreed upon. But this is not an action to enforce the agreement, but it is to prevent the appellant from retaining the benefit of an unfair advantage, obtained by the representations and assurances of his attorney, and which would be an act of fraud upon the part of the appellant to retain, with knowledge of the facts, "Fraudulent conduct and deceitful representations upon the part of plaintiff in an action at law, by means of which defendant, having a meritorious defense, is prevented from interposing it, afford frequent ground for application for the aid of an injunction to restrain the enforcement of judgments thus fraudulently obtained." High, Inj. § 199. And the same rule must necessarily obtain where, by reason of such conduct of his adversary, a party has lost the right to move for a new trial. "It is also to be noticed, in connection with the jurisdiction of equity in restraint of judgments upon the ground of fraud, that the cases in which the relief is granted are not limited to those where the fraudulent representations are those of plaintiff in person, but that the fraudulent conduct of plaintiff's attorney in the case may afford sufficient ground for enjoining a judgment which is obtained by means of such fraud. * * * So, where defendant in the judgment shows a good equitable defense thereto, which he was prevented from making by relying upon the representations of the solicitors for plaintiff in the action, proceedings under the judgment may properly be enjoined." High, Inj. § 202. For cases illustrative of this rule, see Holland v. Trotter, 22 Grat. 136; Kent v. Richards, 3 Md. Ch. 392. And we do not think that in failing to move for a new trial, under the circumstances here disclosed, plaintiff was guilty of such negligence as to deprive him of the right to appeal to a court of equity to restrain the defendant from reaping the full fruits of the broken agreement of his attorney, and to permit which would be a fraud on plaintiff, and a reproach to the law and to the courts administering it. Upon both of the grounds here discussed the judgment appealed from is right.

3. The remedy by injunction was proper, in this case, even conceding that the court in which the judgment was rendered might have the power to grant the same relief upon motion to stay the execution. Crawford v. Thurmond, 3 Leigh, 85. Besides, the defendant waived any objection to the remedy by answering without first moving to dismiss the action on the ground that plaintiff should have proceeded by motion. Wood v. Currey, 49 Cal. 359. Judgment affirmed.

WE CONCUR: BEATTY, C. J.; MCFARLAND, J.; PATERSON, J.; HARRISON, J.

GAROUTTE, J. I concur in Justice DE HAVEN's opinion upon the first ground discussed. The judgment in Laughlin v. Thompson was a valid, binding judgment, but in all respects save as to costs is fully satisfied, for the property has been returned to Laughlin. Why should he object because Thompson returned him the property sooner than was required? If Thompson had retained the property and returned it after judgment, that would have strictly comported with the requirements of the judgment. Is he to suffer a grievous wrong because he was too alert in giving Laughlin his rights? If Laughlin vi et armis had taken the property from Thompson, and thus have prevented Thompson from returning it, could it be pretended that he would be entitled to execution to recover its value? The law contemplates the recovery of the property or its value; never both property and value. The execution should be quashed on motion. It should be restrained because it would be unconscionable to satisfy it by sale of Thompson's property. I think an attorney unprofessional that would attempt to enforce it.

SHARPSTEIN, J. I dissent. This appeal is by the defendant from a judgment that he be perpetually enjoined from levying any execution or other process upon any of the property of the plaintiff for the collection of $1,000, the value of lumber for which he, defendant, obtained judgment in the superior court of Los Angeles county in the suit therein, wherein defendant herein was plaintiff and plaintiff herein defendant; and that defendant herein further be enjoined from attempting to or incumbering the property of plaintiff herein by any lien by reason or virtue of said judgment to the extent of said $1,000, or from demanding any sum of money by reason or by virtue of said judgment to the extent of $1,000, value of said property; and defendant herein was required to satisfy said judgment in said superior court to the extent of said $1,000. Prof. Pomeroy says: "It was a settled doctrine of the equitable jurisdiction, and is still the subsisting doctrine, except where it has been modified or abrogated by statute, or has become obsolete through the enlarged powers of the law courts to grant new trials, that where the legal judgment was obtained or entered through fraud, mistake, or accident, or where the defendant in the action, having a valid legal defense on the merits, was prevented in any manner from maintaining it by fraud, mistake, or accident, and there had been no negligence, laches, or other fault on his part or on the part of his agents, then a court of equity will interfere at his suit, and restrain proceedings on the judgment which cannot be consistently enforced." The material allegations of the complaint are "that the plaintiff, a constable, by virtue of a writ of claim and delivery issued out of a justice's court in an action wherein one Wilson and others were plaintiffs and Laughlin and Berkle were defendants, levied upon and took possession of 29,274 feet of lumber. That thereafter an action was commenced by the defendant herein against the plaintiff herein to recover the possession of said lumber, and for damages for the detention thereof. That action was tried, and a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff herein. On appeal to this court by the defendant herein said judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, which was afterwards had, and a judgment rendered in favor of the defendant herein and against the plaintiff herein that he return the lumber so seized by him, or, upon failure to do so, he pay in lieu thereof one thousand dollars, and two hundred and fifty dollars damages for detention," etc. "That, after the rendition of said judgment and the release of said property by order of said superior court, an action was commenced in said justice's court against said Laughlin and Berkle, and a writ of attachment issued therein and placed in the hands of the plaintiff herein as such constable as aforesaid, and said plaintiff, in pursuance of said writ, attached the said lumber, and held the same in his possession until judgment in said action was rendered in said justice's court in favor of said Laughlin and Berkle, when plaintiff herein, by order of said justice's court, released said lumber from said attachment, and turned the same over to the defendant herein; but plaintiff herein failed to take a receipt from said defendant herein for said lumber, and said defendant herein continued to prosecute his said action of claim and delivery in said superior court against plaintiff herein. That on the trial of said action in said superior court plaintiff herein was not permitted to give evidence of the return of said lumber to defendant herein, because said return had not been pleaded in said action." After judgment was rendered plaintiff's and defendant's attorneys agreed the plaintiff would pay defendant $150, and that defendant would accept that sum in full satisfaction of said judgment. That after the lapse of more than 10 days after plaintiff was informed of said agreement he tendered said $150 to defendant's attorney, who refused to accept the same, and repudiated said agreement. Plaintiff made no motion for a new trial. The attorney who conducted his defense in the action is insolvent. The complaint was demurred to by the defendant herein on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled.

Did the court err in overruling said demurrer? In other words, does the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action? The only ground stated in the complaint for equitable relief of the kind prayed in this action is that the plaintiff had a perfect defense, which he did not plead, to the action in which the execution of judgment rendered against him in said action is sought to be enforced. Why said defense was not pleaded is not stated. It is not alleged that the defendant herein is in any way responsible for the omission. The attempt to introduce evidence to prove that defense was defeated by the objection that such evidence was not admissible under the pleadings. The ruling of the court in sustaining said objection is not complained of, but plaintiff alleges that he then ascertained "for the first time" that his attorney had not pleaded said defense. It does not appear that any application was made to the court to amend the answer, so as to obviate the objection to the introduction of evidence to prove the only defense, so far as disclosed by the complaint in this action, the plaintiff had to the action which defendant was prosecuting against him. That such an amendment might have been allowed under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is made clear by various decisions of this court. No motion for a new trial, although a new trial may be granted on the ground of accident or surprise, which ordinary prudence could have guarded against, was made. Code Civil Proc. § 657. It is alleged that defendant's attorney agreed with plaintiff's attorney to accept $150 in full satisfaction of the judgment, and that plaintiff tendered that sum more than 10 days after the agreement was made, and after the time within which notice of motion for a new trial might be given, but it is not alleged that plaintiff was prevented from giving the notice by reason of the pendency of said agreement; and within six months after the judgment was rendered the court in which it was rendered might have relieved the plaintiff therefrom, provided said judgment was taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Section 473, Code Civil Proc. Chancellor KENT says: "The rule is that chancery will not relieve against a judgment at law on the ground of its being contrary to equity, unless the defendant in the judgment was ignorant of the fact in question pending the suit, or it could not have been received as a defense, or unless he was prevented from availing himself of the defense by fraud or accident, or the act of the opposite party, unmixed with negligence or fault on his part." Foster v. Wood, 6 Johns. Ch. 87. "A court of equity does not interfere with judgments at law unless the complainant has an equitable defense, of which he could not avail himself at law because it did not amount to a legal defense, or had a good defense at law which he was prevented of availing himself of by fraud or accident, unmixed with negligence of himself or his agents." Hendrickson v. Hinckley, 17 How. 443. Here the plaintiff had a good defense at law, but he was not prevented from availing himself of it by fraud or accident, unmixed with negligence of himself or agent. No element of fraud or accident is apparent, but the negligence of the plaintiff or his agent is conspicuous. The application of the rule laid down by the eminent authorities to which I have above referred leaves the plaintiff no equities whatever. I think the party who employs an attorney, who appears and conducts his defense, cannot make the negligence of such attorney a ground for equitable relief from a judgment which might have been prevented by reasonable diligence. I know of no case in which the incompetency or neglect of an attorney has been held to be a sufficient ground for the relief prayed and granted in this case. The complaint, in my judgment, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the demurrer to it on that ground should have been sustained.

PRESCOTT et al. v. GRADY. (No. 14,016.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1891.)

ACTION ON DEMAND NOTE—PLEADING—ANSWER—RECORD.

1. On a demand note providing for a reasonable attorney's fee in case of suit thereon, the maker is entitled to demand of payment before suit can be brought, and it is error, in an action on such a note, to render judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings, if the answer alleges that payment was not demanded.

2. In such an action, under an allegation in the answer that the amount demanded in the complaint as a reasonable attorney's fee is not reasonable, defendant has a right to show that plaintiff is not entitled to any fee, or that the fee demanded is not reasonable; and judgment against him on the pleadings is error.

3. Where a judgment on motion on the pleadings recites that the motion was heard on June 20th, it will not be disturbed for want of notice to defendant of the hearing, in the absence of a bill of exceptions, on what purports to be a notice of a hearing on May 30th, a legal holiday, inserted in the transcript, since such notice constitutes no part of the judgment roll, and does not warrant a conclusion that it was the notice on which the final hearing was had.

TEMPLE, C. This action is brought upon a promissory note executed by defendant. Judgment was entered against him on the pleadings, and it recites that the defendant was duly and regularly served with notice of the time and place of hearing the motion. There is inserted in the transcript, however, what purports to be a notice of the hearing of the motion May 30, 1890, a legal holiday. The judgment recites that the motion was heard June 20, 1890. There is no bill of exceptions, and we cannot conclude that the notice, inserted without authority in the transcript, is the notice in pursuance of which the motion was finally heard. The notice constitutes no part of the judgment roll. The judgment shows that it was entered upon the pleadings, on the theory that the answer raises no issue, and the question is whether this ruling was correct. The suit is upon a promissory note, which is set out at length in the complaint. It is in the usual form, except that it contains this stipulation: "And if this note is collected by suit, I agree and promise that the court having jurisdiction allow a reasonable attorney's fee, together with all legal expenses, to be made part of the judgment." It is also averred that payment has been demanded and no part paid, and that $75 is a reasonable attorney's fee. The answer denies that payment of the note was ever demanded, that $75, or any other sum, is a reasonable attorney's fee, and alleges that that stipulation for an attorney's fee was without consideration. All the other facts constituting plaintiff's cause of action are expressly admitted.

Appellant does not wish to open the well-settled question whether suit may be brought upon a note payable on demand without other demand than the bringing of the suit, but he claims that the contract sued on is more than a promissory note; that it contains a stipulation for special damage in case suit be brought, and that he ought not to be held to have incurred this liability until he is in default according to the terms of his contract; that is, until he has failed to pay on demand. On principle it is difficult to resist this argument. It is well settled that suit may be brought at once on a demand note, but the rule does not seem to be in accord with the general principles of pleading. The cause of action would consist of the right to the money on demand, the demand, and the breach of the agreement, to-wit, failure to pay. If the bringing of the suit is the demand, still before suit brought there was no breach. It is an exception to general rules established by precedent, and, when confined to a recovery of the debt, there is no great harm in the exception; but, where special damage results from a merely imaginary breach of the contract, the case is different. Upon giving a note payable on demand, one naturally expects that some time would be allowed. Under our Code, for the purpose of fixing the liability of indorsers, the apparent maturity of such a note bearing interest is one year. It is not to be supposed that a debtor would add to his debt the liability for an attorney's fees if he expected to be sued at once. But, on giving such a note, he adds an inducement to sue at once, and without—on the view adopted by the court—a chance to escape the damage. In this light, such a stipulation is simply calculated to encourage litigation, and has in some states been declared against public policy, and void. Bullock v. Taylor, 39 Mich. 137; Witherspoon v. Musselman, 14 Bush, 214. It becomes solely an inducement to sue, and not an indemnity for a dereliction on the part of the debtor. In Adams v. Seaman, 82 Cal. 636, 23 Pac. Rep. 53, it was held that such a stipulation constitutes a material part of the contract, and destroys its negotiability. It would seem that it should also take it out of the limited exception to the general rules of pleading, and that such damage cannot be recovered until there has been a breach of the contract.

The answer also denies that $75, or any other sum, is a reasonable attorney's fee. Respondent claims, and the court must have held, this to be an immaterial denial, on the ground that it was not necessary to aver what a reasonable fee would be. In Carriere v. Minturn, 5 Cal. 435, in an action to foreclose a mortgage which stipulated for a fee of 5 per cent., it was said that it was not necessary to aver that 5 per cent. was a reasonable fee, because the fee did not constitute the cause of action, but was an incident to it, like costs. Costs are not an incident to the cause of action, but to the judgment; and neither in the practice act as it then was, nor under the Code, could this fee be entered as costs, or be reached by a motion to retax costs. Such a ruling apparently denies the right of the mortgagor to be heard at all upon the question of fixing the attorney's fee, although it may amount to thousands of dollars, and the effect of the decisions are that the fee is in the nature of damages to indemnify the creditor against the necessity of paying an attorney's fee. Carriere v. Minturn, supra; Patterson v. Donner, 48 Cal. 369; Bank v. Treadwell, 55 Cal. 379. Carriere v. Minturn is not authority, however, for the proposition that such stipulation must not be pleaded, although it was apparently so construed in Monroe v. Fohl, 72 Cal. 568, 14 Pac. Rep. 514, and in Bank v. Holt, 87 Cal. 158, 25 Pac. Rep. 272, and White v. Allatt, 87 Cal. 245, 25 Pac. Rep. 420. But whether these cases were rightly decided or not will not determine this question. They were all for the foreclosure of liens, and the charges were expressly authorized by statute. It might, with some plausibility, be argued in such cases that the charge is in the nature of costs, or like the allowance of a fee by a chancellor, when the rules of law justify it. Here the case is at law, and the charge not authorized by any statute. It is by virtue of the contract only. The Code determines the damages for the breach of a contract for the payment of money. This is a special damage, expressly authorized by the contract to be recovered in addition to general damages. The rules of pleading require such damages to be specially averred. A defendant may always admit the breach of the contract, and defend as to the amount of damage. Unless he can raise an issue as to such damage, he cannot have his day in court. We think under this answer defendant could have shown either that plaintiff was not entitled to any fee, as in Bank v. Treadwell, 55 Cal. 379, or could have been heard as to what would have been a reasonable fee; and perhaps might have made some other defense.

Appellant has not raised the question whether such a stipulation is valid, or whether judgment could be entered on the pleadings, where evidence would be required, even on default. We think the judgment should be reversed.

WE CONCUR: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed.

SAN LUIS OBISPO COUNTY V. WHITE.

(No. 13,556.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1891.)

HIGHWAY TAXES—BRIDGES—COUNTIES—CORRECTION OF ASSESSMENTS—ELECTION PROCLAMATIONS.

1. Pol. Code Cal. § 3671, provides that taxes upon road-districts shall be collected in the same manner as county taxes. St. 1880, p. 136, provides that a county may maintain an action, in its own name, for the recovery of delinquent taxes. Held, that a county can maintain an action in its own name to collect delinquent taxes which were levied upon a road-district.

2. St. Cal. 1883, p. 299, provides that the board of supervisors of a county shall have power to levy taxes upon the taxable property in any district in their county for the construction and repair of roads, provided the proposition be submitted to and received by a majority of the qualified voters. Pol. Code, § 2618, defines a bridge to be a highway. Held, that it is within the power of the board, provided the proposition is approved by a majority of the voters, to levy a tax on a road-district to build a bridge.

3. An election proclamation, ordered published by the board of supervisors, pursuant to Pol. Code Cal. § 1056, is not invalid because the clerk affixed a scroll thereto, instead of his official cial seal, though the county government act (St. Cal. 1883, p. 299, § 20, subd. 8) makes it the duty of the clerk to place his seal upon all proceedings of the board, whenever the same are ordered published.

4. If the clerk of the board of supervisors neglects to enter an order for the publication of a special election proclamation upon the minutes, as he is required to do by law, parol evidence is admissible to prove that such an order was made.

5. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 2010, provides that evidence of the publication of a notice required by law may be given by the printer's affidavit annexed to a copy of the notice. Held, that an objection that the contents of an election proclamation could not be proven by a printed copy with the affidavit of publication annexed, on the ground that the original had not been sufficiently accounted for, was properly overruled, where the court was not requested to limit such evidence to the purpose for which it was admissible.

6. Pol. Code Cal. § 1055, provides that the board of supervisors, upon the receipt of the governor's proclamation of a general or special election, shall cause a copy of the same to be published in some newspaper printed in the county, and posted in each place of election, and, in the case of a special election to fill vacancies in certain state offices, they shall post or publish a copy of such proclamation upon the receipt thereof. Section 1056 provides that whenever a special election is ordered by the board of supervisors they must publish and post a proclamation in the same manner as a proclamation issued by the governor. Held that, if a proclamation by the board of supervisors of a special election, on a proposition to levy a tax to build a bridge, was published in a county newspaper, it was not necessary that it be posted also.

7. Upon an assessment roll, the decimal parts of the dollar were separated from the units and tens by the subdivisional account-book lines instead of the decimal point, and the word "cents" was omitted from the top of the column. Held, that an objection that the tax was not entered upon the assessment roll, on the ground that the decimal point and word "cents" were omitted, is untenable, and that it was competent for the district attorney to permit the assessor to add the abbreviation "cts." at the top of the column, over the space intended for the decimal parts.

8. Pol. Code Cal. § 3881, provides that omissions, errors, or defects in an assessment book may, with the consent of the district attorney, be supplied or corrected by the assessor at any time before the sale for delinquent taxes. Held, that it is competent for the assessor, under the written instructions of the district attorney, to supply the omission on the original roll of the "total tax" in the column provided for it, where the total tax appeared in the column headed "Road-Tax."

San Luis Obispo Co. v. White, 24 Pac. Rep. 864, affirmed.

In bank. On rehearing.

PER CURIAM. We are satisfied with the opinion filed in this case on October 2, 1890, (24 Pac. Rep. 864,) and for the reasons therein stated the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Ex parte SOLOMON. (No. 20,881.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1891.)

CITY ORDINANCES—VALIDITY—EXCESSIVE PENALTY—POSSESSION OF LOTTERY TICKETS.

Pen. Code Cal. §§ 320-326, make it a misdemeanor to conduct the drawing of a lottery, or to sell tickets, or to open any office or any other place for the sale of tickets, or to permit any building to be used either for the drawing or sale; and, as a punishment, impose a fine of not exceeding $500, or imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding 6 months, or both. Held, that order No. 1,587, § 70, of the city of San Francisco, providing as a punishment for having lottery tickets in one's possession a fine of not less than $250 nor more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not less than 3 months nor more than 6 months, or both, is unreasonable and void, as out of harmony with the general laws of the state; and a person who is imprisoned under its provisions should be discharged. In re Ah You, 88 Cal. 99, 25 Pac. Rep. 974, followed.

In bank. Application for writ of habeas corpus.

Alex. Campbell and Humphreys & Flournoy, for petitioner.

DE HAVEN, J. The petitioner was convicted in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco of "having lottery tickets in his possession," which is made an offense by section 70 of order No. 1,587 of that city, and is now suffering imprisonment therefor. The ordinance provides that the offense of which petitioner was convicted is punishable "by a fine of not less than two hundred and fifty dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment." Under the general law of the state found in sections 320 to 326 of the Penal Code, it is made a misdemeanor either to conduct the drawing of a lottery or to sell lottery tickets, or to aid in the drawing of a lottery or the selling of tickets therein, or to open any office or other place for the sale of such tickets, or to let or permit to be used any building for the drawing of any lottery, or for the purpose of selling such tickets therein, but the extent to which any of these offenses may be punished is a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding 6 months, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and it is therefore possible that upon conviction of either of said offenses under the state law there may, in a wise discretion, be imposed upon the offender only a nominal fine, while, for the comparatively trifling offense of having a lottery ticket in possession, the discretion to impose a fine of less than $250 is taken away from the court by this ordinance, and the fine may be double that which can be imposed for the more serious offenses named in the general law. Such an ordinance is not in harmony with the general laws of the state, and is unreasonable and void, within the rule announced in Ex parte Ah You, 88 Cal. 99, 25 Pac. Rep. 974; and upon the authority of that case the petitioner is discharged.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HARRISON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur. There is nothing in the nature of the offense which calls for any severer penalty for its commission in a thickly settled community than for its commission in the country. The acts constituting the offense in no way tend to create a breach of the peace, nor do they tend to injure the person or property of another. The minimum penalty was fixed, doubtless, at $250, to cut off any leniency on the part of the court in which the conviction might be had. But the reasonableness or unreasonableness of an ordinance does not depend upon the difficulty of enforcing its penal provisions. The object of the ordinance is plain, but, as it in effect provides a greater penalty than that provided by the statute for kindred offenses, it is unreasonable in law, and therefore void.

SIMPSON et al. v. BUDD. (No. 14,470.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1891.)

MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL — STIPULATION FOR EXTENSION OF TIME.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 283, provides that an attorney can bind his client in any of the steps of an action by written agreement filed with the clerk, or entered upon the minutes of the court. Section 1054 provides that when an act to be done relates to the preparation of bills of exception, or to the service of notices other than of appeal, the time may be extended by the court; but that such extension shall not exceed 30 days, without the consent of the adverse party. Held, that the statutory time for giving notice of intention to move for a new trial and the preparation of a bill of exceptions may be extended without an order of court, by stipulation of the attorneys, even though the stipulation itself be not filed within the time limited for doing the acts themselves.

In bank. Application by Simpson and Gray for a writ of mandate against Budd for refusal to settle a bill of exceptions. Writ ordered.

Nicol & Orr and Carter & Smith, for petitioners. Joseph H. Budd, (F. T. Baldwin, of counsel,) for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. In an action by Simpson and Gray, the petitioners herein, against Peyton et al., tried in the superior court of San Joaquin county, the findings of the court were filed, and judgment thereupon rendered and entered, December 22, 1890, against said petitioners. It does not appear that any notice of the decision was ever served upon petitioners, but on January 2, 1891, a stipulation was filed in said court, which shows they had actual knowledge at that date of the rendition of the judgment, and for the purposes of this decision it will be assumed that they had notice thereof at that time. Five days thereafter the attorneys for the defendants in that action signed and delivered to the attorneys of the petitioners a written stipulation, by which it was stipulated and agreed that the petitioners here should have 30 days from date thereof "within which to prepare, serve, and file a bill of exceptions, notice of motion for a new trial, and statement on motion for a new trial." This stipulation was not filed with the clerk of the court until April 15, 1891, nor was there any order of the court, or of the judge thereof, extending the time within which the acts named in the stipulation might be done. The notice of motion for a new trial was filed and served within the time given by the stipulation, and within 10 days thereafter, to-wit, on February 14, 1891, the petitioners prepared and served a proposed bill of exceptions, and the defendants in that action prepared amendments thereto, and the same afterwards came before the respondent for settlement. No objection was made to the settlement of the bill of exceptions for the reason that the notice of motion was not given in time, but objection was made to such action upon the ground that the copy of said notice, served upon the attorneys for defendant therein, was not signed by the attorneys for petitioners. The respondent refused to settle the bill of exceptions, upon the ground that the notice of intention to move for a new trial was not served and filed in time, and that the proposed bill of exceptions was not prepared and presented in time.

Upon these facts the only question for decision is whether the statutory time for giving notice of intention to move for a new trial and the preparation of bills of exception can be extended by a stipulation of counsel not filed within the statutory time, and of this we entertain no doubt. An attorney has authority to bind his client in any of the steps of an action or proceeding by his agreement in writing, filed with the clerk, or entered upon the minutes of the court. Section 283, Code Civil Proc. The service and filing of notices of motion for a new trial and proposed bills of exception are steps in an action within the meaning of this section, and the stipulation is filed in time if it is on file, with the consent of the adverse attorney, when the court is called upon to act upon the matter affected by the stipulation. Section 1054 of the Code of Civil Procedure¹ does not limit the authority of attorneys, as given by section 283 of the same Code, nor prescribe the exclusive mode by which the time for giving notices or the service of proposed statements or bills of exception may be extended, but it only imposes a limitation upon the power of the court to extend such time without the consent of the adverse party. It is undoubtedly true, as has often been decided by this court, that the right to move for a new trial is statutory, and, unless the prescribed steps are taken within the time allowed, the right does not exist as against a party who stands upon the statute and insists upon strict compliance with every provision of the law relating thereto, and intended for his benefit; but it has never been held that such provisions may not be waived by the party otherwise entitled to claim their benefit. On the contrary, it has been assumed in many cases, if not directly decided, that the time for giving notice of motion for a new trial, as well as every other step to be taken in relation thereto, may be waived or extended by consent. Hobbs v. Duff, 43 Cal. 485; Brichman v. Ross, 67 Cal. 602, 8 Pac. Rep. 316; Patrick v. Morse, 64 Cal. 462, 2 Pac. Rep.

¹ Sec. 1054. When an act to be done, as provided in this Code, relates to the pleadings in the action, or the undertakings to be filed, or the justification of sureties, or the preparations of statements or of bills of exceptions or of amendments thereto, or to the service of notices other than of appeal, the time allowed by this Code may be extended, upon good cause shown, by the court in which the action is pending, or a judge thereof; but such extension shall not exceed thirty days without the consent of the adverse party.

49; Gray v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 220; Schieffery v. Tapia, 68 Cal. 184, 8 Pac. Rep. 878; Curtis v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 390, 11 Pac. Rep. 652. We are of the opinion that the parties may, within the time allowed by law to give notice of intention to move for a new trial, stipulate that the time for giving such notice may be extended, and that such stipulation has effect without any order of the court ratifying the same. The question in such cases is one which most immediately concerns the parties to the action, and attorneys may be safely intrusted to look after the rights of their respective clients in such matters. Peremptory writ of mandate ordered.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; HARRISON, J.; PATERSON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

JACKSON v. HYDE. (No. 14,065.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1891.)

PUBLIC LANDS — ASSIGNMENT OF CERTIFICATE OF PURCHASE—TRUSTS.

1. The assignee of a certificate of purchase of land from the state holds the same, or a patent issued to him thereon, in trust for those to whom, with his knowledge, his assignor has previously sold and conveyed the land. Henderson v. Grammar, 66 Cal. 332, 5 Pac. Rep. 488, followed.

2. Where such assignee has been decreed to hold the patent in trust for the grantees of his assignor, and ordered to convey to them, he is properly allowed reimbursement of his expense in procuring the patent.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by Andrew Jackson against H. R. Hyde to compel defendant to convey land alleged to be held by him in trust for plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Meux & Edwards, for appellant. Geo. A. Nourse, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The purpose of this action is to have it decreed that plaintiff is the equitable owner of a certain described 80-acre tract of land; that defendant holds the legal title thereto in trust for plaintiff; and that defendant convey the same to plaintiff. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

The material facts in the case are these: On September 2, 1867, one Gabriel Moore purchased said tract of land from the state, paying 20 per cent. of the purchase money and one year's interest, and received a certificate of purchase therefor. He occupied and held possession of the land under said certificate from its date until his death, which occurred in May, 1880; having paid most of the accruing interest. He died intestate, and his only heirs were his widow, Mary Moore, and his son, Ephraim Moore, who were appointed administratrix and administrator, and occupied said land until they conveyed it as hereinafter stated. By a final distribution of the estate of said Gabriel Moore, made May 21, 1881, said land was distributed to said Mary and Ephraim. On September 12, 1885, said Mary conveyed said land to said Ephraim by a deed duly executed, and recorded on the same day. On July 20, 1887, said Ephraim, by deed recorded that day, conveyed said land to John H. Byrd; and on July 26, 1887, said Byrd, by deed recorded that day, conveyed said land to plaintiff herein. These conveyances were made for valuable considerations, and plaintiff and his grantors have been continuously in undisturbed possession of said land. The said certificate of purchase seems to have remained in the possession of said Mary and Ephraim; and afterwards,—the said Mary on May 2, 1889, and the said Ephraim on May 7, 1889,—by written instruments attached to said certificate, they assigned the same, for the expressed consideration of one dollar, to the defendant, Hyde, and delivered to him the certificate. Thereupon the said defendant presented said certificate to the register of the state land-office, together with said assignments, and proof of the said distribution to said Mary and Ephraim; and, upon payment of the balance due the state thereon, procured a patent for said land to be issued to himself. The register was ignorant of said conveyances of said land as aforesaid, but the defendant had full knowledge thereof.

We think that the judgment of the court below was clearly right. The case cannot be distinguished, on the point involved, from Henderson v. Grammar, 66 Cal. 332, 5 Pac. Rep. 488. The only difference is that in the Henderson Case the purchaser of the lands from the state had mortgaged them, and plaintiff there claimed under a sheriff's deed obtained upon foreclosure and sale, the defendants there having obtained the certificates and procured a patent; while, in the case at bar, the plaintiff holds through a direct conveyance from the original purchaser from the state. The court there held, which is the law, that, in such a case, a conveyance of the land carries the title, of which the certificate is merely evidence. McKINSTRY, J., delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Plaintiff became the owner of the title of which such certificates were evidence, and from the time he so became the owner it was the manifest duty of defendants to assign the certificates to him. And so, when they acquired the state title, by and through the certificates, it was their duty to convey it to plaintiff." We do not deem it necessary to notice at length the quite able arguments of counsel for appellant, or the many authorities cited. The cases to which they call our attention are not applicable to the case at bar. The law which governs this case is as above stated. The judgment provides for the payment by respondent to appellant of the amount expended by the latter in procuring the patent, which is proper. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NEIL. (No. 20,834.)

ELECTIONS — FRAUDULENT VOTING — INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION.

1. An information charging that defendant "fraudulently voted at an election when he was not entitled to vote," though in the language of the statute, (Pen. Code Cal. § 45,) is not sufficient to state an offense, but must set forth the facts relied on to show fraudulent voting. People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 159, 22 Pac. Rep. 488, followed.

2. Such information is also fatally defective unless it states the particular fact or facts showing that defendant was not entitled to vote.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. SMITH, Judge.

Information against James Neil for fraudulently voting at an election. Judgment of conviction. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hugh J. & Wm. Crawford, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

FITZGERALD, C. The defendant was tried and convicted in the court below upon an information charging him with illegal voting, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state-prison for the term of one year. The information, which charges, in the language of the Code, that the defendant fraudulently voted at an election when he was not entitled to vote, was demurred to on the following grounds: First, that the facts stated in the information do not constitute a public offense; second, "that the information does not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, in this: that it is alleged that defendant was not entitled to vote at the election therein mentioned, but it is not alleged what qualification of a voter he does not possess." The demurrer was overruled. After verdict, and before the defendant was called for judgment, he moved the court in arrest of judgment on the first ground stated in the demurrer, which motion was denied by the court. The case is brought here by appeal, upon the judgment roll, from the judgment rendered upon the conviction, and from the order denying the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment.

The only question presented for decision involves the validity of the information, on the ground that it is not direct and certain, for the reason that it omits to set forth the particular circumstances of the offense charged, and which are necessary to be alleged in order to constitute a complete offense under the law. Section 45 of the Penal Code, or rather that part of it upon which the information herein is founded, reads as follows: "Every person not entitled to vote, who fraudulently votes at any election, * * * is guilty of a felony." Section 1 of article 2 of our state constitution prescribes the qualifications and disabilities of electors, and sections 1083 and 1084 of the Political Code are in the exact language of this section of the constitution. The information, as we have before stated, charges the offense in the language of the Code, and it is well settled, under our system of pleading in criminal cases, that this will generally be held to be sufficient; but where the particular circumstances of the offense are necessary to constitute a complete offense they should be stated and averred, and a failure to do so will vitiate the information or indictment. It is objected by appellant "that the allegation contained in the information that the defendant 'fraudulently voted' is insufficient, and this, notwithstanding those are the words of the statute." In Hirschfeld's Case, 13 Blatchf. 331, it was said by BENEDICT, J., that "the averment that the accused fraudulently registered is insufficient, although those are the words of the statute. Something more must be stated in order to give the accused any proper notice of the charge which he is to meet. It is impossible for the accused to determine, from this indictment, whether he is required to show in his defense that he was twenty-one years of age, or to show that he resided in a certain place, or to show that he bore a certain name, or to show that he was a native, or that he was a naturalized citizen, of the United States. An indictment under this statute should point out the fraud which it is supposed the accused committed, so that he can know what it is that he is called on to explain, and be enabled to prepare his defense." And in People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 159, 22 Pac. Rep. 488, it was said by Mr. Justice PATTERSON that "the question whether a thing has been done fraudulently is a matter of law, and an allegation of fraud, in general terms, presents no issuable fact." "It is a sound principle that an indictment charging fraud of any kind should aver with particularity the facts relied upon to show fraud. Many of the niceties and technicalities which existed under former methods of pleading are not allowed to prevail under the provisions of our Code, but the rule still exists that an indictment must be certain and clear as to 'the particular circumstances of the offense charged, when they are necessary to constitute a complete offense.'" Id. On the authority of that case it follows that the objection to the information on this ground was well taken.

It is further objected "that the information is fatally defective for omitting to state facts showing that the accused was not entitled to vote." The facts which constitute a qualified elector are those which are prescribed by the sections of the constitution and the Political Code above referred to, and there are many causes of disqualification therein enumerated, but as to which one of them the defendant labored under the information does not disclose. The averment that the defendant was not entitled to vote is not the averment of a fact, but of a conclusion of law. The material facts necessary to be charged, and upon which this legal result, that he is not entitled to vote, is founded, are those facts prescribed by the constitution and the Code as constituting the qualifications and creating the disabilities of electors. Mr. Bishop, in the first volume of his work on Criminal Procedure, (3d Ed. § 627,) says: "Whether one is a qualified voter or not is a result deduced by the law from the facts, and, though a statute may mention a legal result in defining an offense, this is not the province of an indictment. It must state the facts out of which such result comes; thus giving the defendant notice of what is charged against him, and putting upon the record a proper case for the adjudication of the court." In People v. Standish, 6 Parker, Crim. R. 111, it is said: "Prima facie every white man of the age of twenty-one years is entitled to vote, and when he offers a vote it must be received, unless some fact is shown or appears which disqualifies him; and, when charged with voting without being legally qualified, the indictment should show the fact or facts which disqualify him." To the same effect are State v. Moore, 27 N. J. Law, 105; State v. Tweed, Id. 111; Gallagher v. State, 10 Tex. App. 469; Pearce v. State, 1 Sneed, 63; Gordan v. State, 52 Ala. 308; U. S. v. Hirschfield, 13 Blatchf. 331; Quinn v. State, 35 Ind. 487. When these cases were decided, the statutes of most of those states were substantially the same as our own. The principal cases to the contrary are State v. Douglass, 7 Iowa, 414; Com. v. Shaw, 7 Mete. (Mass.) 52; State v. Marshall, 45 N. H. 281; U. S. v. Quinn, 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 153. Upon a careful examination of these cases on this point, we are satisfied with the reasoning and the conclusion reached in the former. It therefore follows that the information is fatally defective in omitting to state the particular fact or facts showing that the defendant was not entitled to vote. The judgment and order should be reversed, and the information dismissed, and we so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the court below is directed to dismiss the information.

DE GUYER et al. v. BANNING. (No. 13,240.) (Supreme Court of California. Sept. 26, 1891.)

PUBLIC LANDS—MEXICAN GRANTS—BOUNDARIES AND EXTENT.

1. Where there is a conflict between the boundaries of a Mexican grant as given by the decree of confirmation and those fixed by the survey upon which the patent is based, the patent, while it remains in force, must control; and, although the survey itself be incorrect in not including all the land contained in the decree, it cannot, after approval by the land department, be impeached or disregarded in an action of ejectment by one who claims under the proceedings of which it is an essential part.

2. An island within the exterior boundaries of the inner bay of San Pedro was claimed as part of a Mexican grant. The survey recited that it was made in conformity to the boundaries specified in the decree of confirmation; and, after giving certain boundaries which it was contended were the same as those fixed in the decree, excepted from the tract surveyed "that portion thereof covered by the navigable waters of the inner bay * * * which are included within the following described lines, to-wit;" the lines referred to being those which marked the exterior boundaries. It also designated the tract, exclusive of that covered by the navigable waters, as certain numbered lots on the plats of the public survey. Held, that inasmuch as the bay was marked "Excepted" upon the map accompanying the patent, and none of the lots referred to included any portion of the land within the exterior boundaries of the bay, the exception must be construed to include, not simply the lands covered by the navigable waters, but all those within the exterior boundaries.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. HUTTON, Judge.

Action of ejectment by De Guyer and others against Banning. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Houghton, Silent & Campbell and J. S. Chapman, for appellants. Ricknell & White, (Smith, Winder & Smith, of counsel,) J. E. Foulds, and Lee & Scott, amici curiæ.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action to recover possession of a tract of land known as "Mormon Island," lying within the exterior boundaries of the inner bay of San Pedro. The plaintiffs claim the land in controversy as a part of the Rancho San Pedro, the title to which is a Spanish grant, confirmed by the United States district court on appeal thereto from the board of land commissioners appointed under the act of congress of March 3, 1851, to ascertain and settle private land claims in this state, and a United States patent therefor dated December 18, 1858. This patent conveys the land embraced in the said Rancho San Pedro, as the same was surveyed by the United States surveyor general after the confirmation of said grant, the patent referring to the survey and plat thereof for purposes of description. The survey recites that it was made in conformity to the boundaries specified in the decree of confirmation, and after giving certain named exterior boundaries, which it is contended by plaintiffs are the same as those fixed in the decree of confirmation, it proceeds as follows: "Excepting, reserving, and excluding from the tract as thus surveyed that portion thereof covered by the navigable waters of the inner bay of San Pedro, and which are included within the following described lines, to-wit;" the lines thus referred to as following this general description being those which mark the exterior boundaries of the inner bay of San Pedro. The judgment of the superior court was in favor of defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal.

The whole controversy in this case grows out of the alleged difference between the boundaries of the said grant, as given in the decree confirming it, and those fixed in the patent; this difference being made by the exception contained in the survey above referred to. The appellants contend: (1) That they have title to all the land within the specific boundaries of the Rancho San Pedro, as fixed in the decree of confirmation, and that the exception contained in the patent and survey must be disregarded as unauthorized and void. (2) That, if the exception is not held to be void, it should be construed only as embracing the navigable waters of the inner bay of San Pedro, and not all the land within the exterior boundaries of such inner bay, in which case the land sued for would not be within the exception.

1. In support of their first proposition, the appellants insist that in surveying the Rancho San Pedro no discretionary power was vested in the United States surveyor general, and that his only authority was to make a survey which would conform to the boundaries given in the decree of confirmation, and that, as by this exception land is excluded from the survey which was included within the boundaries of the rancho as confirmed, it is void. It is true the duty of that officer was to locate the confirmed grant in conformity with the decree. The Fossat Case, 2 Wall. 714. But it does not follow that, when the survey has been made, approved, and acted upon by the land department, its correctness may be impeached or disregarded in an action of ejectment, and that, too, by one who claims under the very proceedings of which the survey was one essential part. To avoid the force of this position, the appellants insist upon the broad proposition that the location of the grant was not fixed and established by the survey and patent, but by the decree of confirmation; and that, in case of a conflict between the boundaries given by the decree and those fixed by the survey upon which the patent is based, the descriptive calls given in the decree are controlling. This position cannot be upheld, and the contrary is, we think, the established doctrine. Moore v. Wilkinson, 13 Cal. 478; Teschmacher v. Thompson, 18 Cal. 11; Leese v. Clark, Id. 535; Chiple v. Farris, 45 Cal. 527; Cassidy v. Carr, 48 Cal. 339; People v. San Francisco, 75 Cal. 388, 17 Pac. Rep. 522; Wright v. Seymour, 69 Cal. 122, 10 Pac. Rep. 323; Beard v. Federy, 3 Wall. 478. The reasoning in Chiple v. Farris, supra, appears to be particularly applicable to this case. In that case it was contended that the confirmation of the grant gave the claimant a perfect title, and that he could not be divested of his title to any such lands by a patent which did not embrace them all. In answer to this the court said: "A patent, issued under the act of 1851, is, as has often been held by this court, the final act in proceedings instituted for the confirmation of the claim of the patentee to land which had been granted by the former government, and for the segregation of such land from the public lands of the United States; and it is a record which binds both the government and the claimant, and cannot be attacked by either party, except by direct proceedings instituted for that purpose. Leese v. Clark, 18 Cal. 535. While it stands, the claimant, or those deriving title through him, will not be permitted to aver that the claim comprised other or different lands from those mentioned in the patent. * * * It is contended by the plaintiffs that the survey, which is incorporated into the patent, does not accord with the decree of confirmation, and that they are entitled to rely upon the decree—which is also incorporated into the patent—for title to lands within the decree, but not within the survey. This position cannot be maintained consistently with the views already expressed as to the nature and effect of the patent. The patent purports to convey the lands described in the survey, and its scope cannot be extended, nor on the other hand can it be limited, by showing that the decree comprised a greater or less area than the survey. Nor can the claimant, after admitting, as he must, the conclusive effect of the patent, make out title to lands not conveyed by the patent, by the production of the proceedings which culminated in the patent. The patent, while it remains in force, conclusively determines what lands the claimant was entitled to under his claim and the decree of confirmation. The claimant can neither reform the patent nor show that it is in any respect incorrect, in an action of ejectment." It is unnecessary to quote further from the decisions on this point. Those above cited establish the proposition that upon the confirmation of a Mexican grant the patent issued by the United States to the claimant is the only evidence of the extent of the grant. The obligation assumed by the United States to protect the rights of claimants under Mexican grants was political in its character, and the manner in which this should be met, and the effect to be given the prescribed proceedings in relation to the establishment of such rights, were matters of legislative policy, and the evident purpose of the act of March 3, 1851, was not only to confirm and protect the rights of claimants under Mexican grants, but also to segregate from the public domain the lands thus confirmed to such grantees, so that it might be known what lands in the state were subject to settlement by citizens of the United States. To accomplish this end the act provided for a survey of all confirmed grants to be made under authority of the government, and for the issuance of a patent thereon, which should be conclusive evidence of the location of the grant. It follows from this that, in ascertaining the boundaries of the Rancho San Pedro, we must look to the patent, and, if there is a conflict as to its location and extent between it and the decree of confirmation, the patent must control.

2. The remaining question is whether the land in controversy is included within the exception; and, as to this, we entertain no doubt that the exception, properly construed, embraces all the lands within the exterior boundaries of the inner bay of San Pedro, as shown on the map accompanying the patent, and is not confined simply to such land as is covered by the navigable waters of that bay. That this is the true meaning of the exception is made to appear, not only from the fact that the inner bay of San Pedro is marked "Excepted" upon the map referred to, but is also conclusively shown by the concluding portion of the survey itself, as returned and certified, in which, after giving the boundaries of the land surveyed by courses and distances, it designates the land surveyed, "exclusive of the lands above described, as covered by the navigable waters of the inner bay of San Pedro," as being certain numbered lots on the plats of the public survey, neither of which lots includes any portion of the land within the exterior boundaries of the inner bay of San Pedro, as marked on said map. We hold, therefore, that the land in controversy is not a part of the Rancho San Pedro, as patented by the United States, and the judgment of the superior court is right. Judgment and order affirmed.

BARRY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 14-436.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1891.)

CONTEMPT—JUDGMENT—RIGHT TO ENTER SECOND JUDGMENT.

A judgment that a person be imprisoned for contempt five days and pay a fine, and, if the fine be not paid, that he be further imprisoned at the rate of one day for each two dollars, until it is paid, is final; and the court has no authority, at the end of the five days, to enter another judgment for the fine, and issue execution, but only to enforce the original judgment according to its terms.

In bank. Proceeding by certiorari to review the action of the superior court, city and county of San Francisco, in rendering two different judgments for contempt against James H. Barry.

Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for petitioner. Atty. Gen. Hart and W. S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., (J. A. Hosmer and Wm. Fitzmaurice, of counsel,) for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. On September 30, 1889, in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, it was adjudged that the petitioner here was guilty of a contempt of court, and that he be punished therefor by imprisonment in the county jail of said city and county for five days, and pay a fine of $500, and, if such fine was not paid at the end of said five days' imprisonment, that he be further imprisoned until said fine should be satisfied, at the rate of one day for each two dollars of the fine unpaid. On October 4, 1890, in department No. 8 of said superior court, on motion of the district attorney, another judgment was entered in the same proceeding for contempt, which, after reciting that the five-days term of imprisonment had expired, and that no part of the $500 had been paid, proceeded as follows: "It is therefore ordered that judgment be entered herein against said James H. Barry for $500 and costs, and that execution issue against said James H. Barry for $500 and costs, to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco. Wherefore, by virtue of the law, and by reason of the premises aforesaid, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that judgment be, and the same is hereby, entered herein against said James H. Barry for the sum of five hundred ($500.00) dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from the date hereof till paid." This judgment was entered without any notice to the petitioner. This is a proceeding upon certiorari to review the action of the court in rendering the last judgment, and our inquiry is confined to the single question, whether in that the court exceeded its jurisdiction. We are of the opinion that when the court rendered its judgment in the contempt proceeding on September 30, 1889, it did not retain jurisdiction to enter another and different judgment in the same matter on October 4, 1890. The first judgment was final, and the only authority of the court thereafter, in the matter concluded thereby, was the power to enforce the judgment according to its terms, so far as it was capable of enforcement. The order and judgment of October 4, 1890, are annulled.

BRANDT v. THOMPSON et al. (No. 14,021.)

QUIETING TITLE—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGEE.

In an action to quiet title, the court found that plaintiff, to secure a loan, had conveyed the land to B. by absolute deed, which was intended only as a mortgage, and that T. purchased from B. with knowledge of the nature of B.'s title. Held, that it was error to quiet title to the land in plaintiff against T, "except as a mortgagee thereof having a mortgagee's interest therein, to be determined by a proper suit of foreclosure;" since, it having been determined that T. stood in the position of a mortgagee, the only way for plaintiff to quiet title was to pay the mortgage.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. C. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Otto Brandt against C. M. Thompson and Herman Brandt. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Thompson appeals. Reversed.

N. O. Bradley and E. D. Edwards, for appellant. Geo. A. Norse and Justin Jacobs, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This action was tried upon the second amended complaint. What the preceding complaints were does not appear. The second amended complaint presents simply an action to quiet title. It is averred that plaintiff is, and for a long time has been, the owner in fee and in the actual possession of certain described land; that defendants claim and assert an interest of some kind in said land; and that defendants, or either of them, have no right, title, or interest whatever in said land. The prayer is that defendants be required to set forth the nature of their asserted claims, and that it be decreed that they have no right, title, or interest in said land, and that plaintiff has an absolute title thereto. The defendant Herman Brandt, who is plaintiff's brother, made no defense.

Defendant Thompson filed an answer in which it is denied that since March 4, 1885, plaintiff has been the owner, or in possession, or entitled to possession, of the said land; and in which it is averred that from said March 4, 1885, to April 23, 1888, the defendant Herman was the owner in fee and in possession of said land; that on April 23d Thompson held a mortgage on said land, amounting at that time, principal and interest, to $13,679.50, and that said Herman proposed to him that if he would satisfy said mortgage, and pay said Herman the sum of $6,200, the latter would sell and convey said land to him, (Thompson;) that he accepted the proposition, released said mortgage, paid said $6,200 to said Herman, and that the latter on said 23d day of April, 1888, conveyed said land to Thompson, since which time he has been the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of said land. The court below found that on March 3, 1885, plaintiff was owner in fee and in the possession of said land, and has ever since been in possession, holding the same adversely to defendant and all the world, and that neither of the defendants have been in possession of the same, or any part thereof; that on said March 3, 1885, plaintiff borrowed of Thompson $8,500, and to secure the same executed to him a mortgage on said land; that on the next day (March 8th) plaintiff executed and delivered to his said brother Herman (defendant herein) a deed of conveyance of said land, absolute in form, but intended only as security for $6,000, borrowed by plaintiff from said Herman; that afterwards, on March 19, 1888, Thompson "paid to the said Herman Brandt the said sum of six thousand dollars, ($6,000,) which he, the said Herman Brandt, had loaned to plaintiff, together with two hundred dollars ($200) interest, and satisfied on the records the said mortgage of $8,500 from plaintiff to Thompson;" and that on said March 19, 1888, said Herman made a deed of conveyance of said land to said Thompson. It is found, also, that at the time of said last conveyance Thompson knew that the said deed from plaintiff to said Herman of March 4, 1885, was intended as security for the said loan of $6,000. And upon these facts the court found that the said deed of March 4, 1885, from plaintiff to Herman, was a mortgage to secure $6,000, and did not pass the title, and that the deed from Herman to Thompson carried to the latter only Herman's interest, viz., that of a mortgagee; that plaintiff is the owner in fee of the land as against Thompson, and that Thompson has no right, title, or interest therein, except as a mortgagee thereof, having a mortgagee's interest therein to be foreclosed by a proper suit of foreclosure against plaintiff herein; and that plaintiff is entitled to a decree as prayed for to "quiet title" to said land against Thompson, and those claiming under him, "except as a mortgagee thereof having a mortgagee's interest therein, to be determined by a proper suit of foreclosure." A judgment was rendered in accordance with these conclusions; that is, it was decreed that plaintiff is the owner in fee-simple of the land, and that

Thompson has no interest therein except that of a mortgagee, "to be determined by proper suit of foreclosure against plaintiff herein." Thompson appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. We think the evidence sufficient to warrant the findings of the court that the deed from plaintiff to his brother Herman was given to secure $6,000 borrowed money; that it was therefore only a mortgage; and that Thompson knew the nature of said deed when he took his conveyance. And the court was correct in holding that it did not pass the title. The doctrine of Hughes v. Davis, 40 Cal. 117, has been abrogated, and the rule stated in Jackson v. Lodge, 36 Cal. 28, and Cunningham v. Hawkins, 27 Cal. 603, restored, by sections 2924 and 2925 of the Civil Code. See Taylor v. McLain, 64 Cal. 514, 2 Pac. Rep. 399; Healy v. O'Brien, 66 Cal. 519, 6 Pac. Rep. 386; Hall v. Arnott, 80 Cal. 348, 22 Pac. Rep. 200.

Neither do we think that the decree (assuming that it was based upon a proper theory) excludes Thompson from enforcing his rights as a mortgagee under the said mortgage from plaintiff to Herman Brandt, with respect to which Thompson would be subrogated to the rights of Herman. It merely undertakes to reserve to Thompson the right, "by proper suit of foreclosure," to have determined his interest "as a mortgagee," without declaring what that interest is.

But the judgment must be reversed for other reasons. It is somewhat difficult to say from the pleadings in this case what issues were really before the court; but the court found certain facts upon which the validity of the judgment in favor of respondent must be determined. Now, upon those facts, respondent stands simply in the position of a mortgagor seeking to quiet his title against a mortgagee, without paying, or tendering or offering to pay, the debt for which the mortgage was given. But such a result cannot be achieved. It would be against general equitable principles and adjudicated cases. De Cazara v. Orena, 80 Cal. 132, 22 Pac. Rep. 74; Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271, 17 Pac. Rep. 225; Spect v. Spect, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 205. In the case of Booth v. Hoskins the rule was applied when the mortgage debt was barred by the statute of limitations. The only way for a party in respondent's position to quiet a mortgage is to pay it. The decree in the case at bar first undertakes to quiet respondent's title, and then disturbs it again by declaring appellant's right to foreclose. If appellant's debt should become barred by the statute of limitations, then, by this decree, respondent would have his title quieted without paying the mortgage debt; the very thing which equity says cannot be done. Respondent can have no remedy in the premises without paying or tendering the amount due appellant on his mortgages, and the court erred in holding otherwise. No doubt both parties, with a better understanding of their rights, can reconstruct their pleadings so as to better present those rights to the court. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, with leave to both parties to amend their pleadings as they may be advised.

OLSEN v. LOVELL. (No. 14,191.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1891.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—DAMAGES.

1. Where one owning land in common with another contracts to sell and convey the same to another, signing his own name, and, without authority, his co-tenant's name also, he cannot be compelled to convey to the vendee his undivided half of the land, on his co-tenant's repudiating the contract, since it would be to enforce specific performance of a contract which he did not make or contemplate. Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 521, 23 Pac. Rep. 695, followed.

2. Nor can he be made to respond in damages for breach of the contract, since the contract sued on is one which he did not make.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. S. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Action by Alfred Olsen against C. A. Lovell for specific performance. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robt. T. Devlin, for appellant. McKune & George, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. Plaintiff brought this action to compel defendant to specifically perform a certain contract for the conveyance of land. Defendant demurred on the general ground of want of facts, and also on certain special grounds. The demurrer was sustained, and judgment was rendered for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

It appears from the complaint that on January 21, 1890, a certain written contract was entered into, which purports upon its face to have been made by plaintiff, as a party of the first part, and the defendant C. A. Lovell and one F. E. Judson, as parties of the second part. By this contract plaintiff was to convey to defendant and Judson a certain tract of land in Placer county, and pay them $1,750; and defendant and Judson were to convey to plaintiff a certain lot of land in Sacramento city. The contract was signed by plaintiff and by defendant, but was not signed by Judson. Judson's name was signed to the contract by defendant in this manner: "F. E. Judson, by C. A. L." There is nothing else on the face of the contract, or in any way attached to it, to intimate that defendant was the attorney in fact or agent of Judson, and he does not assume to sign Judson's name as his attorney; and, indeed, it appears from other averments in the complaint that plaintiff did not rely upon any legal authority of defendant to bind Judson, but upon the probability that the latter would agree to whatever defendant might promise for him in the premises. No fraud is alleged against defendant. It is averred that Judson resided at the time in the eastern states, and that defendant in fact had no authority to bind Judson, who, it is to be inferred from the complaint, although not directly averred, has repudiated the contract. It is further averred that plaintiff tendered to defendant the sum of $875, being one-half of said $1,750 mentioned in the contract, and offered to grant him the undivided one-half of said land in Placer county, or, if defendant preferred, the one-half of said land in severalty; and thereupon plaintiff demanded of defendant that he convey to plaintiff the undivided one-half of said lot of land in Sacramento, and tendered him a conveyance thereof, and demanded that he execute the same, but that the defendant refused to execute the deed to plaintiff of said undivided one-half, or of any interest in said lot in Sacramento. The prayer is that defendant be adjudged to convey to plaintiff said undivided one-half of said lot in Sacramento, upon the payment to plaintiff of said $875, and his execution of a deed to the one-half of said land in Placer county.

The case at bar cannot be distinguished in principle from Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 521, 23 Pac. Rep. 695. In that case Torrence and wife signed a written contract to convey certain land in which the wife had a separate interest. The wife afterwards repudiated the contract, and, as she had not acknowledged it, she could not be compelled, under the statute, to perform it. It was then sought to compel the husband to convey his interest in the property, on receipt of his proportion of the agreed price; but it was held that this could not be done. It is true that in Jackson v. Torrence the parties were husband and wife, and this court in its opinion in that case very naturally notices some of the peculiar results which would follow a specific performance by the husband, as, for instance, that the wife would be left a tenant in common with strangers. But the ground upon which the decision rested was that to force such a specific performance upon W. H. Torrence would be to compel him "to perform a contract which he never made or intended to make." This court there says: "The only contract he executed, or intended to execute, was a contract in which his wife was to join, for the conveyance of the whole property for a round sum. Until the contract was completed by the accession of his wife, there was no contract of which there could be any breach or failure to perform." And so in the case at bar. To compel defendant to convey an undivided half of the Sacramento lot would be to force him "to perform a contract which he never made, or intended to make." He did not contract to convey his half of the lot, thus making plaintiff and Judson co-tenants thereof, or to take in exchange an undivided half of the Placer county land, and half of the $1,750, thus becoming a tenant in common with plaintiff. The reasons why he might not want so to do may not be so striking as in the case of Torrence and wife; but the principle to be applied is the same. The contract upon its face clearly means that defendant and Judson were to convey the whole of their land in exchange for the whole of plaintiff's land, together with the whole of a certain named sum of money; and, if such contract cannot be specifically enforced as written, then it cannot be so enforced at all. We think, therefore, that the demurrer was properly sustained.

There is also a claim in the complaint, not separately stated, in which it is averred that, by reason of "the breach of covenant to convey on the part of the defendant hereinbefore set out, and of his failure to specifically perform the same," plaintiff has sustained damages in the sum of $3,000, for which he also prays judgment. But, waiving respondent's point that such a cause of action could not be joined with the other, and that it should have been specifically stated, we do not see how, upon the averments in this complaint, appellant could recover damages because respondent did not do what he was not legally liable to do. The question whether, with proper averments, defendant could be held in damages in an action based upon some such ground as deceit or fraud, does not here arise.

Judgment affirmed.

I concur: DE HAVEN, J.

BEATTY, C. J., (concurring.) The decision in Jackson v. Torrence does not, in my opinion, apply to the facts of this case, but I concur in the judgment on the ground that Lovell's contract to convey his interest in the Sacramento lot cannot be enforced, except upon condition of giving him what he bargained for, viz., a half interest, undivided, in the Placer land, with Judson for co-tenant. He did not agree to take such interest with plaintiff as co-tenant, nor did he agree to take a divided half of the land in severalty. He has never been offered, and he cannot get, what he agreed to take. Therefore he cannot be compelled to convey; and, for the same reason, he is not liable in damages unless, as suggested by Justice McFARLAND, for fraud or deceit.

Ex parte SAM WAH. (No. 20,882.)

TAXATION—OBSTRUCTING COLLECTION.

Pen. Code Cal. § 428, which provides that every person who obstructs or hinders any public officer from collecting taxes "in which the people of this state are interested" is guilty of a misdemeanor, does not apply to the act of obstructing a town officer in the collection of a town tax.

In bank. Original proceedings in habeas corpus by Sam Wah against C. W. Rogers, sheriff of Contra Costa county. On ex parte hearing, petition was dismissed.

Smith & Murasky, for petitioner.

DE HAVEN, J. The petitioner was convicted in a justice's court of Contra Costa county of the alleged offense of hindering and obstructing the town marshal of the town of Martinez, in that county, in the collection of certain street poll-taxes of and in that town. The alleged obstruction consisted in petitioner's refusal to give his true name to the officer when requested to do so. It is claimed that this act was a violation of section 428 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows "Every person who willfully obstructs or hinders any public officer from collecting any revenue, taxes, or other sums of money in which the people of this state are interested, and which such officer is by law empowered to collect, is guilty of a misdemeanor." It appears that Martinez is a town of the sixth class, and by section 862 of the municipal corporation bill, approved March 13, 1883, towns of that class are given power "to impose on and collect from any male inhabitant, between the ages of twenty-one and sixty years, an annual street poll-tax, not exceeding two dollars," and are also authorized to levy and collect a property tax for street work and other municipal purposes. It is very clear to us that the money levied and collected under this grant of power belongs to the municipality, and not to the state, and that, therefore, section 428 of the Penal Code has no application to the charge made against the petitioner. It is true that such taxes are held in trust by the municipal corporation, and are to be expended only for public purposes; but the trust is for the immediate benefit of the inhabitants within the corporate limits, although incidentally the people of the state who may have occasion to come within such limits may also share in such benefits. It is, under existing laws, left entirely to the option of towns of the class to which Martinez belongs whether any street poll-tax shall be imposed upon their inhabitants, and such taxes, when collected, belong in the municipal treasury, and are to be expended only by the town, and the people of the state do not have any interest therein, within the meaning of section 428 of the Penal Code. That this section does not apply to the collection of a municipal tax is also apparent from other sections of the chapter in which it is found. Section 424, relating to embezzlement or other misuse of public moneys, or falsification of accounts by public officers, is made expressly to apply to city, town, and district officers. Under section 425, every officer charged with the receipt or disbursement of "public moneys," who fails to keep and pay the same in the manner provided by law, is guilty of a felony; and the succeeding section defines the phrase "public moneys," as used in the two preceding sections, to include, among other things, "all moneys belonging to the state, or any city, county, town, or district therein." In view of the care taken to specifically define general words in the preceding sections so as to include public moneys of towns and cities, it becomes plain that the language of section 428 of the Penal Code, which makes it an offense to obstruct an officer in the collection of "any revenue, taxes, or other sums of money in which the people of the state are interested," was not intended by the legislature to apply to the act of obstructing a town officer in the collection of a town tax. It follows that the petitioner is entitled to be discharged. So ordered.

PEOPLE ex rel. ATTORNEY GENERAL v. WALLACE. (No. 14,766.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 6, 1891.)

COURTS—JURISDICTION—SHAM CONTROVERSY.

Where an application to the supreme court of California for a writ of review is made merely to test the validity of the grand jury, and presents no real controversy between the parties to the record, the court will not take cognizance of it.

In bank. Application by attorney general against Wallace for a writ of review. Application dismissed.

Atty. Gen. Hart, for petitioner. Creed Haymond and W. H. L. Barnes, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The court is unanimously of the opinion that this is not a case which the court can entertain in the shape in which it is presented. When the question of the legality of this grand jury arises in a real controversy between parties opposed in interest, the court will decide it as promptly as it can. This case does not present a real controversy. It is a made-up case, in which the parties to the record are not opposed in interest. It is simply a submission of a series of questions which numbers of people undoubtedly have a curiosity or a desire to have decided by this court, but is not a case of which the court can take cognizance. The court cannot sit here to answer questions proposed by anybody. We decide real controversies. If the grand jury is an illegal body, there are various regular ways of presenting the question, but it cannot be presented in this way. The application is dismissed.

WORLEY v. NETHERCOTT. (No. 14,236.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1891.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—FAILURE OF TITLE—REMEDY OF VENDEE.

A vendee, who goes into possession of land under a contract of sale, is not entitled, on the vendor's failure or inability to convey a perfect title as agreed, to retain both the land and the purchase money until such a title be offered him, but his remedy is to rescind and restore the possession; and in that case he can recover the money already paid, together with the value of his improvements, less a reasonable rental during the time of his occupancy.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; CHARLES P. BRAYNARD, Judge.

Ejectment by W. H. Worley against Robert Nethercott. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John F. Ellison, for appellant. Wm. Nagle, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. In January, 1889, the plaintiff was residing upon and claiming to own certain real property in the town of Red Bluff, Tehama county. On the 26th of that month plaintiff verbally agreed to sell the real property and some personal property to the defendant for the sum of $1,880, and to let him take immediate possession thereof. Plaintiff was to give a warranty deed of the real property, conveying a good and perfect title thereto, and defendant was to pay $1,000 cash, and give his note for $880, bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, but it was not stated how long the note might run. Defendant paid $10 to bind the bargain, and asked plaintiff if he had a good title to the property, and the latter replied that he thought he had; that he had a warranty deed of it. Defendant asked for an abstract of the title, and plaintiff agreed to furnish one. On the 29th of the month defendant took possession, and about that time the abstract was made out and put in the hands of Mr. Ellison, an attorney at law. On the 4th of February the parties met, and went to Mr. Ellison's office, and defendant testified: "When I entered Mr. Ellison's office, knowing that he had the abstract, I said to him, 'As an attorney, can you say that the title is perfect?' He said, 'No, I can't.' He said, 'I have looked over it, and I can't say that it is perfect.'" A few days later the parties again met, and plaintiff testified: "I went to him and told him I was going away, and I wanted to settle it up one way or another. He wanted to know what I wanted to do, and I asked him if he was satisfied with the title, and he said he wasn't. Then I told him we would say quits. He said he had been out considerable in moving down there, and would be in moving away. I asked him how much, and he said about $20. I told him I would pay it, and he would give up possession. He said he didn't care to do it." Defendant then proposed to retain possession of the property, and to make some improvements upon it, and plaintiff agreed that he might make improvements costing from $100 to $150. Before the end of February plaintiff went to the mountains, and he did not return till some time in August. During his absence defendant made improvements on the property, costing, as he testified, $388.21, besides his own work, which he estimated to be worth $125. The matter remaining unsettled, plaintiff in October executed a warranty deed of the property, and on the 2d of November tendered it to the defendant, and demanded of him payment of the balance of the purchase money, namely, $1,870. The defendant refused to accept the deed or to pay the money, but he on the same day tendered and asked plaintiff to execute a warranty deed for an undivided one-half of the property, and in connection therewith offered to pay him $1,075, for the real and personal property. The plaintiff refused to execute this deed or to accept the payment as offered. The plaintiff then served on defendant a notice reading as follows: "Mr. Robert Nethercott—Dear Sir: Having refused to pay me the contract price for the land hereinafter described, I hereby notify you that the contract of sale for said lots is hereby rescinded. I hereby offer to pay you for any improvements you have made upon said property the amount they have cost you, upon being satisfied of the true amount, and also the $10 you paid thereon, with legal interest, deducting therefrom the rent of said premises during the time you have occupied them; and I hereby demand that you leave said premises, and surrender up to me the possession thereof. [Then follows a description of the property.] [Signed] W. H. WORLEY." Possession was not surrendered, and the plaintiff brought this action of ejectment to recover the same. The defendant answered denying all the averments of the complaint, and, for a second defense, setting up the contract of sale and plaintiff's failure and inability to convey a good and perfect title, and his own readiness and ability to perform his part of the contract on receiving a conveyance of such title. The court below gave judgment for the defendant, from which, and from an order denying him a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

It appears from the evidence that the plaintiff did not have a perfect title to the whole of the property which he agreed to sell; and it is claimed for respondent that under such circumstances he was not obliged to accept plaintiff's deed or to pay the purchase money, but that he could retain both the land and money until a perfect title should be offered him. We do not think this position can be maintained. In Gates v. McLean, 70 Cal. 42, 11 Pac. Rep. 489, the action was brought to recover the possession of certain land which the plaintiff had contracted to sell to the defendant, and the court, on page 50, 70 Cal., and page 492, 11 Pac. Rep., said: "Even where the contract provides for the vendee taking possession, the remedy of the purchaser, where the title of the vendor fails, or he is unable to make conveyance as stipulated in the contract, is to rescind the contract, or offer to, and to restore the possession, in which case he may recover the purchase money advanced and the interest, together with the value of his improvements, deducting therefrom such sum as the use of the premises may reasonably have been worth. If, on the other hand, the purchaser chooses not to rescind, but to retain possession under the contract, he can do so only on the condition that he pays the purchase money and interest according to the contract. In the latter case, it is considered that he is willing to receive such title as the vendor is able to give, and is content with the personal responsibility of the vendor upon his covenants." In Rhorer v. Bila, 83 Cal. 54, 23 Pac. Rep. 274, the court said: "A purchaser cannot remain in possession of lands under a contract, and at the same time refuse to pay the purchase price. If the title fails, or the vendor refuses to convey, an action on the covenants of his deed or contract will give him all the relief to which he is entitled." It is urged for respondent that what is said in the above quotation from Gates v. McLean was not necessary to the decision of that case, and was merely obiter dictum; and that it was not a correct statement of the law, and ought not to be followed. We cannot assent to the conclusion reached by counsel. In our opinion, the law was correctly declared, whether what was said was necessary to the decision of that case or not. To hold otherwise would in many cases work very great injustice. It follows, in our opinion, that the findings and judgment were erroneous, and that they ought not to be permitted to stand.

We advise, therefore, that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

PACIFIC RY. CO. et al. v. WADE, Judge.
(No. 14,593.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1891.)

STREET RAILWAYS—RIGHT TO USE EACH OTHER'S TRACKS—COMPENSATION—PROCEDURE.

Since Civil Code Cal. § 499, provides that two lines of street railway under different managements may use the same street for the distance of five blocks, each paying an equal portion for the construction of the road used by them jointly, a street-railway company, on receiving a franchise, has an absolute right to use so much of the tracks of another company, and does not thereby take the property of the other company, so that the laws relating to ascertaining the compensation to be paid on taking property under the right of eminent domain do not apply; and where the property of the first company is in the hands of the court through its receiver, the court may, on application of the second company, without the intervention of a jury, determine the amount of one-half the cost of constructing so much of the road as is sought to be used jointly, and allow such use on payment of the same.

In bank. Application for an alternative writ of prohibition by the Pacific Railway Company, whose road is in the hands of a receiver, to prevent the court which appointed the receiver from allowing the Los Angeles Consolidated Electric Railway Company to use part of petitioner's road, and from determining the amount to be paid petitioner for such use. Application denied, and alternative writ discharged.

S. C. HUNNELL, (Houghton, Silent & Campbell, of counsel,) for petitioner. JOHN D. POPE and CHAPMAN & HENDRICK, (Dom & Dom, S. C. DENSON, and W. S. GOODFELLOW, of counsel,) for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The Pacific Railway Company is the owner of a street railroad, operated by means of a wire cable, for the carriage of persons in the city of Los Angeles. On January 20, 1891, Edward W. Russell commenced an action against said company, its stockholders, and a large number of creditors, alleging, among other matters, that he was a judgment creditor, that the company was indebted in large sums to divers persons, without means or revenue to pay the same, except by the operation of its railroad system, and the proceeds thereof were wholly insufficient; that suits had been brought and many attachment suits would follow, unless steps be taken to prevent the same, and the operation of the road would be suspended; that to protect all parties a receiver was necessary; wherefore plaintiff prayed for the appointment of a receiver, to take charge of and control the property of said company, and, if necessary, to sell the same for the payment of the debts. On the day the complaint was filed J. F.

Crank was appointed receiver, with directions to take charge of the street railways owned by and under the control of the Pacific Railway Company, together with all its real and personal property, and to manage and conduct the business thereof, and from time to time render his accounts. Crank qualified and took possession, and has ever since continued to operate the road under the order of the court. On January 26, 1891, the Los Angeles Consolidated Electric Railway Company presented to the superior court a petition in said cause, setting forth that the petitioner had entered upon the construction of its line of road, as authorized by certain ordinances, and in the further prosecution of its work it was necessary that it should intersect the tracks of the Pacific Railway Company, and run along the same for a distance of three blocks; and praying an order authorizing it to operate over and on said tracks for said distance, and directing the receiver to grant all necessary facilities therefor, and for a further order fixing the amount of compensation which petitioner should pay for the right to use the tracks as aforesaid. At the time fixed for hearing, the petitioners herein appeared, and objected to any proceedings being taken, on the ground that the court had no authority to grant the relief asked. The court overruled the objection, and decided that it had jurisdiction to determine the amount of damages which would be occasioned by making the connections referred to in the petition, and continued the matter for hearing to July 16, 1891. Thereupon petitioners applied to this court for an alternative writ of prohibition, which was granted. In response to the order to show cause why he should not be restrained from any further proceedings in said matter the judge filed an answer, admitting the facts stated, and alleging that the order appointing the receiver was made on motion of the plaintiff in the action, and with the consent of the defendants therein; that on February 13, 1891, the plaintiff Russell filed a petition setting forth that there was some doubt whether the order appointing the receiver was sufficient of itself to vest in him the title to the property, especially the real property, so as to enable him to exercise all the powers and perform all the duties which the exigencies of the case might require, and asking for an order directing the Pacific Railway Company to assign its property to the receiver; that the order was made as prayed for, with the consent of the Pacific Railway Company.

Section 499 of the Civil Code provides that "two lines of street railway, operated under different managements, may be permitted to use the same street, each paying an equal portion for the construction of the track and appurtenances used by said railways jointly; but in no case must two lines of street railway, operated under different managements, occupy and use the same street or tracks for a distance of more than five blocks consecutively." The petitioner contends that, as the ordinances granting the franchises do not provide how compensation shall be ascertained, the electric company must proceed under the provisions of subdivision 6 of section 465, Civil Code. That section is a part of the chapter on the enumeration of the powers of every railroad corporation, and provides that "every corporation whose railroad is, or shall be hereafter, intersected by any new railroad, shall unite with the owners of such new railroad in forming such intersection and connections, and grant facilities therefor and, if the two corporations cannot agree upon the amount of compensation to be made therefor, or the points or the manner of such crossings, intersections, and connections, the same shall be ascertained and determined as is provided in title 7, part 3, Code of Civil Procedure." But title 7, pt. 3, prescribes rules for the assessment of compensation and damages (section 1248, Code Civil Proc.) inconsistent with the measure of compensation established by section 499, Civil Code, and the latter must control, as it relates particularly to street railroads. What counsel for the petitioner means to claim, doubtless, is that the procedure prescribed by title 7 must be followed; that there must be an effort to agree with the cable company as to the amount to be paid; and, upon disagreement, an action against the receiver in the manner and form required by the title on eminent domain, including a trial by jury, if the defendant insist upon it.

The question to be determined is simply whether the court, which, through its receiver, has the custody and control of the insolvent corporation's property, has the power to determine the compensation, viz., one-half of the cost of the construction of the tracks and appurtenances used by the companies jointly, or whether the electric company must treat with the cable company, and, upon failure to agree as to the amount to be paid, bring an action therefor against the receiver, with the permission of the court. There are none of the elements of an ordinary condemnation proceeding involved in the litigation. There is no private property to be taken for public use,—no occasion to exercise the right of eminent domain. The cable company did not acquire by the grant of its franchise any proprietary interest in the street. There can be no private property in a street, except the fee of the owner, which is held subject to the easement as long as the public continue to use the street as a highway. "The maintenance of horse railroads and running of cars upon the public streets of the city of San Francisco, designed for the carriage of passengers, is a mere special mode of using the highway, nothing more. The right to maintain such a railroad does not exclude the public from the use of the street." Market St. R. Co. v. Central R. Co., 51 Cal. 586. The franchise of the cable company gave it no exclusive use of that portion of the street upon which its road was constructed. It gave to the company the right to construct its road in such a place and manner as not to interfere with the use of the street by the public. The material placed in the street, it is true, is still the property of the cable company; but it was placed where it is with full knowledge on the part of the company that the latter would have no exclusive right to its use, so long as it should remain in the street. The right of the public to drive vehicles over and upon its road, and the right of the mayor and council to grant to another street-car company a franchise to connect with its track, and to use the same for a distance not exceeding five blocks, entered into its contract with the city as fully, under the provisions of section 499, Civil Code, then in force, as if the condition had been expressly stated in the grant; and, as the cable company took its franchise with the understanding—in effect an express stipulation—that any other company authorized by the mayor and council might use the track jointly with itself, it cannot now be heard to say that such a taking is without its consent, and is a taking of private property for public use, which can be done only by proceedings under the statute relating to eminent domain. The grant to the cable company was made to facilitate, not to abridge, the public use of the street; and, the subsequent franchise having been granted to the electric company in accordance with the provisions of the statute, it cannot be said to be a taking of the property of the cable company for any higher or different purpose than that to which it had already been devoted. Civil Code, §§ 497-499; Railway Co. v. Baldwin, 57 Cal. 178; Jersey City & N. H. Ry. Co. v. Jersey City & B. Ry. Co., 21 N. J. Eq. 556; Kinsman St. Ry. Co. v. Broadway, etc., Ry. Co., 36 Ohio St. 239; Harvey Co. v. Kerr, 45 Barb. 138; People v. Kerr, 37 Barb. 357; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Duabar, 100 Ill. 138; St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Southern R. Co., 15 S. W. Rep. 1013, 16 S. W. Rep. 960.

It is true that the grant of the franchise to the electric company gave to it an exclusive right, under the statute, (section 499, Civil Code,) to use the tracks of the cable company upon payment of one-half of the cost of construction of the tracks and of the maintenance used jointly by the companies, and that there is no question as to the right of eminent domain involved in the matter before us, the question whether the respondent has the right to fix the amount of damages or compensation to be paid by the electric company is a simple one. The property of the cable company is in custodia legis. The relation is not one between the parties. Its possession is the possession of the court, for the benefit of all persons interested in it. It is a right named as parties in the action, and it cannot be disturbed without the consent of the court. No person has a right paramount to that of the court, and no one can assert it in any action without the permission of the court. No suit can be brought, no debt can be paid, no judgment can be made, which does not require the sanction of the court. The respondent, with permission of the court, can take the property of the corporation might have taken to make the most out of the assets in its hands. It has been held that in a case of this kind he may settle disputed claims and compromise with debtors of the corporation, he may lease other lines of railways, and operate them; he may complete the construction of unfinished lines of railroad, and negotiate loans for the payment of the cost thereof; he may enter into contracts by the terms of which the owners of other roads may use the road under his control at given rates; and he may charge the rates agreed upon prior to his appointment between the company he represents and another railroad corporation. Code Civil Proc. § 568; Beach, Rec. §§ 268, 335, 360, 406; Gluck & B. Rec. pp. 106, 107, 131, 140, 241; In re New Jersey, etc., Ry. Co., 29 N. J. Eq. 67; Wiswall v. Sampson, 14 How. 65; Gilbert v. Railway Co., 33 Grat. 586. In the case before us the electric company has the right, under the statute and its franchise, to use the tracks of the cable company upon payment of one-half of the cost of the construction thereof. The only question to be determined is, what is the amount due the cable company? It is like any other claim for damages or compensation in favor of a corporation whose property is in the hands of a receiver, and is to be determined in the same way. As to the manner of determining such question there has been some discordance of opinion among judges, but, so far as we have investigated the subject, there has been no conflict of decision. The cases all hold that, while it is, under certain circumstances, proper to direct the prosecution of an action at law against the receiver to determine the amount of compensation or damages to be paid, the better and more commonly recognized practice is to apply for relief by petition to the court in which the receiver is acting. The rule applies to all cases of damages to person or property, whether occasioned prior or subsequent to the appointment of the receiver. In re Merrill, 54 Vt. 200; Redf. Ry. (6th Ed.) 378, 380; High, Rec. §§ 189, 255, 256; Mills, Em. Dom. § 75; Olyphant v. Steel Co., 28 Fed. Rep. 729; Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, etc., Ry. Co., Id. 871. Any party deeming himself aggrieved by the judgment of the court has the right of appeal. First Nat. Bank v. Barnum Wire, etc., Works, 58 Mich. 315, 25 N. W. Rep. 202; Porter v. Kingman, 126 Mass. 141. It is claimed by petitioner that this view of the case deprives it of the right to have the question of compensation determined by a jury,—a right which is guaranteed to it by the constitution, art. 1, § 14; but, as it is not a case involving the exercise of the right of eminent domain,—is not a taking of private property for public use,—the contention is without merit. In Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 126, the court, speaking to a similar objection, said: "The argument is much pressed that, by leaving all questions relating to the liability of receivers in the hands of the court appointing them, persons having claims against the insolvent corporation or the receiver will be deprived of a trial by jury. This, it is said, is depriving the party of a constitutional right. * * * But those who use this argument lose sight of the fundamental principle that the right of trial by jury, considered as an absolute right, does not extend to cases of equity jurisdiction. If it be conceded or clearly shown that a case belongs to this class, the trial of questions involved in it belongs to the court itself, no matter what may be its importance or complexity. * * * The new and changed condition of things which is presented by the insolvency of such a corporation as a railroad company has rendered necessary the exercise of large and modified forms of control over its property by the courts charged with the settlement of its affairs and the disposition of its assets." See, also, Joy v. City of St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 243.

It is unnecessary, in view of what has been said, to consider the questions raised by respondent, whether prohibition is the proper remedy, and whether the petitioner is competent to invoke it. The question as to whether the East & West Los Angeles Railroad Company sold or leased its tracks on Washington street to the petitioner is a matter to be considered by the superior court on the hearing of the petition, and is not the subject of inquiry in this proceeding. Bishop v. Superior Court, 87 Cal. 233, 25 Pac. Rep. 435. The respondent declares in his answer filed herein that "neither the said court nor the judge thereof ruled or intimated that he had any power to fix the compensation or authorize the connection with any railway tracks not belonging to the Pacific Railway Company, or any property not in the custody and control of the court." The application is denied, and the alternative writ is discharged.

MADDUX v. BROWN. (No. 14,260.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 8, 1891.)

SWAMP LANDS—PURCHASE—CERTIFICATE OF SURVEY—ACTUAL SETTLERS.

1. Pol. Code Cal. § 3445, provides that persons desiring to purchase swamp lands which have been segregated by authority of the United States, but which have not been sectionized by the same authority, must apply to the county surveyor to have the desired lands surveyed, and that a certificate of such survey must be attached to the affidavit of purchase. Held, that an application for purchase, not accompanied by such certificate, is invalid.

2. Where a survey was made on plaintiff's application, defendant cannot defeat plaintiff's claim by making application for the land based on a certificate of such survey, issued prior to a certificate furnished to plaintiff.

3. Where defendant's application was based on a survey made by one not the county surveyor, and whose only authority for making the survey was given him by the county surveyor in his private capacity, the application is void.

4. Where plaintiff removed his family from the land temporarily only, and because of the ill health of a member thereof, such removal is no evidence that he was not an actual settler.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Action by R. A. Maddux against R. A. Brown. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Lambertson & Taylor, for appellant. W. B. Wallace, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Contest for the right to purchase swamp land which is suitable for cultivation. The land was segregated by the authority of the United States in 1855, but has not been sectionized. The court found in favor of defendant, and that plaintiff was not an actual settler. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. Objection was made to certain rulings admitting evidence, and that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings.

The defendant made two applications to purchase. One was based upon an alleged survey by one Newman, who assumed to act as deputy of the county surveyor of Tulare county. His appointment as such deputy was by a certificate signed by one A. T. Fowler, as a private individual, and not in his official capacity. It did not purport to appoint Newman as deputy surveyor of Tulare county, but that "I, A. T. Fowler, by these presents do make, constitute, and appoint H. Newman my true and lawful deputy to survey lot 7," etc. The certificate of appointment, with the official oath of Newman, was not filed until after the survey. Evidently Newman was not a deputy surveyor. Conceding that a deputy might be de facto such, though not de jure, there is still no evidence tending to establish such fact. The appointment being void, the application founded upon the survey was void, and the finding relating to that issue is unsupported by competent evidence.

Plaintiff and defendant each claimed to be living on the land, and had both previously applied to purchase, and had had a similar contest over the right. The court in that contest had found that neither was entitled to purchase. There seems to have been something of a scramble to make the new application. Defendant states that he applied to the county surveyor for a survey; that, being busy, at the request of defendant, he deputized Newman, with the result appearing above. Plaintiff also applied to the county surveyor for a survey, and this the surveyor made in person, July 30, 1889. Apparently defendant received from the county surveyor a certified copy of the record of this survey before it was furnished to plaintiff, for whom it was made, and on August 1, 1889, made out another application to purchase, which was filed in the office of the surveyor general, August 2, 1889. Plaintiff made out his new application to purchase, August 3, 1889, which was filed with the surveyor general, August 6, 1889. It would not do to hold, as a general proposition, that a person desiring to purchase swamp lands which have been segregated as such, but not sectionized by the officers of the United States, finding on record in the office of the county surveyor a survey of the same, can get a certified copy of such record, to be used in lieu of a certificate of a survey made at his request, as required by section 3445¹ of the Political Code.

¹Section 3445 provides that persons desiring to purchase swamp lands which have been segregated by authority of the United States, but which have not been sectionized by the same authority, must apply to the county surveyor to have the desired land surveyed, and that a certificate of such survey must be attached to the affidavit of purchase of the land.

Such survey may not have been made with a view to a compliance with this statute, and unless made for one desiring to purchase, and for that purpose, the county surveyor cannot be said to have been acting as an officer of the state land-office. People v. Cowell, 60 Cal. 400.

The second application of Brown is not accompanied by a certificate of a survey of the land he desired to purchase, made upon his application by the county surveyor, as required by section 3445 of the Political Code.

The court held that plaintiff was not an actual settler upon the land. We fail to discover any evidence in the record which would justify that finding, unless the court found that plaintiff's evidence was unworthy of credence. If he did remove his family from the place temporarily only, and because it became necessary for the health of a member of the family, such fact did not even tend to show that he was not an actual settler. We think the judgment and order should be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed.

91 Cal. 391

HAYES et al. v. FINE et al. (No. 13,865.)
(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 26, 1891.)

APPLICATION FOR NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS OF MOTION—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—INTEREST IN WATER-RIGHT.

1. Where a complaint for diverting water alleges that plaintiffs extended and enlarged a certain ditch upon the express agreement that they should have an interest therein in common with the owners, and there is no exception to a finding that there was no such agreement, an order granting a new trial upon the ground that such a finding is not justified by the evidence should be reversed, where all the other findings are justified by the evidence and sustain the judgment of themselves.

2. A contention that the labor of plaintiffs had destroyed the ditch described in the complaint, and created a new one, in which they were entitled to share as tenants in common by virtue of their labor, is irreconcilably inconsistent with the allegation that they became tenants in common by express agreement.

3. An agreement for an undivided interest in a ditch and water-right is within Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 1971, 1973, declaring that no estate or interest in real estate, other than leaseholds for a year, can be created except by conveyance in writing, and that no agreements other than those which are to be performed within a year can be proved except by some note or memorandum in writing.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county. WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Brown & Daggett, for appellants. N. O. Bradley and Oregon Sanders, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enjoin defendants from diverting water from plaintiff's lands. Judgment for defendants. A new trial was granted, and this appeal is from the order granting a new trial.

The material allegations of the complaint are substantially as follows: That in 1869 the defendants constructed a water-ditch, known as the "Rhodes and Fine Ditch," conveying water from Tule river a distance of about five miles, and being of a average width of eight feet on the bottom, and one foot deep; and acquired rights to water therefor, to be sued in irrigating their lands. That, in 1876, the plaintiffs and others, "with the knowledge and consent of the then owners of said ditch and water-rights, [defendants and their grantors,] and with the assistance of said owners, enlarged said ditch to a width of about sixteen feet on the bottom for a distance of about one mile from the head thereof, and deepened said ditch about one foot for a distance of about four miles from the lower end thereof; and about the same time, and with the knowledge and consent of the then owners of said ditch and water-rights, and with their co-operation and assistance, extended said ditch about three miles further in a westerly direction from the mouth thereof; said extension being about three feet deep and eight feet wide on the bottom. That at the time said ditch was so extended and enlarged it was expressly understood and agreed by and between the then said owners thereof and the plaintiffs or their grantors that the latter named parties, "in consideration of such work of extending and enlarging such ditch as aforesaid, should become tenants in common with said owners in said ditch and extension, and of all water-rights and privileges thereto pertaining." That the plaintiffs and defendants are now, and for more than 10 years last past have been, the owners and in the possession and use of said ditch and the extension thereof and the water flowing therein, as tenants in common; the plaintiffs being the owners of the undivided twenty-nine sixty-sixths thereof. That during said period of 10 years the plaintiffs, with their said co-tenants, have kept said ditch in repair, "and have used the waters thereof for the purpose of irrigating their lands situated along the line of said extension, * * * and have used their said share of the waters * * * openly, peaceably, continuously, notoriously, uninterruptedly, and under a claim of right, and adversely to the defendants and to the whole world, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of said defendants, except when prevented by the wrongful and unlawful acts of said defendants, as hereinafter stated." That in March, 1888, the defendants wrongfully diverted the water from the ditch at a point about one and a half miles above the head of said extension to such a degree that plaintiffs were, and ever since have been, thereby deprived of the use of their portion of the water; and that defendants threaten and intend to continue such diversion, etc. In their answer the defendants deny all the material allegations of the complaint, except that they constructed the original ditch, and continued to own and use it from 1869 until 1876; and they aver that they still own the whole of it, and are entitled to the use thereof. They deny that they co-operated or assisted in the construction of any extension of the original ditch, and disclaim any interest in such extension, which, they say, is improperly called an extension of their ditch, and which they allege was constructed by plaintiffs and others for the purpose of taking up and utilizing surplus water which defendants permitted to flow from the lower end of their ditch, and there abandoned. They admit that, as a neighborly accommodation, they have permitted the water to flow through their ditch to that of the plaintiffs (the alleged extension) whenever they (defendants) had no use for it. They do not deny the diversion of the water from their own ditch, as alleged in the complaint, but claim they were entitled so to divert it. The court filed written findings upon all the issues in favor of the defendants, and rendered judgment accordingly.

The plaintiffs moved for a new trial, upon the grounds that certain findings of fact are not justified by the evidence, and that errors in law were committed at the trial. In granting the motion for a new trial, the court rendered an opinion stating the ground upon which the motion was granted. The following is a copy of the opinion as brought here with the record, and certified to be correct by counsel for both parties: "Plaintiffs' motion for a new trial of the above-entitled action came on regularly to be heard this day upon the judgment roll and the bill of exceptions settled and filed in said cause, upon the ground stated in their notice of intention to move for a new trial, and it satisfactorily appearing to the court that the evidence introduced and received upon the trial of said cause is insufficient to sustain the second finding of facts heretofore found and filed by this court in this particular only, to-wit: Said evidence shows that the Rhodes and Fine ditch, mentioned in the pleadings in said cause and in said findings of fact, was during the winter of 1876, by work then done thereon by the persons named in the complaint, other than the defendants, from the head thereof down to the upper end of Kellogg cut, being a distance of about one mile and a half, was enlarged from an average width of eight feet on the bottom to an average width of twelve feet on the bottom, and below the head of said Kellogg cut said ditch was not and has not been materially enlarged by artificial means; that such enlargement was not done by or under any contract or agreement, and defendants did not assist therein, but they assisted in building and putting in the head-gate at that time; that, with the exception above stated, said findings of fact are correct, and this court is satisfied with its conclusions of law heretofore filed,—and this court being of the opinion that said erroneous finding will prevent the plaintiffs being able to present to an appellate court the points of law on which they rely with the same force and effect as if said findings of fact had been originally correct in the above particulars; and this court being of the opinion that, after judgment entered, and on motion for a new trial, it has no jurisdiction or authority to amend its findings: Now, therefore, because of the insufficiency of the evidence to support said finding as above specified, and for that reason only, it is ordered that said plaintiffs' motion for a new trial of said cause be, and the same is hereby, granted."

In view of certain undenied averments in the complaint, and findings of fact which are not excepted to, the ground upon which the new trial was granted is immaterial. The averments in the complaint that defendants constructed the ditch and acquired the water-rights in 1869, and owned both the ditch and water-rights until 1876, not being denied, but emphatically affirmed, by the defendants, must have been taken as conclusively true for all purposes of the trial. From these averments it necessarily follows that defendants by some means must have parted with whatever interest or estate the plaintiffs acquired in the ditch and water-rights in 1876 or thereafter; and, consistently with this, it is averred in the complaint that the plaintiffs acquired their alleged interest as tenants in common with the plaintiffs by express agreement with defendants, the consideration for which, moving from plaintiffs to defendants, is alleged to have been work done by plaintiffs on the ditch in extending and enlarging it. The denial of this agreement by defendants raises the principal issue of fact in the case. If this issue has been properly decided in favor of the defendants, the plaintiffs are not entitled to any relief whatever in this action; for, without the alleged agreement, the mere fact that plaintiffs did more or less work on the ditch in extending and enlarging it, gave them no estate or interest, as tenants in common or otherwise, in the original ditch or water-rights owned by defendants in 1876. The only agreement that could be implied from the mere fact that plaintiffs did the work alleged, even at the request of defendants, would be that defendants were to pay for the work so much as it was reasonably worth. Upon this issue the finding of the court is: "That there never was, either in 1876 or at any time, any contract, agreement, or understanding by or between the then owners of said Rhodes and Fine ditch and said S. E. Dale, A. E. Scruggs, and J. Cattaneo, or either of them, that said ditch should be enlarged or extended, or that, in consideration of such enlargement and extension, or for any consideration, said Dale, Scruggs, and Cattaneo, or either of them, should become tenants in common with said owners, either in said ditch or extension, or in any water-rights or privileges belonging to said ditch." This finding is not excepted to on any ground. It follows that, unless the order granting a new trial can be justified on some other ground than that upon which it is based by the opinion of the learned judge of the court below, it should be reversed.

It is conceded by counsel for respondents that there was no express agreement by which plaintiffs were to have or to acquire any interest in the ditch or water-rights; and that whether or not their alleged labor on the ditch, with the knowledge and consent of defendants, implied an agreement that they should become tenants in common, etc., is the vital question in the case. On page 3 of this brief counsel for respondents says: "The first point made for appellants is that 'the plaintiffs failed to prove that they had acquired any title to the ditch in controversy.' This is the vital question in this case. If the work of enlargement made by plaintiff S. E. Dale and others did not give them an interest in the ditch as now found, then plaintiffs have no interest in it." All the findings of fact, except the second, as to which the new trial was granted, are fully justified by the evidence, and sustain the judgment without aid from the second finding.

The issues of fact seem to have been thoroughly tried. The testimony of 17 witnesses on the part of the plaintiffs and 12 for the defendants occupy 250 pages of the transcript; and it seems extremely improbable that a materially different state of facts could be elicited by a new trial. Certainly the facts alleged in the complaint could not be disputed by plaintiffs, and there is no exception to the finding that there was no agreement that plaintiffs should have an interest in the ditch or water-rights, and no pretense that there was any such express agreement.

None of the errors in law specified in the bill of exceptions are well taken. The only one of them that can be said to be involved in any point urged here by appellant's counsel is that the court erred in deciding that the agreement alleged in the complaint, by which the plaintiffs were to acquire interests as tenants in common with defendants in the ditch and water-rights, is within the statute of frauds, and cannot be proved, except by some note or memorandum thereof in writing. In this there was no error, since the estate in the ditch and water-rights, the acquisition of which plaintiffs sought to prove, is other and greater than a leasehold for one year. It is absolute ownership of an undivided part of the ditch and water-right for the protection of which plaintiffs ask a perpetual injunction. That such an estate in the ditch and water-rights is real property, and that an agreement for a conveyance thereof is within the statute of frauds, there is no question in this state.
